SURVEYS IN THE TERRITORY OF WYOMING.

AUGUST 2, 1876.—Recommitted to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MUTCHLER, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, by unanimous consent, submitted the following

R E P O R T:

It having been represented to your committee that certain abuses had been practiced in the awarding of contracts by surveyors-general for the survey of the public lands, they determined to inquire into the truth or falsity of the charges by the examination of witnesses who, it was supposed, had knowledge of the fact that such abuses existed. The time of the committee having been occupied almost exclusively in the investigation of other matters, they found it impossible to give attention to any of the charges except those relating to surveys in the Territory of Wyoming. It having been alleged that Dr. Silas Reed, late surveyor-general of that Territory, was in the habit of compelling deputy surveyors who received contracts from him to divide the profits of their contracts with such friends of his as he would designate, who did no work and assumed none of the responsibilities which attached to the contractor, and whose only connection with the surveys was to receive their share of the profits after the work was completed, your committee proceeded to take the testimony of a number of witnesses in support of the allegations, and they herewith submit it as a part of their report.

Dr. Reed became surveyor-general of Wyoming Territory in the year 1870, and held the position until the spring of 1873, when he was removed, and a Dr. H. Latham was appointed his successor. In speaking of his removal, Dr. Reed, in his testimony, says:

I was appointed the second time in February, 1870. I went out there, and in March, 1873, at the time of the President's inauguration, this ring that is now hatching up this difficulty, mystifying and misrepresenting it, came down here and represented me to the President as a great Greeley man, and as having attended Greeley conventions, &c., and the President, forgetting that he had appointed me the second time, appointed a man in my place.

Upon the receipt of his notice of dismissal, Dr. Reed at once proceeded to Washington, and having convinced President Grant that the report to the effect that he had been wanting in fealty to him was a malicious fabrication, invented by the "ring" for selfish purposes, he was at once re-appointed, and again entered upon his duties as surveyor-general of the Territory. The contracts for surveys for the season of 1873 having been already let by Dr. Latham, none were given out by Dr. Reed until the following season, being the summer of 1874.

The act of May 18, 1796, provides that "every surveyor-general shall engage a sufficient number of skillful surveyors as his deputies," and by the act of March 3, 1831, "every deputy surveyor is required to enter into bonds with sufficient security for the faithful performance of all surveying-contracts, and to take an oath that the surveys have been faithfully and correctly executed according to law and the instructions of the surveyor-general. In the opinion of the committee, the plain provisions of the statutes regulating the surveying of the public lands require all contracts to be let only to persons skilled in the art of surveying, and to such as will give the bond and take the oath required by those statutes. The term skillful surveyors cannot be interpreted to mean any class of persons except such as have been educated in the business of surveying. The manual of surveying-instructions, however, authorized by the act of 1872, and issued by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, contains a provision declaring that where there are two contractors, one only shall be required to be a practical surveyor, the other may be the moneyed man of the firm; the one to execute the work and swear to the field-notes, the other to furnish the necessary means for the outfit. This regulation, made, as is claimed, in pursuance of law, enables surveyors-general to award heavy contracts to favorites, who have no knowledge whatever of the work to be done, or of the manner of doing it, and who scarcely ever go into the field. As surveying-contracts are always awarded at the maximum sum allowed by law, the profits realized are generally very large in proportion to the amount invested by the moneyed man of the firm. This system of partnership in surveying was somewhat improved by Dr. Reed, very much to the advantage of the moneyed man of the firm, who, it appears from the testimony, was not only not required to do any work, but did not sign a contract, give a bond, take the oath, nor advance any money. Under the doctor's system, the moneyed man did no work and assumed no responsibility; he was a silent partner, with nothing to do except to receive his share of the profits of the contract. This system was put into practical operation in the spring of 1874, when the first contracts were let by Dr. Reed after his re-appointment to the office of surveyor-general of the Territory, and the beneficiaries under it were Mr. John S. Delano, Mr. Orvil L. Grant, and a Mr. H. H. Houghton, an editor of a newspaper in Galena, Ill. Although each of these gentlemen participated in the distribution of the profits of surveying-contracts, none of them took any of the responsibilities of contracting parties, nor did any of the work required to be done, and, so far as the evidence shows, only one of them (Mr. Delano) advanced any money to purchase an outfit for the men in the field.

In May, 1874, two contracts were given to J. Wesley Hammond, of which the aggregate liability was $4,000. Subsequently and during the same summer a contract was given to Mr. Rogers, the liability of which was $2,100; one to Mr. Hays, of the same liability; one to Mr. Reed, liability $1,800; and one to Mr. Thomas, liability $2,900. These contracts were all for surveying township and section lines, and were awarded at the maximum sum allowed by law for that kind of surveying. The only contracting parties, so far as the papers in the Land-Office show, were the Government and the parties above named. Yet Mr. Delano was the recipient of one-half the profits of each contract, amounting in the aggregate to from $3,000 to $5,000. The settlements with the deputies were made by Dr. Reed, and the amount due by each one to Mr. Delano deducted by him. For purposes which may readily be imagined, it seems Dr. Reed was particularly anxious that Mr. Delano should have an interest in surveying contracts. According to his own statement, as early as May or June, 1873, when, it will be remembered, he was out of office and was in Washington soliciting a re-appointment, he had a conversation with Ex-Secretary Delano in regard to the health of his son, who, it seems, was afflicted with a disease of the lungs, in which conversation he suggested that John should go to the mountains for the benefit of his health. Subsequently, he relates, he had an interview with Mr. Drummond, the Commissioner of the Land-Office, with regard to the propriety of giving Mr. Delano a contract, and that that official advised him that he could properly do so. Dr. Reed, by his testimony, endeavors to create the impression that there was no intention to conceal the fact that Mr. Delano had an interest in surveying-contracts, but that the transaction was an open one and in no way inconsistent with his sworn duty as a Government official. He insists that the only reason why Mr. Delano's name was not inserted in the contracts, and he required to file his bond and take the oath, was because, on account of the sickness of his wife, he could not reach the Territory in time to comply with these requirements of the law. In this assertion the doctor is not sustained by the evidence. On the contrary, it is clearly proven that he used all means in his power to keep the matter a profound secret, and that he peremptorily discharged an honest and faithful clerk from his office because he, in the conscientious discharge of his duty, attempted to correct the abuses that were being practiced.

Mr. L. C. Stevens, who was chief clerk in Dr. Reed's office at Cheyenne, and who was removed because he endeavored to expose the dishonest transactions of the office, testifies in respect to the Hammond contract that at the instance of Dr. Reed he told Hammond that there was a chance for him to get work. He says, "I told him that if he was willing to go into the field and let Mr. Delano in on profits he could get work, and asked him if he would be willing to take a contract on such terms. I talked quite a while with him about it and talked freely. He was an intimate friend of mine and I advised him that that was the only show he had to get anything to do, and that he had better do that than be idle; that he would do pretty well out of it himself anyhow; that he had better do it, and he said he would. I then reported to Dr. Reed that I had seen Mr. Hammond and that it was all right; so the contract was let to Mr. Hammond." This witness says Mr. Delano "shared equally with Mr. Hammond in the profits." "As I understood," he says, "from conversations with the doctor afterward, Mr. Hammond had owned the outfit, the mules, the compass, and the equipments generally, and also did the work; and for the use of his outfit and for his services he was to receive $125 a month, which was deducted before the division." In answer to a question as to whether the witness had anything to do with the payment of money to Mr. Delano, he says, "Some time in November, 1874, the draft was received from the Treasury for Mr. Hammond in payment for those contracts. Mr. Hammond was not in town at that time. I received his mail when he was not in town and attended to his business, and I placed these Treasury drafts in the bank to his credit. Mr. Hammond had told me that he had given to Dr. Reed notes; that the doctor had required him to give notes for what was coming to Mr. Delano, and that they were all right. I was acquainted with the arrangement from the beginning. On the 21st of November, 1874, Dr. Reed showed me these notes given by Mr. Hammond; they were notes made on a form of the First National Bank of Cheyenne, and these [producing papers] are exact copies of the notes:

CHEYENNE, October 26, 1874.

On or before February 1, 1874, we jointly and severally promise to pay to John L. Merriam or bearer, out of the draft of my surveying-contract No. 62 of May 20, 1874, as soon as received, $400 at the First National Bank of Cheyenne, for value received, waiving benefit of stay and exemption laws, with interest at two per cent. per month from maturity till paid.

J. WESLEY HAMMOND.

WASHINGTON, October 26, 1874.

On or before February 1, 1874, we jointly and severally promise to pay to John L. Merriam or bearer, out of my survey-contract No. 62 of May 20, 1874, $1,000 as soon as received, at the First National Bank of Cheyenne, for value received, waiving benefit of stay and exemption laws, with interest at two per cent. from maturity till paid.

J. WESLEY HAMMOND.

The fact that the name of John L. Merriam was inserted in the above notes instead of that of Mr. Delano is another circumstance going to show the intention of Dr. Reed to cover up the transaction with Mr. Delano; and the reason for this name being put there will be found in the following letter, which is still stronger evidence that the parties desired that the fact that Mr. Delano had an interest in surveying-contracts should be a secret :

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 26, 1874.

DEAR GENERAL: I have been detained by my wife's illness, but hope at least to get off to Saint Paul by Monday, and to reach Cheyenne in June. I shall have to return here by the last of June on my wife's account, but shall not go back west for the summer and fall.

Hope you will be able to put Merriam (I think it had better be in his name) into a good contract for me. I shall sadly need the profits for my summer's outlay—out of office, sick, unable to attend to my own affairs, runs me behind a good deal. Thanks for your kind letter.

Yours, truly,

J. S. DELANO.

This letter flatly contradicts the assertion made by Dr. Reed to the effect that the only reason why the name of Mr. Delano was omitted from the Hammond contract, and he not required to qualify as a deputy, was because he was unable to reach the Territory in time to do so. It will be observed the letter is dated six days after the date of the contract, and that the name of Merriam does not occur in any of the papers, excepting in the notes subsequently given by Hammond to secure the payment of Delano's share. The truth is, the Hammond contract had been awarded to him, with the distinct understanding that he was to divide the profits equally with Delano, some time before the latter had signified to Dr. Reed his intention of coming to the Territory.

If any other evidence were necessary to prove beyond the possibility of a doubt that it was the intention of the parties to keep the transaction entirely secret, it will be found in the conduct of Dr. Reed in removing Mr. Stevens, his chief clerk, so soon as he had ascertained that that gentleman had attempted to expose the affair to the authorities at Washington.

Mr. Stevens testifies that Dr. Reed handed him the two notes given by Hammond to Medary, with a request that he collect them, and, as he had charge of Hammond's money-matters during his absence in the field, he drew his check on the First National Bank of Cheyenne for $1,400, signed "J. Wesley Hammond, by L. C. Stevens," and with this money paid the notes. Five hundred and five dollars of this amount he gave to Dr. Reed, and with the balance, $895, he purchased a draft on New York, payable to the order of J. S. Delano. This draft, he says, Dr. Reed inclosed, with a letter directed to Mr. Delano. After the draft had been paid and returned to the bank, Mr. Stevens says he obtained possession of it, and in the latter part of March, 1875, inclosed it, together with other proofs of the transaction, to Hon. B. H. Bristow, with a request that he lay the papers before President Grant. At this time Dr. Reed was absent from the Territory, staying at Saint Louis. Mr. Bristow testifies that he received the papers sent, and, in obedience to the request of Stevens, laid them before the President. That among the papers he thinks there was a letter from Ex-Secretary Delano to Dr. Reed, thanking him for some kindness done his son. That the papers related to surveying-contracts in the Territory of Wyoming, and on their face showed evidence of improper transactions between the surveyor-general and John S. Delano. On the 28th of April Dr. Reed, who, as has been stated, was in Saint Louis, came to Washington City. Immediately upon his arrival he was informed by Mr. J. S. Delano and others that the President was in possession of these papers. Mr. Delano, it seems, from his own testimony, had seen the papers, they having been shown him by General O. E. Babcock, the President's private secretary. On receiving this information, Dr. Reed at once telegraphed his chief clerk, Mr. Stevens, as follows :

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 29, 1875.

Mr. L. C. STEVENS,

Surveyor-General's Office :

How did Campbell obtain D.'s letters to me about surveys?

SILAS REED.

Dr. Reed further testifies that on this same day he had an interview with the President; that he informed the President that the papers had been stolen; that one of them was a private or semi-official letter to him, and that he did not think it ought to be floating about, because it would be misunderstood or misinterpreted among strangers; that the President replied that he did not see that they amounted to anything; he had not thought enough of the matter to mention it to Secretary Delano or pay any attention to it, and that he would return the papers to J. S. Delano. After the interview with the President, Dr. Reed went to the telegraph-office and sent a telegram to Cheyenne removing Mr. Stevens, his chief clerk.

The letter which the doctor alluded to as not desiring to have "floating around," for fear that it might be "misunderstood or misinterpreted by strangers" was an autograph-letter from Ex-Secretary Delano to Dr. Reed, written in the month of October, and some time prior to the date of the settlements between the deputy surveyors, in whose contracts J. S. Delano was interested, and the Government. Mr. Stevens says that a month before sending the draft to J. S. Delano, Dr. Reed showed him this letter, and in doing so said, "I was writing the Secretary not long ago, and I mentioned to him that I was doing something for John out here. I got a letter from him this morning, and I want to show it to you. Just see how careful he is."

It was an autograph-letter of Secretary Delano's, and addressed to Dr. Reed. The first part of it was in regard to some other work, which I did not pay any attention to or charge my mind with. The part to which he directed my attention and which he had referred to was like this: "You mention that you are doing something for John. I hope you will be careful not to do anything that will have the appearance of being wrong." In his testimony, Dr. Reed admits having received this letter, and that it contained a clause in which the writer thanked him for his kindness toward his son.

With regard to the surveys in which Orvil L. Grant had an interest, the testimony of Mr. Stevens shows that a brother-in-law of Grant's, named Medary, had several heavy contracts, first under Surveyor-General Latham, subsequently under Dr. Reed. Stevens says, "The doctor told me in 1873 that Medary was to help Orvil out of some of his debts." He also said that as Medary was "spending his money pretty fast, there would be nothing left for Orvil." The witness further says that in the spring of 1874 he asked the doctor whether Medary had helped Orvil out as he promised, and the doctor said that was fixed up all right. That in the summer of 1874 Medary had contracts all the while to large amounts. That one day the doctor asked witness what he thought Medary ought to make out of his work. Witness said, "Not less than $5,000, however he manage." The doctor added, "That's just what I thought, and just what I told Mr. Grant. I told Mr. Grant that that ought to be the basis, and that if Medary did not report that much profit, he had not managed his work right." This witness says that Medary was by no means a favorite of the doctor's. That the doctor told him one time that he did not like to have him about. That he wished Grant would get somebody else. He could get a man who would make more money for him and be pleasanter about the office. In a letter written from Washington by Dr. Reed to his clerk, he says: "Medary's last draft has gone to Cedar Falls, and O. L. G. seems worried that nothing has come from the source of his prosperity yet." In another portion of the letter he says: "I have this moment parted with O. L. G. I have suggested that he hire a good assistant and go out on his own hook next season, for all his plans seem to have failed this year, and it is not certain he will receive a dollar from M."

Dr. Reed does not deny that Grant had an interest in all the contracts given to Medary, although his name nowhere appears in any of the papers on file in the land-office, nor was he in the Territory at any time while the work was being done. The testimony further goes to show that Medary himself was not a practical surveyor, and that the work allotted to him was done by a compass-man by the name of Corey, whom he employed by the month. Contracts were all awarded, as was the case in those in which Delano was interested, at the maximum price fixed by law.

Mr. Stevens also testifies that a man by the name of H. H. Houghton, who published a newspaper at Galena, Ill., called the Galena Advertiser, had an interest to the extent of $600 in a surveying-contract to two deputies named James and Rodgers. He does not know certainly that Houghton received the money, but the deputies told him they had paid it. He says the doctor told him he intended to help Mr. Houghton, who was his old friend. That he had offered him a contract, but that he could not come out there to work, and so he was going to let some of the deputies make up to him about the amount he could make on a small contract.

Your committee believe that John S. Delano, Orvil L. Grant, and H. H. Houghton rendered no service whatever to the Government for the money received by them, but that they were mere "dead-heads" and pensioners upon the fund appropriated by Congress for surveys of the public lands in the Territory of Wyoming for the year 1874, and that Dr. Silas Reed, the surveyor-general of that Territory, violated his official oath by awarding contracts for surveying at the maximum price upon condition that the deputies would divide their profits with men who gave no equivalent for the money they received. The precise amount of the public money thus fraudulently and corruptly used the committee are unable to state, but it is quite certain that it amounts to several thousand dollars, and that the entire sum should have been saved to the Government, because the evidence shows that the work could and would have been done by the deputies to whom the contracts were awarded at the price they actually received after deducting the amount each was compelled to pay to his silent partner as a bonus for his contract.

In justification of his conduct in thus misapplying the public money, Dr. Reed says he was induced to offer Mr. Delano an interest in surveying-contracts because he was unwell, and he, as a physician, knew that if he could get him to go to the mountains his health would be restored; that he was his father's only son, and as he, witness, had but one son, he had great sympathy for the father. As to Orvil L. Grant, he had been burned out in Chicago and was poor; besides, Medary was a single man, while Grant had a family and was supporting Medary's mother, and he thought it was no more than right that the latter should divide profits with him. When it is remembered that one of these recipients of the Government bounty is a near blood-relative of the then Secretary of the Interior and the other of the President, and that the sympathizing doctor held his official position at the pleasure of these two high officials, it will be seen that the motive which prompted him to relieve their necessities was as humane and unselfish as any that ever moved the philanthropic heart of the illustrious Pecksniff. Although the fact that this unfaithful official had been guilty of corruptly using the public money was known to the authorities by whose favor he held his office in March, yet he was permitted to retain his position until the month of August, when, as will be seen by the following letter of President Grant, his resignation was accepted:

LONG BRANCH, N. J., August 7, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of resignation of the 30th of July was duly received, but has not been acted upon until now. I have this day forwarded it to the Secretary of the Interior, with instructions to accept it to take effect on the 10th September, or as soon thereafter as your successor may qualify. In accepting your resignation allow me to say that I know of no reason to be dissatisfied with your administration of the office of surveyor-general. On the contrary, I believe it has been efficiently, and advantageously to the Government, filling during your entire administration.

With sincere wishes for your welfare, and assurances of my personal friendship, I am, very truly, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT.

Dr. SILAS REED,
Surveyor-General, W. T.

Your committee deem it necessary, in order to prevent any misappropriation of the money set apart for defraying the expenses of surveying the public lands in the future, to recommend that the law regulating surveys should be so amended as to impose a penalty upon surveyors-general who may award a contract to any one not a skillful surveyor, and also a penalty upon any person receiving a contract who may neglect or refuse to superintend the work allotted him in person.

WM. MUTCHLER.

A. R. BOONE.

WM. B. ANDERSON.

TESTIMONY

TAKEN BY THE

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT,

IN RELATION TO

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN CONTRACTS FOR GOVERNMENT SURVEYS IN WYOMING TERRITORY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1876.

B. H. BRISTOW sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. It has been represented to this committee that, during the time that Ex-Secretary Delano was the Secretary of the Interior, a letter, purporting to have been written by him and addressed to a certain party or parties who had been engaged in surveying public lands in some of the Territories, accidentally came into your possession, and that you conceived it proper to lay that letter before the President, and did so. Will you state whether such is the fact?—Answer. This question is put to me without a moment's notice of the reason for inviting my attendance before this committee, and relates to a matter which was brought to my attention by a stranger, and which did not belong to my Department, but I will state the facts as well as I can from memory.

Some time last year, a Mr. Stevens, whose given name I do not remember, and whom I do not personally know and never saw, wrote me from Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory, inclosing certain papers with request that I should lay them before the President. Subsequently, and I should say some months afterward, Mr. Stevens wrote me again asking that the papers be returned to him. I returned them to Mr. Stevens, who, as I understand, resides at Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory, and was formerly, as his letter advised me, employed in the office of the surveyor-general of that Territory. I cannot undertake to state, with anything like accuracy, the contents of the papers, which passed out of my hands some months ago. I ought to say that there was nothing in the papers inclosed in Mr. Stevens's letter implicating the then Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Delano, so far as I remember, in any improper transaction.

Q. Was there among those papers a letter from the Secretary of the Interior addressed to Mr. Stevens, or to any other person, in which he spoke of the liberality of these people in compensating his son John for any services rendered?—A. I think not. I think there was a letter—and I speak with great hesitancy, because it was not a matter of my own, and I did not charge my memory particularly with it. I did with the papers only what seemed to be a matter of duty, and in pursuance of the request of the writer. I think there was a letter from the late Secretary of the Interior to the surveyor-general of the Territory, thanking him for some kindness toward his son, who, it appears, had been out there; but, so far as I recollect, there was nothing in the letter relating to any compensation or money transaction in terms, or by any implication that occurred to me. On reflection, I think Mr. Stevens's letter did not cover any letter from the Secretary of the Interior, but that the writer, Stevens, said he had seen a letter from Secretary Delano to the surveyor-general, thanking the latter for his kindness to his (the Secretary's) son. I hope I may be permitted to add to that answer that I was a good deal embarrassed by having the papers placed in my possession; they came to me from an entire stranger. Why he should have sent them to me I do not know.

Q. State what the papers related to.—A. The papers related to surveying contracts in Wyoming Territory. I am sorry that I cannot give the full name of Mr. Stevens to the committee.

Q. Was Mr. Stevens the surveyor?—A. I think Mr. Stevens was a clerk or a deputy, or held some office in the surveyor-general's office. He said he held some position there. He was not the surveyor-general. My recollection is that the surveyor-general's name was Reed.

Q. Will you state for what purpose you were requested to lay the papers before the President?—A. I cannot say that the purpose was expressed in the letter of Mr. Stevens to me. I think I returned the whole of the papers, including Mr. Stevens's letter, to him. I will not be positive about the return of his letter, but I know I returned the inclosures to him, at his request.

Q. What were those papers?—A. It is impossible for me to state definitely. I did not feel that it was a matter connected with my Department, or in connection with which I was charged with any official duty. There were peculiar circumstances surrounding me at the time which embarrassed me very much by having the papers come into my possession, and when Mr. Stevens called for them I returned them to him. I ought to repeat that, so far as I have any recollection at all, there was nothing in the papers inclosed in Mr. Stevens's letter involving the Secretary of the Interior in any improper transaction.

Q. Was there anything in the papers involving any other person in any improper action; and, if so, whom?—A. On their face they did.

Q. Who was that person?—A. The surveyor-general of the Territory and Mr. John Delano, the son of the Secretary of the Interior. I ought to add that I saw but one side of the matter, and do not know but what there is a perfect explanation of that.

Q. In what way did they involve the surveyor-general and the Secretary's son in any improper action?—A. The papers indicated that there had been an interest in a surveying contract set apart for Mr. John Delano. I am not at all familiar with the business of a surveyor-general's office, and, perhaps, have less knowledge of it than any gentleman of this committee. I mean to say that I know nothing of the business of such office, but, according to my recollection, the papers showed that when certain contracts were given to deputy surveyors—and I do not know that that is the proper designation—or to persons who did the work of surveying at particular rates, that a part of the contract-price was reserved for Mr. John Delano.

Q. Can you state what that amounted to?—A. I cannot.

Q. Was it not about $60,000?—A. O, no; nothing like it. So far as these papers showed, I should say from my best recollection it was not to exceed four or five thousand dollars—perhaps not over two or three thousand. I do not state the amount with positiveness, but I think it was a few thousand dollars.

Q. I believe you have already stated that you do not know the name of the surveyor-general?—A. I think his name was Reed, as I have stated heretofore. My impression is that he has been removed, and, while I don't know the fact, I have an impression on my mind that his removal resulted from this information. I laid the papers before the President because the writer requested me to do so, and because I deemed it my duty, and I requested the President to return them to me for the same reason; that is, that the writer requested me to get them and to return them to him.

Q. Do you know certainly that you have returned all those papers to Mr. Stevens?—A. I am very sure I returned all the inclosures of his letter. Whether I returned his original letter or not I cannot state positively without looking over my own files.

Q. If you still have that letter you can produce it, can you not?—A. Undoubtedly I can. It is entirely possible that if I did not return the letter I may have destroyed it, but I will look at my files, and if it is there, it is at the service of the committee. I ought to add that the letter indicated that there had been some personal difference between the writer and the surveyor-general, and, possibly, Mr. Delano. At any rate, I saw that it was a personal quarrel to which I did not want to become a party.

Q. How long before Mr. Delano resigned did this transpire?—A. I cannot answer that question with any definiteness. I think the papers came to me some time during the spring or summer, but really I do not remember the time, nor can I say certainly when Mr. Delano resigned, though I think in September or October.

Q. You do not remember, then, whether his resignation was accepted a short time after the President came into possession of the knowledge of the facts in relation to this matter?—A. I cannot state the time with anything like definiteness.

Q. To whom was the letter from the Secretary, thanking the person for attention paid to his son, addressed?—A. I repeat that, on reflection, I think Mr. Stevens's letter to me contained no letter from Secretary Delano, but that Mr. Stevens, in his letter to me, said he had seen such a letter from Mr. Delano to the surveyor-general, as I have before stated.

Q. The only evidence, then, as I understand, of the fact that John Delano had received a portion of the money that was realized by the contract was contained in the letter of Mr. Stevens?—A. I do not wish to be so understood.

Q. Please state what evidence there was of fraud in the other papers accompanying the letter.—A. The papers, as I remember them, were checks; by whom drawn, I cannot say. There were some bank-checks, and the paper to which Mr. Stevens seemed to attach greatest importance was a draft, which bore the indorsement of Mr. John Delano. The amount I do not remember definitely, but I think it was about $1,000.

Q. By whom was the draft drawn?—A. It was a draft, according to my recollection, of bank at Cheyenne, drawn on New York. I do not recollect to whose order it was payable, but one of the indorsements purported to be made by John Delano. His name was on Mr. Stevens, in his letter, alleged that the draft was part of the proceeds of a surveying contract.

Q. In addition to that draft, I understand you to say there were checks?—A. I think one or more bank-checks, and, perhaps, two or three notes.

Q. Do you remember the amount of the checks or notes?—A. I do not.

Q. Can you remember to whose order they were drawn?—A. I cannot. My impression is that Mr. Stevens, in his letter, claimed to have kept the account himself and to have made the deposit, drawing the checks and paying the money, but to whom he claimed to have paid it I do not recollect.

Q. What was the date of this letter? Was it subsequent to the date of the check or the draft, or prior thereto?—A. I cannot state about that. I do not remember.

Q. Do you remember whether there were any other documents in the package of papers, excepting the drafts and checks, that would indicate any irregularities on the part of Mr. Delano, excepting the letter of Mr. Stevens himself—his own allegations?—A. None at all. Among the papers sent me by Mr. Stevens was a letter from John Delano to the surveyor-general, but my recollection of its contents is not sufficiently distinct to enable me to speak with any degree of certainty about it. My best recollection is that it gave the surveyor-general direction as to how a certain contract should be made and in whose name.

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1876.

BENJAMIN H. BRISTOW recalled.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Is there anything further you desire to state, Mr. Secretary, in relation to this matter? If so, we would like you to state it.—Answer. I can state, Mr. Chairman, that since I was before the committee the other day I have examined my files and do not find that I have retained any of Mr. Stevens's letters. Whether I returned them to him or destroyed them I cannot say.

By Mr. BOONE:

Q. I believe you said you would give us his given name?—A. Yes, sir; I find, from a letter-press copy, that my letter dated July 1st, returning the papers, was addressed to Mr. L. C. Stevens. I find by this letter that his letter to me inclosing the papers was of date 24th of March.

Q. You spoke of some notes. Do you remember by whom they were drawn and by whom they were given, and were they ordinary notes of hand—promises to pay?—A. The names of the parties were all wholly unfamiliar to me, and I cannot give them, although my impression is that the notes were alleged by Mr. Stevens to be given by the deputy surveyors, or the parties who had the surveying contracts. I don't know that that is what they are called. To whom they were payable I cannot answer, although Mr. Stevens alleged they were executed for the benefit of John Delano.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You returned the papers on the 1st of July?—A. Yes; and I find by this letter that the date of his letter inclosing them to me was the 24th of March.

Q. Have you any idea what the date was when you received his letter?—A. I have not; I suppose I received it in the ordinary course of mail.

Q. That would bring it here about the 1st of April?—A. Somewhere about that I should say, though I have no independent recollection of it at all.

Q. Can you state how long after you received the letter it was before you laid it before the President?—A. It was a very few days.

Q. How long did the papers remain with the President?—A. From that time until about the 1st of July, the time that I returned them. I think I did not keep them in my hands, perhaps, not a day after I received them. I think I returned them the day I received them.

Q. Do you know whether the President sent for Mr. John Delano and had an interview with him about the matter?—A. I do not.

Q. Did you ever have an interview with the President yourself, after that time, in relation to them?—A. I did not; I had no interview with the President on the subject, except when I laid the papers before him, and then expressed no opinion whatever.

By Mr. BOONE:

Q. Can you state when Mr. Delano resigned?—A. I think in September or October.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. His resignation was accepted, you mean, in September or October?—A. Well, what I mean is, he went out of office in September or October.

Q. Do you know about the date of his resignation?—A. I do not; I suppose I have seen it published in the papers, but have no recollection as to date.

Q. You have no knowledge of the time when ex-Secretary Delano tendered his resignation to the President?—A. I have not.

Q. Was or was not this subject discussed in Cabinet meeting prior to the time that Secretary Delano resigned?—A. At no time when I was present, and at no other time so far as I know or am informed.

Q. Do you know how long Surveyor-General Reed retained his position after these facts came to the knowledge of the President?—A. I do not, sir.

Q. There never was any investigation of this, so far as you know, by the Interior Department?—A. I don't know of any, and I should not have known of any, perhaps, if it had occurred.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1876.

SILAS REED sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. What are you engaged in at present?—Answer. I am not engaged in any regular business in particular at present.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. I have been residing in Wyoming for the last six years. I was United States surveyor-general there.

Q. Tell what time you were surveyor-general?—A. Until the 23d of September last.

Q. And you held that position for six years, did you?—A. Very nearly—say six surveying seasons. Saint Louis has been my standing home for thirty-nine years. I consider that my chief home now.

Q. Were you removed or did you resign?—A. I resigned, sir. I found that letter in my valise this morning. I did not know I had it with me. You can examine it. [Paper produced.] That is the President's letter accepting my resignation.

The letter, which is marked "Exhibit A," reads as follows :

"LONG BRANCH, N. J., August 7, 1875.

"DEAR SIR: Your letter of resignation of the 30th of July, was duly received, but has not been acted upon until now. I have this day forwarded it to the Secretary of the Interior, with instructions to accept it, to take effect on the 10th of Sept., or as soon thereafter as your successor may qualify. In accepting your resignation, allow me to say that I know of no reason to be dissatisfied with your administration of the office of surveyor-general. On the contrary, I believe it has been efficiently and advantageously to the Government filled during your entire administration.

"With sincere wishes for your welfare, and assurances of my personal friendship, I am, very truly,

"Your obedient servant,

"U. S. GRANT.

"Dr. SILAS REED,

"Surveyor-General, Wyoming Territory."

Q. Had you ever had any communication with the President prior to the date when you tendered your resignation?—A. I saw him personally frequently.

Q. Did you come on to Washington and see him personally?—A. No; I was here last winter and spring most of the time, pursuing a claim here (in this Congress) of mine for property taken in Saint Louis for custom-house.

Q. That was during the winter of 1874-1875?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you tender your resignation while here?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you and the President have any talk at that time about your resignation?—A. I do not think we did. The last time I saw him before I went back to Wyoming was on the 29th of April. I had a long talk with him about this affair then; but nothing was said about my resignation, or his removing me, or anything of the kind.

Q. What gave rise to the talk about this affair?—A. Because I found that this chief clerk of mine had been purloining papers from the bank and from my office, and sent them down here to Ex-Governor Campbell, and Campbell had taken them to Bristow, as I learned, and Bristow had shouldered them and taken them up to the President, and had it telegraphed over the country that grave charges had been filed against Mr. Delano. The President looked at the papers, and I heard of it, and went up and saw him the 29th of April.

Q. You knew nothing about the affair until you saw it in the newspapers?—A. I do not know whether I understand your question.

Q. Why, the first intimation that you received that these papers had been sent on by your clerk was derived through the newspapers?—A. O, I derived it here at that time.

Q. Who told you?—A. Well, I think I got the first information here on my arrival from Saint Louis. I had been out to Saint Louis on some business the fore part of April, and I returned and stopped on my way to Boston for my wife and took her with me to the mountains, and I derived information here, whether from some party in the Land-Office or whether from John Delano, I would not be certain now, but I might have got it from both.

Q. That was early in 1875?—A. I got that information on the 28th of April, in the evening, and on the 29th I went to see the President to see whether he had got such papers. I found that he had, and I told him that they were stolen and what they were. He said that he did not see that they amounted to anything, and he had not seen fit to speak to Mr. Delano about it. I remember that John Delano thought that Stevens was here at the time, and I told him no, he was still acting as chief clerk at my office, and when I found he was treacherous, I telegraphed the evening of the 29th to Cheyenne his removal from my office.

Q. Where were the papers at that time?—A. I suppose they were in the President's hands. I understood the President so.

Q. Did you ask him for them?—A. Well, I don't know whether I did or not. I think I may have asked him for Mr. John Delano's letters. It strikes me I did, but I remember his saying that he would return them to John Delano to whom they belonged; that he had not thought enough of it to mention it to Secretary Delano or pay any attention to it, and that he would return them to John Delano. That is my impression now, although I would not like to be positive.

Q. Did you and the President look over the papers together?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see them?—A. No, sir; never have seen them since they were stolen from my desk.

Q. Did you ask him to let you look at them?—A. I cannot be positive. Something was said about the papers.

Q. If you did, he refused to show them to you, did he?—A. If I did ask him that, I think he declined—I remember the remark he made that he would hand them back to John Delano. I told him one of them was a private letter, or a semi-official letter to me, and I did not think that ought to be floating about, because it would be misunderstood or misrepresented among strangers.

Q. These papers were sent by your clerk to Ex-Governor Campbell and by him given to Secretary Bristow?—A. That is what I heard; that was the understanding.

Q. And by Secretary Bristow given to the President?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How is it, then, that they belong to John Delano?—A. Because that was his letter, and the other was his canceled draft.

Q. To whom was the letter addressed?—A. To me, sir.

Q. By whom was the draft drawn?—A. It was drawn in Mr. Delano's name, by our bank.

Q. The draft had been paid, had it not?—A. Yes; and came back to the bank.

Q. Then, if it was John Delano's letter to you, and it was a draft to John Delano which had been paid, how did the papers belong to John Delano?—A. The canceled draft belonged to our bank, really, I suppose.

Q. The letter belonged to you, did it not?—A. Strictly speaking, the letter belonged to me.

Q. Still, you say the president said he would hand them to John Delano because they belonged to him?—A. Well, John Delano wrote it to me. I do not know what he thought about it. My thought in saying they belonged to John Delano was that he seemed to me the most rightful owner, after they were out of the hands of our bank, and my office.

Q. You knew the papers did not belong to John Delano?—A. Well, strictly speaking, I may say the letter belonged to me, and the canceled draft to our bank.

Q. When the President then said to you that they belonged to John Delano, and he would return them to him, did you correct him?—A. He did not make that remark, that they belonged to Delano—did not say that.

Q. You said the President said the papers belonged to John Delano, and he would return them to him.—A. Well, I am giving my recollection as near as I can. I know very well he said he would return them to John Delano, but whether he used the remark that they belonged to John Delano, I cannot say. At first blush it seemed to me they belonged to John Delano.

Q. There were other papers besides this letter to you and this draft?—A. I do not know, sir.

Q. Were there not some notes among these papers?—A. No; I do not think there were.

Q. Were there not some checks?—A. I do not know of any. There were checks, probably, passed, but I do not know of any checks in the hands of the President. If there were checks, they were stolen out of our bank. I have not discovered them missing yet, nor hunted for them.

Q. The only papers that you knew of, then, were John Delano's letter addressed to you, and this draft?—A. Yes. Well, I remember they spoke of checks.

Q. Who spoke of checks?—A. Well, the parties who were discussing this thing at that time.

Q. Who were they?—A. I heard them talk around the newspaper offices up there. I think Boynton spoke of them as checks in his telegram. I speak now only my impression.

Q. To the Cincinnati Gazette?—A. One, I think, to the Cincinnati Gazette, and one to the Saint Louis Democrat, and one to the Chicago Tribune.

Q. Was that the only means you had of knowing there were notes and checks among these papers?—A. Yes. I have never seen them since they have been here.

Q. The only information you had on that subject is what you saw in the newspapers?—A. I derived it in that way and in conversation.

Q. With whom was this conversation?—A. I talked with several here. I know that John Delano told me he had inquired into it pretty thoroughly, and that this canceled draft had come here, and some of his letters had come here, and checks.

Q. Did not say anything about notes?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did John Delano tell you where he got his information, or from whom he got it?—A. I do not remember now that he did. I know he said Stevens was here, and he brought down these papers from Cheyenne, and they had been given to Campbell, and Campbell had given them to Bristow, and Bristow to the President. I asked the President who gave them to him. He would not tell me; but I found out it was Bristow who took them up, and that tallied with Boynton's flash telegram of 19th or 20th of April.

Q. Who told you that Bristow had taken them to the President?—A. John Delano, for one. I remember this distinctly. I do not know that I could name any others now. I know it was talked around in the circle of my acquaintance here in the city.

Q. Did John Delano tell you that he had had an interview with the President in relation to the papers?—A. I do not remember that he did.

Q. I wish you would try and remember whether or not he told you he had had an interview with the President in relation to this matter.—A. Well, I do not remember whether he did or not, and still I would not be surprised if he told me he got this information from the President. I will not be positive now.

Q. You think he told you that?—A. Well, I will not say that I even think so; but since you recall my mind to it, I am rather under the impression that he said he had seen the President and talked with the President; but I am not positive at all on that point.

Q. Do you remember whether he told you that the President had sent for him?—A. No; I do not believe he did. I do not remember anything of that kind. Some papers stated so, I think.

Q. But you think he did tell you that he had had an interview with the President about the papers?—A. I say I think he may have told me that. My mind is not clear about that, or what he said about that. I know he had the impression that Stevens was here—must be here; and when I came in on the evening of the 28th of April, 1875, and met him, I did not know that there was anything going on in this line until I met him at his hotel.

Q. You say you telegraphed on the 29th of April, removing Mr. Stevens?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you appoint his successor immediately?—A. Yes; I appointed a man to take charge of the office until I got there.

Q. Who was that?—A. One of my deputies, who had been chief clerk before Stevens.

Q. What was his name?—A. Charles J. Reed, of Iowa.

Q. Is he a relative of yours?—A. Yes, sir; a nephew of mine. He had been chief clerk a couple of years when I first went up there.

Q. Did you re-instate Stevens?—A. No, sir; I do not think I did.

Q. You know whether you did or not?—A. I know that I did not.

Q. Did you get possession of these papers afterward?—A. What papers?

Q. The papers that were in the hands of the President?—A. No, sir.

Q. You never saw the papers after they left your office in Cheyenne?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know who got them from the President?—A. No, sir.

Q. All you know about it is the President told you he would return them to John Delano?—A. That is what I understood him.

Q. You knew the papers belonged to you, but you were perfectly willing that they should be in the hands of John Delano?—A. I did not say that.

Q. You made no objection to the President returning them to John Delano?—A. I did not want to parley with the President about it, for he did not think them of moment enough to inquire of the Delanos about it. I did not think much about it, or care much about it, one way or the other. I did not trouble myself particularly about it.

Q. You do not know what became of the papers?—A. No, sir; only what I read.

Q. Was there among these papers a letter from ex-Secretary Delano to you?—A. I do not know whether there was or not. I read of a letter described by Stevens, and I went to Mr. Stevens last summer, and charged him with taking it from my desk, and he said he had not the letter. I said, "Have you that letter? I cannot find it—the letter Mr. Delano wrote me in October, alluding to this matter;" and he said no, but he had seen it, and remembered its contents. That is what he told me last summer. I asked him how he got John Delano's letter to me. I said, "You purloined that out of my desk." He said, "No," I had handed it to him and he had kept it. I knew better; I denied the truth of his statement.

Q. Did you go to him and ask him to return the letter from Ex-Secretary Delano to you?—A. I forget whether I asked him to return it. I went and asked him about that, and some other things.

Q. You say you went to him and asked him for the letter from Ex-Secretary Delano to you?—A. I asked him if he had taken that letter out of my desk, and he said no. I said, "I think you have; I saw it referred to in these telegrams in the matter furnished by you," and he said he had only looked at the letter and remembered it. Well, I have not been able to find the letter since, and I think he purloined it, the same as he did the John Delano letter.

Q. The date of that letter was October, 1874?—A. Yes, I think it was.

Q. What was the subject of the letter?—A. Well, I could not repeat the letter. It was in regard to something I wrote him. I may have spoken to Mr. Delano of John's having an interest in a contract which would meet his expenses. I do not remember just what I wrote.

Q. You think you mentioned to him the fact that he had an interest in a contract that would meet his expenses?—A. Yes, something to that effect. In his reply he thanked me for my kindness toward John in a general way.

Q. What was the word—"kindness" or "liberality"?—A. I should say "kindness;" I do not think there was any "liberality" stated about it—in his letter or mine.

Q. Was it kindness or favor?—A. Well, it may have been favor or kindness. One of those words; the latter, I believe.

Q. What was this kindness or favor that the Ex-Secretary alluded to?—A. It was in regard to whatever I said to him. He hoped I would be careful not to do anything that would look like compromising him or his Department in any way.

Q. He advised you to be careful?—A. Yes, something to that effect. I could not repeat the language. That was the first he knew anything about this, as far as I know, that I had connected John Delano in a contract the spring before.

Q. When did John Delano arrive in Wyoming Territory?—A. He did not get there until July, 1874.

Q. How long did he remain?—A. Well, he remained some time; went over the Territory with me, and went to Utah with me, and around over the mountains a good deal. He went to the Colorado Mountains also.

Q. When did he return to Washington?—A. I do not think he returned to Washington until the following January, as far as I know.

Q. In how many contracts did Mr. Delano have an interest?—A. Well, I do not think I could repeat them without reflection; have no memorandum with me.

Q. Repeat some of them.—A. Three or four contracts. They were very small contracts, the most of them, except the first one, and that was as small as the usual season contracts.

Q. What was the first contract for?—A. Surveying public lands.

Q. Township lines?—A. Some township lines, and some section lines.

Q. What was the amount of that contract?—A. It was about $4,000.

Q. Who was the contractor?—A. One of my deputies by the name of Hammond was the contractor.

Q. What was his first name?—A. He signs his name J. Wesley Hammond.

Q. Where does he live?—A. He lives in Cheyenne.

Q. Has he a contract at the present time?—A. No, sir.

Q. What was John Delano's interest in that contract?—A. It was a half interest.

Q. Then he realized over two thousand dollars from that contract?—A. No, sir; he did not. When I say "half interest," I mean half of the proceeds after paying his half of all expenses, and paying the deputy for surveying his portion of it, at the rate of $125 per month, for his individual service.

Q. What was the amount of profits that he realized from it?—A. He realized about $1,100—a fraction one way or the other.

Q. Mention one other contract in which he had an interest.—A. Do you mean to whom the contract was given?

Q. Yes; to whom was the contract given?—A. There were some small contracts given to some of the deputies; three or four small contracts. This contract that I speak of now, of Mr. Hammond's, was given early in the spring, in May, 1874, so that he might get to the field very early. It was given out of the appropriation of the year previous, an old balance of appropriation, with a view to get them to the field early, and that was all I could give them at that time in that way. There was no secret in my office and among my deputies that I had set aside a certain amount of work for John Delano, and that he should come and do it, or furnish a good man to go in partnership with him, a man that I knew was a reliable, experienced, and honest deputy. When they found out my purpose of giving him a contract, and that he might suggest some man abroad and want to have me adopt him as a partner of his, they remonstrated against introducing more new men into the office. I had a good many deputies, and they did not want any new ones to be introduced. Well, they proposed that they would prefer to do this work, and work it upon shares for Mr. Delano, as his partners, on the same principle as though they were all in the field together. Mr. Delano's name would have been in the contract if he had been there, but he could not get out there in time. He started out, and his wife took sick, came near dying, and when she got better in June, he took her to the White Mountains, and then he came out there; but in the mean time the deputies could not wait, and they wanted to go forward, and they preferred to have their names put in alone and not wait for Mr. Delano. Mr. Delano seemed to think I could put his name or somebody else's name in. He did not understand the regulations of the Department. I could not put in a party's name who was not there, and make affidavit, and to sign his name to the contract. I gave all those deputies other separate contracts, and this contract that I awarded to John Delano, it was divided up into small parts around among them.

Q. John Delano's name did not appear in any of the contracts?—A. No, sir.

Q. It has not been your habit to give contracts to persons who were not practical surveyors?—A. Yes, sir, I have, but put a practical surveyor with them, and that is often done.

Q. Did you ever do that to any person except John Delano?—A. Why, yes, to several.

Q. You did award a contract to a person other than John Delano who was not a practical surveyor?—A. Yes, sir; I put any man's name in whom I wanted to introduce into the service, but united him with a good, experienced surveyor.

Q. So far as a contract was concerned, you never did?—A. I awarded a man a certain amount of work to do, sometimes not a practical surveyor, and I selected a good deputy to go in with him, or if he selected one that I thought was perfectly competent I approved him. That is done by all surveyor-generals.

Q. You say you have awarded contracts to persons who were not practical surveyors. Did you put a practical surveyor with them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did the papers show that any other person besides John Delano had a contract who was not a practical surveyor?—A. Well, if I understand you, I say no, sir. The papers did not show the practical from the non-practical deputy.

Q. So far as the papers showed, then, the contract was always with a deputy?—A. Always with my old deputies, as the only party named in the contract.

Q. But, in fact, it was with some other person?—A. In fact another person had an interest as a partner in the work set apart to him by me.

Q. The contract was made with some other person and the deputy simply appeared in the papers?—A. No; the contract was written in the name of the deputy who performed the work. The contract of so much surveying was awarded to another party, and these deputies took it as partners in equal profits, and had the contracts made in their names, only in the case of John Delano, and they worked it up and divided the profits, after paying all expenses and paying themselves for their work, as deputies on his half, at the rate of $125 a month.

Q. What other persons besides John Delano had interests in these contracts?—A. The men whose names would appear in the contract—my old deputy, Mr. Hays; and Mr. Thomas, I think, is another.

Q. Mr. Thomas had an interest in a contract?—A. Yes; he was surveying all summer for himself first.

Q. What other people had interests in these contracts who were not practical surveyors, besides John Delano?—A. Nobody.

Q. Then you take back what you said awhile ago?—A. You are speaking of contracts of 1874. You asked me if I ever put anybody into a contract that was not a practical surveyor. I told you I had.

Q. Well, tell me who.—A. The two Downeys, of Laramie City, in 1870, after acting awhile as learners to old deputies. I took deputies with me when I went there. I had been an old surveyor-general, and I took with me from Missouri those whose honesty I could trust in the spring of 1870, and I kept them with me all the time, so that my surveys on the ground are particularly represented by the notes. The corners are there, too.

Q. What other persons besides the two Downeys and John Delano had interests in these contracts?—A. This I now refer to was away back in the beginning of my administration. The Downeys' names were in their contracts. I had to drill men who were not thorough surveyors at that time—work them in with old surveyors. I had to use the solar compass in all cases, and it took a good deal of practice to learn the use of it. The Downeys were contractors.

Q. Do you mean to say that surveyors were so scarce at that time that you had to teach men the art of surveying?—A. No, sir; perhaps not.

Q. What do you mean?—A. I wanted to take in some men whose honor and honesty and fidelity I had confidence in, and I educated some of them to the business there; and I did the same thing when I was surveyor-general of Illinois and Missouri, and four deputies became surveyor-generals afterward.

Q. Then it was part of your business as surveyor-general of Wyoming to educate people in the art of surveying?—A. Not alone. I put them with other men.

Q. Why did you put such men in when you could have practical surveyors in the first instance?—A. I did not know who I could trust.

Q. Did you award contracts, then, to men who were not practical surveyors simply because you feared you could not trust those who were practical surveyors?—A. I do not pretend to say I awarded a contract to a man who was not a practical surveyor, unless he was in partnership with a man who was a practical surveyor. He would go with him.

Q. In making out the papers of these contracts, did you ever insert the name of a person who was not a practical surveyor?—A. Why, yes; certainly I have; that is a common thing.

Q. Now, to whom did you award a contract who was not a practical surveyor?—A. Well, sir, the very first or second contract I gave to an old deputy who came up from Kansas, and represented himself to be an old surveyor.

Q. He was a surveyor?—A. He had been a surveyor.

Q. You have stated that you awarded contracts to persons who were not surveyors?—A. Well, I put with him Captain Windsor, an assistant railroad engineer.

Q. Was the contract made out in the name of Captain Windsor, or in the name of this surveyor?—A. In the name of both of them.

Q. To what other persons did you award contracts who were not practical surveyors?—A. Well, I made a great many contracts, and it is pretty hard for me to keep the run of all in my mind now. I know I put in the two Downeys, living in Laramie City, who were surveyors, but not United States contractors before, and they surveyed a good deal since.

Q. Were those contracts made out in the name of the Downeys?—A. They were made out in the name of the Downeys, but I made them go out one season with some of the deputies, before I gave them a contract, to learn the practical part of United States surveying.

Q. You sent them out one season to learn the art of surveying, and then next season you gave them a contract?—A. Well, that is about it. I took them into the business because they were there, and urged upon me by the Laramie people.

Q. Were they able to learn the art of surveying in a few months?—A. Yes; an educated man who gives his attention to it, can learn how to do it in six months, or even two months, if very industrious.

Q. You have told us that Mr. John Delano's interest in the first contract was one-half. What was his interest in the next contract, and with whom was it made?—A. Mr. Hay had a small contract.

Q. What was that contract for?—A. That was for surveying.

Q. How much?—A. Well, I cannot be positive about that. My impression is that it was about $1,800—three townships; that is as near to it as I remember.

Q. How much a mile?—A. Ten dollars a mile for section work.

Q. That is the maximum sum, is it not?—A. Yes, for sectionizing; that is what the law allows.

Q. What was Mr. Delano's interest in that?—A. One-half the profit of it; whatever was made over expenses.

Q. Do you know what the profits were?—A. No, I do not know.

Q. In what other contract did he have an interest?—A. He had one of about the same amount with John B. Thomas.

Q. Was that for surveying township lines?—A. I think so.

Q. How many?—A. About three townships; not less than that; might have been a trifle over; there would be a fraction of a township sometimes.

Q. Ten dollars a mile?—A. Yes; there might be three townships, and a fraction, as sometimes was the case.

Q. That contract was let at $10 a mile?—A. Ten dollars a mile.

Q. All let at the maximum sum?—A. Yes; I always let them at that during the six seasons I was there.

Q. Mr. John Delano was interested in the contract awarded to Mr. Thomas?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know what that amounted to?—A. No; I did not pay any attention to the outlay of any of them but the first one. Mr. Hammond brought me his account, and he told me what it cost, and the profits arising to both.

Q. You think the contract amounted to $1,800 with Thomas?—A. Yes, that was about it; might have varied a little from that.

Q. Does not the surveying of three townships at $10 a mile, amount to more than $1,800?—A. No, sir; That was the uniform price I paid during the six seasons there. It is generally very broken ground in the mountains; most of the surveying there was on the mountains.

Q. What is the length of all the lines surveyed in three townships?—A. Sixty miles to each township, if the township is just six miles square. If it is a little less or more, as it is when you come up against the standard lines, it would overrun or underrun; but away from the standard lines it is six miles square, and that gives sixty miles of surveying, and at $10 a mile it makes $600, and three times $600 would be $1,800.

Q. These were adjoining townships?—A. Yes, generally; the contracts show that for themselves.

Q. Was it necessary to run over the lines into the adjoining township?—A. They surveyed each township by itself. They would not go over the line until they had surveyed the township.

Q. Then they surveyed the lines adjoining townships twice?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. ANDERSON:

Q. Were you sectionizing the township in surveying it?—A. Yes; inside the township boundaries.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. There is sixty miles of lineal measurement in a township?—A. Yes; but that does not include the boundary lines. They are surveyed before. This is what is called sectionizing. It is not often that the same deputies who sectionize survey the boundaries. They are let in separate contracts. It is a sort of a check, one upon the other.

Q. Mention the next contract in which John Delano had an interest.—A. Well, there was one of the same amount with Mr. Alfred N. Rogers.

Q. Was his contract to survey townships, too?—A. Yes, sir; that is my recollection.

Q. He is a practical surveyor, is he?—A. He surveyed there for six years.

Q. And Mr. Delano's interest in his contract was the same as in the other contracts—one-half?—A. Yes.

Q. And he realized from it about $900, you think?—A. O, no. When townships are fair, and not too broken or too rocky, they can save in the neighborhood of half. Now, if they save half in surveying out an $1,800 contract, it costs $900 or more to survey it, (and it is very expensive to survey there,) there is $900 left, and that is to be divided between the two parties; but the deputy is to have his pay in addition; they charge $125 a month for the partner's half.

Q. In what other contract did Mr. Delano have an interest?—A. He had an interest in another small one with Mr. Reed, former chief clerk of mine.

Q. What was that contract for?—A. I cannot be positive whether that was $1,800 or not. It seems to me he had four townships, but I cannot be positive about that. If I remember rightly, he did not survey one of the townships that was in his contract. I think he left one out. I cannot be very positive on that score. I think there was one he did not survey; got out too late in the season, perhaps. It was $1,800, I think.

Q. Did he have an interest in any other contract?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did not these deputy surveyors execute notes payable to Mr. John Delano, or to some other person for him, before they entered upon the work?—A. No, sir.

Q. How was John Delano paid?—A. He was paid by the deputies after the contracts were surveyed, and after the work was brought into the office, and the plats made out, and the field-notes copied. It takes three or four months after the deputy comes in from the field, sometimes, to get the accounts to Washington for settlement at the General Land-Office.

Q. The money was drawn in the name of a deputy?—A. Yes; always is.

Q. John Delano's name never appeared in the contract, or in any papers connected with it?—A. No, sir.

Q. And you say there were no notes executed by these deputy surveyors?—A. Hammond made some note about it, but the note was not before he went out; it was after he came in.

Q. Was it at that time?—A. Yes; after the accounts and cost of survey were known.

Q. These notes were payable to John Delano?—A. Well, I do not remember as to that; I think not, however. They were not given to him, nor sent away from the office.

Q. They were executed for John Delano's use?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Before the draft was drawn for the surveys?—A. When they found out what the profit would be between them, then they made some memoranda of it. They could not find out what the profit would be until they had finished the work and got back to the office. Most of them surveyed that year 400 miles distant, and they would come in late in the fall and have their notes examined and their plats made out—three plats for each township—those notes all copied to come along with the plats to the Land-Office, and the account to come with each, approved by the surveyor-general. Then when they had examined it here, after a month a draft would issue and go to them. But when this amount was made up, then they, by calculating their expenditures and time that they themselves had been surveying, and taking them out of the sum-total, they knew what the balance was, and what they must divide among them.

Q. What was your share of the profits of the surveys?—A. Well, I decline to answer such a question as that, sir.

Q. I think you must answer.—A. No, sir; I do not think it is a proper question to ask me, if I may be allowed to say it.

Q. Well, sir, you are not to be the judge of that. You were an officer of the United States—a surveyor-general. You will have to answer unless you say it would criminate you.—A. No, sir; I say it would not criminate me. I say it is an insulting question. And I say that no living man can say I ever received a dollar.

Q. Do you say the answer will not criminate you?—A. Yes; I do.

Q. Then we ask you to answer the question.—A. Then I say no dollar came to me.

Q. You received no portion of the profits of these contracts?—A. No, sir.

Q. Neither directly nor indirectly?—A. No, sir; not that I know of.

Q. Not that you know of?—A. Not that I remember of.

Q. You certainly would remember whether you did or did not receive any portion of the profits of the surveys, either directly or indirectly.—A. Yes; I remember very distinctly that I did not.

Q. You say, then, upon your oath that you received no portion of the profits of these contracts, either directly or indirectly?—A. I am not conscious of receiving anything, sir.

Q. Among the papers that you say Mr. Stevens stole from your desk, there is a draft, I believe.—A. No, sir.

Q. Was it a check?—A. No, sir.

Q. What were those papers besides the letter from Secretary Delano to you?—A. Nothing but letters, that I know of.

Q. Was there more than one letter?—A. I don't know. I have seen one in print that Mr.

John Delano sent to me ; I have seen it copied and represented as being a letter to me, but whether it is a true copy, I don't know.

Q. Who has that ?—A. I don't know who has it.

Q. Who showed it to you ?—A. I have seen only a copy of it in the paper.

Q. What paper ?—A. Well, I saw it in the New York Tribune, I think, and in a little paper published in Wyoming since I came away from there—I believe I have it with me—a statement purporting to have been made by Mr. Stevens to Mr. Boynton, and Mr. Boynton telegraphed it all over the country. It is a statement that, while there is some little shadow of truth in it, the greater part of it is a lie, as stated.

The letter, which is marked Exhibit B, reads as follows :

“INTERIOR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, D. C., May 26, 1874.

“DEAR GENERAL : I have been detained by my wife's illness, but hope at last to get off to Saint Paul by Monday, and to reach Cheyenne in June. I shall have to return here by the last of June on my wife's account, but shall go back West for the summer and fall.

“Hope you will be able to put Merriam (I think it had better be in his name) into a good contract for me. I shall sadly need the profits for my summer's outlay—out of office, sick, unable to attend to my own affairs, runs me behind a good deal. Thanks for your kind letter.

“Yours, truly,

“J. S. DELANO.”

The WITNESS. I don't know whether that letter is a copy. That is about the substance of one of the letters.

Q. Is that the letter that was forwarded to Secretary Bristow ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Among the papers forwarded to Washington, was there not a letter from Ex-Secretary Delano to you ?—A. I don't know. Mr. Stevens said he did not take it ; but I think he has got it.

Q. Did you ever have any communication, either oral or in writing, with Ex-Secretary Delano in relation to these contracts ?—A. No, sir ; except the little allusion that might have been made in the letter of October, 1874.

Q. The Ex-Secretary was aware of the fact that John Delano was interested in these contracts, was he not ?—A. I don't think he was until the fall.

Q. Yet he alluded to the fact of your kindness toward John ?—A. I had referred to the contract, probably, in some way in October, when I wrote to him casually.

Q. In your letter to the Secretary ?—A. Yes, sir ; I did not keep any copy. Nothing. That is the first he knew anything about it, so far as I know.

Q. You informed the Secretary in October, 1874, that you had taken John into a number of contracts in surveying land in the Territory ?—A. No, sir ; not any such thing.

Q. What do you mean, then, by saying you alluded to it in your letter to the Secretary in October ?—A. I alluded to it as his having an interest in the contracts, or a contract there.

Q. To John's interest in the contracts there ?—A. Yes, sir ; his having an interest there which would bear his expenses. He was still in the mountains then.

Q. And in reply to that letter he thanked you for your kindness, liberality, or favor toward John ?—A. Yes, sir ; for kindness.

Q. In the interview between yourself and the President, did you make known to the President that John had interests in certain contracts ?—A. I did tell him so, and I can tell you his reply. Do you want to hear it ?

Q. Yes ; we will hear it.—A. I told him Mr. John Delano had been interested in some small contracts there. They were all small—every one of them—made so in order to divide his work up among those who wanted it ; and I said, “I suppose you understand, Mr. President, that John is a private citizen, not in any office, and that there could be no objection to my using him in a contract of surveying ;” and he said, “Certainly not ; Mr. John Delano had as much right to have a contract as any other private citizen.”

By Mr. BOONE :

Q. Do you know for what purpose John Delano went to Wyoming ?—A. Yes, sir ; I suppose I do. He went in compliance with my invitation to go to the mountains for his health. That was the grand purpose. I had been urging it upon him for several months. I first suggested it to the Commissioner of the General-Land Office, in February, 1874. I don't think John was here then. I think he was in Minnesota. The Commissioner told me he had been there nearly a year, and was not improving any in his lung-complaint, and I said to the Commissioner I thought he ought to come to the Rocky Mountains and he would improve, very probably, and get well, if he would come there and spend a season, and I asked Commissioner Drummond if there would be any impropriety in my giving the son of the Secretary a contract of surveying in order that he might derive benefit enough to bear his expenses, and he said it would be entirely proper, and thought well of it, and advised me to give him a contract. One question was, at that time, as to whether I should use his name in the contract. I didn't know but if the public came to see his name there it would become a matter of scandal and be misrepresented, and ought to be avoided if it could; and he said, "No; I would not care for that. He has as much right to have a contract as anybody. He is sick, and if you think it would benefit him, give him a contract; put his name in, and put a good, experienced, honest deputy with him."

Q. That conversation took place here in Washington with Mr. Drummond?—A. Yes, sir. I think in February, 1874.

Q. Did you consult the Secretary about inviting him out there before you left the city?—A. I did not consult him about giving John any contract.

Q. Did you consult Secretary Delano about inviting his son to go out to Wyoming?—A. No. I had some conversation with the Secretary in regard to the condition of his son, then in Minnesota, and I had the year before, when he was sick and went off to Texas; and I was here when he went off to Texas and when he came back, and I said he ought to go to the mountains. I urged upon John, in all my conversations with him, to go to the mountains. That was in May and June, 1873.

Q. Did you talk with the Secretary after that in regard to it?—A. I talked about his going to the mountains.

Q. Did he agree he might go?—A. No, sir; nor object.

Q. Did you tell the Secretary you would give him an interest in these contracts?—A. No. I did not know that he knew anything about it until it was all over. Some time in the fall of 1874 there was some allusion about it by myself, and then he replied to it in this letter spoken of. He did not know it through me that his son was to have a contract or any interest in the contracts whatever.

Q. You talked with the Commissioner of the Land-Office about giving him a contract. Did you not make known the same intention to the Secretary of the Interior?—A. I did not.

Q. Was it understood with John before he went out there that he was to have an interest in contracts?—A. Yes, sir; I used it as an argument to get him there.

Q. Why were you so anxious to have him out there?—A. I felt friendly to him and the Secretary. He was the only son of Secretary Delano, and I knew he felt very anxious about him. I knew I had lost my only son, and how I felt under the circumstances. I knew that he was in great danger of dying, for I am a physician, and it was a kind of a contest between his New York doctor and myself as to whether he should go farther than Minnesota. I said, "Go to the mountains." He said he would bleed to death as soon as he got there. I said he would do no such thing; and I rode with him on the mountains 11,000 feet high, and there was no bleeding from his lungs, and it cured him.

Q. In the conversation you had with Mr. Drummond in reference to his having an interest in these contracts, you say the question was canvassed as to whether his name should appear?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you agreed there was no impropriety in it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I understood you that in no contract that was made was his name mentioned?—A. It was not, because we could not get him there in time to have it inserted. He must sign it himself, and he must swear the iron-clad oath, and give bonds and all that sort of thing, to have his name in the contract.

Q. Were all these contracts that he was interested in made before he got there?—A. I cannot be positive about that.

Q. If they were not, why was not his name inserted?—A. Mr. Hammond's was made in May, and he did not get there until June or July. I don't remember about the others. I am trying to refresh my memory.

Q. I understand you to state that some of these contracts were made after John Delano got out there. Now I want to know why it was that John's name was not put in those contracts if they were made after he got there?—A. It depends on when they were made. If they were made near the end of August or fore part of September, I think John had gone over into the Colorado Mountains with Professor Hayden.

Q. Well, your answer is that all these contracts were made in his absence?—A. As a matter of course, or his name would have gone into them.

Q. Then he had nothing to do with the making of the contracts. You just made such contracts for him as you chose, and considered him interested or not, as you chose, and to such an amount as you pleased?—A. These contracts were made with the old deputies, and they divided up as they pleased. It was work I originally awarded to John Delano, to be surveyed in partnership by good deputies.

Q. And they were made in his absence and without his knowledge?—A. I was urging him in May to come on and sign a contract. He wrote that letter that you see there.

Q. I wish you would answer the question. I asked you whether or not these contracts were all made in the absence of John Delano and without his knowledge, and such interests were given in the contracts to him as you chose, without consulting him?—A. That is a pretty mixed up long question to answer.

Q. I will ask it a little at a time. I ask you, first, whether or not all these contracts were made in his absence?—A. Yes; they were signed and dated when he was not present.

Q. Was he consulted, and did he know the interest he was to have in any of them?—A. I let him know about the amount that I had set apart for him, in May, 1874.

Q. You set it apart for him?—A. Yes, sir; I set it apart for him; it was my prerogative.

Q. Then you did not consult him as to whether he would perform the work and take the interest in the contract or not?—A. Well, I don't know how to answer that.

Q. I understand, as you do, that it takes two to make a contract, and if John Delano made a contract I suppose he would know something about what he was to do and what he was to get. I ask whether, in making these contracts, you consulted him as to what amount of work he was to do, and what amount of interest he was to have, or whether you awarded the contract to him, and to a deputy surveyor, and gave him such interest in it as you thought proper?—A. The matter was talked over with him before the contract was made. I offered it and he expected it.

Q. Why did he not sign it?—A. He was not there. I have explained that.

Q. Why did he not sign, then, when you talked it over and agreed?—A. Well, he was not there. It was done mostly by correspondence. I don't remember that he was here in 1874, when I was proposing to do this, to Colonel Drummond. I think he was in Minnesota, and I proposed to correspond with him there.

Q. He did go out to Wyoming before some of these contracts were made?—A. Yes; some of those small ones. He came out and did not come there until after the first one was made.

Q. He was there before the others were made?—A. Yes, sir; but not in Wyoming—in the Colorado Mountains.

Q. Then I still press the question, why it was that John Delano did not sign the contracts and his name did not appear in them?—A. There was no good reason. I might have had him go into the office and sign the contracts there and then send them to the deputies in the field in Western Wyoming, but I did not know then what amount each one wished to survey.

Q. Were those contracts in writing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is the form of one of them in substance, if you please?—A. Well, it is pretty hard to explain.

Q. I ask you whether or not the contract does not specify that certain gentlemen by name have made a certain contract to do a certain amount of surveying, for which they are to get so much?—A. Exactly so.

Q. In making that recitation in the body of the contract, is it anywhere expressed that John Delano is to get any part of it?—A. No, sir.

Q. It did not require his presence to make that recitation in the contract?—A. No; but it would require to sign it, if his name were in it.

Q. Why was not his name recited in any contract that he was to get a certain portion of the proceeds?—A. No particular reason that I know of, except that he was not there to sign in due time, and such recitation could not be made unless he signed.

Q. Now I will ask you whether it was not purposely avoided, in order to keep John Delano's name out of these contracts so that there might be no reflection upon the Secretary?—A. No, sir; I have no such recollection at all, because Mr. Drummond said there could be no objection to putting his name in the contract, or of his being a partner in one.

Q. You say you did not do it; why did you not?—A. In the first place we could not get him there, and then when he did come the latter part of July he did not stay in Wyoming, up to the time I think that those small ones were given; and the deputies disliked the trouble of using his name—he not living there.

Q. Still you did not recite in any contract that he was to get a part of the proceeds, and that would not require his presence. Why was that left out?—A. There was no design about it, except that it would require his presence often if his name went into the written contract.

By Mr. WOODWORTH:

Q. Those contracts mention the contracting parties. You were one of them as agent of the General Land-Office, and the other parties would be the men who were to do the work?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The recitations would contain no statement of any benefit to be derived except by the contracting parties?—A. No, sir.

Q. That is the reason why John Delano should not appear if he was not there to sign the contract. Is that the way we understand it?—A. Yes, sir; I could not put his name in if he were not there to sign all papers and take all the oaths.

Q. He was not a contracting party, but simply there was an outside understanding between you and John Delano that he was to share in the profits?—A. Yes, sir; I told him at the outset how many townships I would give him—how much work—and he might select a good, experienced man to go in the work with him, and I would put that man's name in the contract, and then if he did not keep with his deputy all the time he could put another man in his place to assist that deputy, or pay that deputy for the extra work himself.

Q. But his name could not appear in the contract unless he was one of the contracting parties, and he was not one of the contracting parties so far as the contracts were concerned?—A. That is so, so far as his name not being in the written instrument.

Q. You have known John Delano how long?—A. Five or six years.

Q. You are a physician, you said?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When were you appointed surveyor-general of Wyoming?—A. In March, 1869, first.

Q. Did you know him previously to that time?—A. No, sir.

Q. You became acquainted with him after you were appointed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You may state to the committee what other similar positions you had occupied before that time.—A. I have been surveyor-general of Illinois and Missouri, appointed by the President of the United States.

Q. By the President?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State to the committee whether it is or is not usual, in letting contracts for the survey of lands, to include parties who are not practical surveyors; and, if so, you may state if there is any reason why it should be done, because of responsibility or otherwise.—A. It is done sometimes by the surveyor-general for some deserving man, and sometimes for political considerations. It is a common practice.

Q. Is it necessary to have a responsible man?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And if the contract was let to two persons they would both be responsible for any mistake or failure?—A. Yes, sir; both had to be on hand to sign all papers, and they have got to certify to the field-notes, and to sign the accounts.

Q. So that while you might get a surveyor with skill, you might not be certain as to his entire responsibility, and might want to unite with him a person who was responsible otherwise?—A. That was the case with this first contract that I mentioned—this man from Laramie City, who represented himself to be a competent surveyor, and who turned out to be the greatest cheat living. I appointed him to please the people there, and I put with him Mr. Winsor because I told him I did not trust his honesty, and they both together made the poorest survey I ever had; I had to have it all gone over.

Q. How long was John Delano in the mountains or in Wyoming?—A. I don't remember how much he was there in Wyoming; he went out to the mountains.

Q. I mean engaged in this business of making surveys—engaged in this work?—A. He did not engage in the work. Sometimes he was out in the field, but he hired the deputy to do the work and they charged for their services, on his behalf.

Q. He was there from the 1st of July to January?—A. Yes, sir; if you mean about the mountains and California; in the winter time he was over in California.

Q. Tell the committee the entire amount of profit that John Delano made out of all those contracts put together?—A. I think it was about $2,500. I see it stated there by Mr. Stevens at $5,000, but he does not know what he is talking about.

Q. You made the suggestion to him to go out. And you have already said you have had no conversation with Secretary Delano about it. You made no suggestions to him, or he to you?—A. That is true.

Q. Either by letter or conversation?—A. No; not until October, 1874, after the matter was disposed of.

Q. John Delano had then been discharged, or was not a clerk in the Department?—A. He was not a clerk in the Department.

By Mr. BOONE:

Q. You stated in answer to Mr. Woodworth's question that you had an outside understanding with John Delano as to what he should receive, that was not put in the contract. Now, I want to ask you, did you make any contract with any other person than John Delano that such person was to receive any amount for surveying that you did not put in the contract.—A. I cannot recall the name of any one. I do not think any one received anything—any valuable contract—whose name was not in it.

Q. Why was this exception made in John Delano's case?—A. I thought I had explained that to you. I only spoke of those small contracts. Now, when this gentleman (Mr. Woodworth) comes to ask me about the mode of fixing the contract, it occurs to me that the chief reason was, in not requiring his name in those little contracts, that he was moving about a great deal, and we could not rely upon his being at my office when needed to sign papers—it would mix a multitude of difficulties into it. Unless he staid there for months and months he would not be on hand to sign the papers. If I used his name in the contracts he must come and sign to prepare papers for the General Land-Office, and must be there to sign the field-notes and accounts and everything of that kind.

Q. You have stated that you had an outside understanding with him as to how much he was to receive, and therefore you did not put his name in the contract.—A. No; I did not say that; I did not say "therefore," nor how much profit he was to receive.

Q. You said that was the reason?—A. It was my expectation all along to have his name in the contract.

Q. You state now you expected to have his name in the contract.—A. Yes, I did. I wrote him a letter to hurry up and come over in May.

Q. You made those written contracts in which you recite, as I understand, how each person is interested in it. I want to know whether in any of those contracts it is expressed that John Delano is to receive a part of a certain contract?—A. I say it is not expressed.

Q. Did you ever make a contract in which any person except John Delano was to receive any part of the profits in which you did not put his name?—A. I do not remember that I did.

Q. I ask you why you made an exception in John Delano's case?—A. Because he could not come there at the time specified to make the contract and to get the deputy to the field; he could not get through as he expected; he was delayed by sickness in his family.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you mention to the deputies that of this work they were to do John Delano was to have half of the profits?—A. They understood they were taking work I had allotted to Mr. Delano, and I put their names alone in the contract for convenience. They worked it upon the understanding that it was partnership business, the same as if his name had been in the contract.

Q. Did they give notes for their parts of the profits which were to go to Mr. John Delano?—A. When they came home and the work was fixed up in the office so they could know what it amounted to, and they could state the time they had been surveying, and what the expense of transportation and commissaries and all that sort of thing amounted to, and they could say to a dollar what the profit was, then they, some of them, gave some memorandum—late in the fall before I came away to Washington—they gave some memorandum as to what the share would be, the half of the actual profit.

Q. There was no memorandum of the agreement that they were to pay Mr. John Delano half of the profits at the time, or immediately before or after the time, of the making of the contract?—A. No written understanding that I remember.

Q. Those understandings were all verbal?—A. I think they were; yes, know they were, and voluntary.

Q. There were no notes given to Mr. John Delano, or any person for him, for any portion of the profits of the contract?—A. I said they did give some, a part of them, when they finished.

Q. At the time that they entered into those contracts, or immediately before or subsequent thereto, were there any notes given for a portion of the profits of the contract, to Mr. John Delano, or to any person for his use?—A. I do not remember any such; I know there were none.

Q. And no agreement showed in writing that they should divide the profits with Mr. John Delano, or any one else?—A. No; merely a verbal understanding, and that verbal understanding was carried out and put in the shape of a memorandum when I was coming away to Washington in November, 1874.

Q. When you called upon the President you explained to him the transaction with Mr. John Delano fully?—A. As fully as I could at such limited interview.

Q. And in reply to that the President said he saw nothing in it; you had a perfect right to award a contract to Mr. John Delano as well as any other citizen?—A. Yes; that is the substance of his remark.

Q. What induced you to resign your office?—A. Because I was very anxious to attend to my own affairs, which were suffering for my attention. I staid there two years longer than I ought, and longer than I intended to. I was appointed the second time in February, 1870, and I went out there, and in March, 1873, at the time of the President's inauguration, this ring that is now patching up this difficulty, mystifying and misrepresenting it, came down here and represented me to the President as a great Greeley man, sir, and as having attended Greeley conventions and worked for Greeley, and talked Greeley; and the President supposed my four years were out, looking at his book and referring back to March, 1869, and seeing all our names there, (Wyoming appointees,) and forgetting that he had appointed me a second time, he appointed a man in my place who came out and took possession. I then came down here and told the President I was very much maligned; that these fellows had falsified and misrepresented me, and I satisfied him that I had been his friend all the time, and that there was no cause for my removal, and he put me back again. When I went back I had to fight this ring all the while till I got them pretty well scattered, and then I concluded I might afford to resign. Ex-Governor Campbell was one of them. He came down here and joined his ranks to the Bristow ranks.

Q. Is Secretary Bristow one of the ring that you allude to?—A. Well, he was last spring, 1875; that is to say, they own him as their leader.

Q. And that is the party, with Secretary Bristow at the head of it, that you succeeded finally in dividing?—A. Yes; most all that took any active part in such matters are removed now; but they have held a convention lately in Wyoming and elected delegates to the national convention, and they are all Bristow delegates.

Q. Nearly all the office-holders who stood by Secretary Bristow have been removed?—A. No, not for that reason. They were offensive to the people.

Q. But all that have joined with him have been removed?—A. It was doubtless believed by Ex-Governor Campbell that Mr. Delano and myself got him removed, or urged the President to remove him, and that stirred up all this strife. They bribed this clerk in my office by promising that they could get Delano removed and Dr. Reed, too, and make him surveyor-general.

Q. They did get Delano removed?—A. No, sir; the President told me he would not be removed unless fraud was proved.

Q. He went out shortly after that?—A. No; not until the fall; nearly six months after. They said they were going to have Mr. Delano "step down and out," and the President said he didn't see any reason why he should "step down and out" unless they proved fraud.

Q. It was a contest, then, between Mr. Delano's friends and Secretary Bristow's?—A. Secretary Bristow's special friends proclaimed at Cheyenne in March, 1875, that Mr. Secretary Delano must step down and out within thirty days or he (Bristow) would; but Mr. Secretary Delano said he was not going to do so "under fire," and the President said he ought not to. They sent a commission there to examine alleged Indian frauds, and everybody alleging fraud had a chance to testify. I think nothing serious was found against Mr. Delano.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 8, 1876.

Dr. SILAS REED'S examination continued.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. In the testimony the other day you stated that the contracts in which Mr. John Delano had an interest were given to certain parties who did the surveying, and after deducting the expenses of the survey the profits were divided equally between Mr. Delano and the deputies. Now state whether or not these deputy surveyors were not to do the surveying at a stipulated price per month, and all they got was simply that price, and whether or not John Delano did not get the balance of the money.—Answer. To that I answer, no, sir. I stated in my testimony that the surveyor, whose name was in the contract and did the work, received for half his time pay at the rate of $125 per month.

Q. Did he get anything else except the $125 per month?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did he get in addition to that?—A. I do not know, sir.

Q. Do you mean to say that you deducted, from the amount appropriated, $125 for each month that the surveyor was employed, and then divided the balance equally between the deputy surveyor and Mr. John Delano?—A. I did not deduct anything.

Q. Well, was that done?—A. That was their understanding.

Q. I did not ask you what the understanding was; I want to know what was done.—A. I said I did not know what was done, because I did not get the accounts of them except the first one.

Q. You have told us that, in one contract let to Mr. Hammond, Mr. John Delano's share of profits were $1,100?—A. About $1,100; a trifle over, perhaps.

Q. What was the amount of that contract?—A. I stated the other day about $4,200.

Q. Do you know whether, in that instance, the deputy surveyor first deducted $125 a month for his services and then divided the surplus equally between himself and Mr. John Delano?—A. Yes, sir; I can say that I know that most positively, because he made a memorandum and presented it to me of his whole expense, including hand-hire, supplies, railroad-fares, &c., because he went with all his teams and men on a railroad from Cheyenne to Evanstown, (I think four hundred miles.) That was all included in his memorandum account.

Q. Were there any notes passed between the parties?—A. Not that I know of, sir. I explained the other day that Mr. Hammond, the fall after he had finished his work, came back to the office, made up his account of all expenses, and divided the matter equally between himself and Mr. Delano, his silent partner. He then took a blank form of note of the First National Bank of Cheyenne and filled it out—filled out in that the portion for Mr. Delano.

Q. Was Mr. Delano's share of the profits put in one note?—A. Well, not entirely. I think they were divided into two—one was $1,000 and the other was $400; and in those amounts were included Mr. Delano's advances, which were $250 if not $300.

Q. To whom had he advanced money?—A. Advanced it for Mr. Hammond, or, in other words, Mr. Hammond drew upon him for half the necessary expenses to go to the field. He drew drafts through our national bank there, and the bank gave him the money; that is my recollection of it.

Q. Did Mr. Hammond and Mr. Delano ever meet, that you are aware of, prior to the time of Mr. Hammond's going to the field?—A. I do not know that they did.

Q. Was Mr. Delano out in the Territory at any time prior to the time that he obtained an interest in these different contracts?—A. Prior to what time?

Q. Prior to the time that you gave him an interest in these different contracts?—A. I cannot answer that.

Q. Did you ever meet Mr. Delano in your office in Cheyenne?—A. I cannot be positive about that.

Q. Then you do not know whether he was in your office at all, or whether in the Territory at any time?—A. Certainly; I know he was in the Territory.

Q. You know he was?—A. That he had been in the Territory?

Q. Yes, prior to this time, or about the time that the contracts were let.—A. I explained that fully and thoroughly, that he was not there at the time the contract was written out—did not come afterward, and the reason he did not come was because his wife had got sick on the way and came near dying, and he could not come.

Q. Do you mean to say that Mr. Delano left the city of Washington and was on his way to the Territory prior to the time that you let these contracts?—A. No, sir; about that time.

Q. About the time?—A. I cannot be positive as to the time he left here. I received frequent notes from him during the month of May, about the time I was getting ready to make this contract, and in reply to notes I sent him hurrying him there. This note of his to me that has been published, if it is a correct copy that is published, is dated the latter part of May.

Q. And it is written from the Interior Department, is it not?—A. [Examines the paper.] It seems to be written from the Interior Department. I do not know whether it was written there or not. I suppose so from the fact that it is headed that way, and is postmarked Washington. I do not know what the date is—it is either the 20th or 25th. That letter came to my office at Cheyenne in my absence in Utah. I see on the back of the envelope that I received it June 10; that was the date of my return from Utah. I also received, I think that very day, a telegram from him from Saint Paul asking me to meet him at Omaha. I immediately replied to him at Saint Paul by telegraph that I would meet him at Omaha to consult about this contract. You can see from that letter that we were discussing the matter of the contract and the importance of his being there to have his name inserted. He asks if I cannot use some other name instead.

Q. You say that he telegraphed you to meet him at Omaha to consult about this contract?—A. Yes, sir; that is my recollection.

Q. When was that contract let?—A. Well, I do not remember the date of it.

Q. Look at those notes and see whether it was not let a month earlier than that, [handing papers to witness, who examines them.]—A. These do not show anything about the date that it was let; yes, "May 20," a month before.

Q. Then the truth of the matter is that that contract was let before John Delano wrote you this letter, was it not?—A. Yes; before he wrote that particular letter.

Q. And it is not true that he telegraphed you to meet him at Omaha to talk about this contract?—A. No, sir; I did not say so.

Q. Yes; you did say it.—A. Let me understand you.

Q. You have just said that he telegraphed you to meet him at Omaha to talk about this contract, and now you say that the contract was let before he left Washington as shown by this note and the letter that I have shown you.—A. I do not wish it understood that it was in the telegram that he would meet me to consult about the contract. The telegram was simply to meet me there. It was the other notes that had passed between us that had fixed the matter between us.

Q. What other notes?—A. The short letters.

Q. You have stated that you wrote him hurrying him up to come to the Territory to fix up this contract, and that he replied that his wife was sick on the way and he could not come there in time; now is that true or is it not true?—A. I cannot answer that question without going back.

Q. Yes; you can answer it. It is a plain question. You had already stated that you wrote to Mr. Delano hurrying him up to come out to the Territory, that you wanted to put his name in this contract, and that in reply he told you that his wife was sick, as you expressed it, "on the way," and that he could not get there in time; consequently you were obliged to put the name of some other person in the contract for him.—A. This was probably the third or fourth letter written to me during that month.

Q. Now, I ask you this question, whether or not the contract was let before John Delano left Washington City?—A. It states here that it was let on the 20th of May, but I will explain that that contract was kept open for some two or three weeks, according to my recollection; that it was left blank, so far as the use of his name would be concerned, so that it might be put in if he reached there two or three weeks afterward.

Q. Contractors usually take an oath and file a bond. They are required by law to do that, are they not?—A. Yes.

Q. Did John Delano ever take an oath?—A. No, sir; because his name was not in the contract.

Q. Did you ever require him to file a bond?—A. His name was not in the contract, else he would have been required to take an oath. I have a form of contract with me which I should like to show to the committee.

Q. We do not care about the form, but we want to know whether you did not swear your deputies, and make them take an oath and file a bond.—A. Yes.

Q. You were in the habit, then, of giving contracts to one set of people and compelling another set to take an oath and file a bond?—A. No, sir; I do not remember that in any instance.

Q. Did you not do it in the instance of John Delano?—A. No, sir; he had not any written contract.

Q. If this was an honest transaction, and the contract was really let to John Delano, why were those notes made payable to John L. Merriam?—A. I could not explain now, unless it was by his direction.

Q. Who is John L. Merriam?—A. He is a banker in Saint Paul.

Q. Did he have a contract at that time for surveying?—A. He is a banker in Saint Paul, with whom Delano had a good deal of business, and I was led to believe had to borrow money of him.

Q. You were led to believe that John Delano had to borrow money of Merriam?—A. Of Merriam, occasionally. You must remember that he had been there with Merriam nearly a year previous to this.

Q. Did you think that John Delano owed John L. Merriam money, and that this was the only way Merriam could get it?—A. I do not think I thought anything about it.

Q. Then what do you mean by saying that you were led to believe that Delano owed Merriam money? Did you mean to give that as the reason why you made the notes payable to Merriam?—A. I know of no other reason than his saying that he had business and a good many money transactions with Merriam.

Q. Did not Mr. Delano write you a letter and tell you to insert the name of Mr. Merriam to stand for him?—A. Yes; I see in that letter that he asks that Mr. Merriam's name be used.

Q. And is not that the reason you inserted the name of Merriam, because you were requested to do so—by Delano writing you and requesting to put his name to "stand for my name;" that is, for Delano's name?—A. I wrote that Mr. Delano had requested—

Q. Answer that question, not what you wrote him.—A. I cannot answer that question.

Q. (Question repeated.)—A. That might have been part of my reason.

Q. Was not that your reason?—A. I do not know that it was wholly my reason.

Q. What other reason had you, then?—A. I think that another part of the reason was that he had told me that he had a good many moneyed transactions, and was in arrear—in debt to Mr. Merriam.

Q. Did he tell you that in the letter that he wrote you requesting you to put Merriam's name in the contract?—A. I cannot remember how I obtained the information, but that is the impression in my mind, that he was behindhand in some way with Mr. Merriam.

Q. Now, is not the truth of the matter this, that you put Merriam's name in the notes (as you had put Mr. Hammond's name in the contract) for the purpose of covering up the whole transaction and making it appear that John Delano had no interest in it?—A. I do not believe it was.

Q. You do not believe that was the truth of the matter?—A. No, sir.

Q. Had you not been notified from the Interior Department by John Delano's father in a letter that you received, that you should do nothing that would in any way appear to compromise him?—A. I had not until the fall following.

Q. What fall?—A. The fall of 1874.

Q. Was not this in the fall of 1874?—A. No, sir. This was in May, 1874.

Q. At the time these notes were payable, (they are dated October, 1874, was it in pursuance of this notice which you got from Mr. Delano's father that you should not do anything that would have the appearance of compromising him that you made these notes payable to John L. Merriam?—A. I do not believe it was, sir. I cannot think so, for this reason: that this matter was public in my office from May until the time of giving these notes—that I had set apart some work for Mr. Delano to have surveyed. It was not any secret in my office.

Q. If it was not any secret in your office, where was the necessity, then, of your making these notes payable to Merriam?—A. I do not know of any reason beyond what I have tried to explain.

Q. Do you say that it was not for the purpose of concealing the real transaction?—A. I have never thought it was done to conceal the transaction.

Q. Who in Cheyenne besides yourself and Mr. Stevens and Mr. Merriam and Mr. Hammond know of this transaction?—A. Mr. Merriam was not in Cheyenne.

Q. He was in Saint Paul, then. Who in Saint Paul knew of it?—A. Mr. Hammond and Mr. Stevens and the other chief deputies knew about it.

Q. How many of the chief deputies knew about it?—A. Three or four—half a dozen.

Q. Was it known by anybody else?—A. Well, I was not in the habit of noising over town what was going on in my office.

Q. These other chief deputies who knew of this transaction also shared with Mr. John Delano in the contracts which they had?—A. I have explained that fully.

Q. You said that the other chief deputies knew it—you mean the same deputies that also shared with Delano?—A. Yes.

Q. But you do not know any person outside of those deputies, yourself, and your clerk who knew it, do you?—A. I do not know whether there are or not any other persons knowing it. I had other deputies living at different places. I did not take particular pains to have them know all I was doing in my office.

Q. How much did Mr. John Delano realize out of the contract that was let to Rogers?—A. I do not know the amount that he realized at the time.

Q. Do you know the amount of the contract?—A. I think it was about $1,800.

Q. Did not Mr. John Delano get $900?—A. No, sir.

Q. He did not?—A. No, sir.

Q. How much did he get out of the contract let to H. G. Hay?—A. I cannot state the exact amount.

Q. That was the $2,100 contract, was it not?—A. I could not state the exact amount of the contract. I think that Hay's contract may have amounted to a little over $2,100; perhaps it was $2,100.

Q. Did not Mr. John Delano get $900 out of that contract of Hay's?—A. I do not think he did.

Q. How much did he get?—A. I do not know, because he returned no particular amount about it.

Q. Do you know how much John Delano realized out of the contract given to C. J. Reed?—A. I do not know the exact amount he contributed out of his contract.

Q. Was that not $900?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was it not somewhere near that?—A. I did not charge my mind with the amounts.

Q. What were John Delano's profits out of John P. Thomas's contract?—A. These deputies returned no particular statement to me of the amount of expenses.

Q. Do you not know that Mr. Delano's profits out of John Thomas's contract were $800?—A. Mr. Thomas may have set off that much to him.

Q. Did not you send it yourself?—A. To him?

Q. To Mr. Delano?—A. I do not remember doing it.

Q. Did you write this letter [handing letter to witness dated Washington, January 13, 1875] addressed to L. C. Stevens, signed Silas Reed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Whom do you mean by "John and others," mentioned there?—A. John Thomas, I suppose.

Q. Very well. Now you say "left last night. I have a letter from him to-day, so I will inclose you his check, on which you will leave $200 in bank there to meet four checks of $50 each, in favor of Justum & Park, of Salt Lake City;" and again you say, "the $600 balance of the check you may send to me here by draft, and I will apply it for John." Do you not find these quotations in that letter?—A. Yes, they are there.

Q. Then John Delano did get $800, did he not, out of John Thomas's contract?—A. Well, I do not know. I must look into that a little further. [Reads.] That is a check of $800, I see.

Q. Well, you directed your clerk to deposit $200 in bank and to send a check for the other $600, and told him that you would apply it to "John," did you not? Is that not so?—A. That is the reading of it.

Q. Well, I ask you whether it is true, or it is not. I do not ask what the "reading" of it is. You said it was John Thomas's draft. Now I ask you to what John you were to apply it?—A. I suppose that other John there is John Delano. I do not know that it is.

Q. There were other drafts besides John Thomas's drafts—that were sent at the same time, I mean.—A. Sent from here?

Q. Yes.—A. In the winter of 1875—yes. They were always receiving drafts along through the winter—all of them.

Q. C. J. Reed is a relative of yours?—A. A nephew of mine.

Q. Were you not told, at the Interior Department, that it would be improper for you to appoint one of your relatives a deputy surveyor?—A. I do not think I was. I know I felt some delicacy on that point for a year or two, and kept him in the office as chief clerk, and he became very restive in that condition; and I conferred with the Commissioner as to his going to the field, and he consented that I put him in the field. As far as I remember, there is no regulation in the Department that restricts a relative so remote as a nephew from being a contractor.

Q. Did you not discuss that question with some of the authorities in the Land-Office, and was it not intimated to you that it would be improper for you to appoint your nephew one of the deputy surveyors?—A. I conversed about it with the Commissioner, and the result of it was that I would be allowed to use my nephew in a contract.

Q. Were you not told, in the winter of 1870-'71, that it would not do at all for you to appoint a blood-relation a deputy surveyor, and were you not told at the same time that a contract had been thrown out in the Territory of Colorado because the surveyor-general had appointed a relative as one of his deputies?—A. A contract had been thrown out—no, I will not say that—I will say that I understood that a contract in Colorado from the surveyor-general to his brother was objected to. I cannot say that it was thrown out.

Q. Were you not told at that time that it would not do for you to appoint a relative as one of your deputies?—A. Not in that large sense.

Q. Well, were you not told it in some sense?—A. No near relative. I was told that there was a regulation against the appointment of very near relatives, such as a brother.

Q. Were you not told that there was a regulation against the appointment of a blood relative?—A. Well, not without qualification, I think.

Q. This was in the winter of 1870-'71, was it not?—A. I cannot say as to that. It might have been.

Q. When did you appoint your nephew a deputy surveyor?—A. I do not know that I can name the year first.

Q. How long after you had this conversation in the Interior Department about the appointment of a blood relative?—A. I cannot say as to that. Very soon after the last conversation. I had two conversations about it.

Q. How long after the last conversation?—A. The first conversation was probably in 1871. I would not let him go to the field. He had asked, and I would not let him go, and on referring to it again here at the Land-Office, I found that I had been, perhaps, too strict about it.

Q. Tell us when this second conversation was?—A. I cannot remember conversation away back so far as that. I cannot remember the year.

Q. Do you know whether it was three years afterward or one year?—A. It was just preceding my giving him a contract—not very long before.

Q. When did you give him the contract?—A. I cannot state that, sir. Out of one hundred contracts running away back for six years, I cannot be supposed here without a note before me to remember distinctly these matters. The contracts are here in the Land-Office, all of them. If I had thought that I should be questioned so closely I could have gone and got memorandums of the dates of all. There are about a hundred in all.

Q. You gave Mr. Fowler a contract, did you not?—A. Yes; he was a partner in a contract.

Q. In whose name was that contract?—A. In his name and another deputy surveyor.

Q. Did the name of Mr. Fowler appear in that contract?—A. That is my recollection, decidedly.

Q. Did he take the oath and file a bond?—A. That is my belief.

Q. Who did the work?—A. He and his partner; he a part of the time, and his partner was at it all the time.

Q. Is Mr. Fowler a surveyor?—A. I think so, sir.

Q. He is the brother-in-law of Mr. Curtis, who at that time was chief clerk of the Land-Office, is he not?—A. I have been told so.

Q. Told so since you have given the contract?—A. No.

Q. Before that?—A. Before that time or at that time. My recollection is that he had been in a contract in Colorado the year previous.

Q. Did Mr. Fowler ever go out in the field upon the land that he was required to survey?—A. That is my understanding of it, sir.

Q. Do you know that he went in the field?—A. I only know from what he or his partner said. They came there to my office and started to the field. His partner said that he went to the field with him and staid some time, and that he let him off when it was necessary to harvest his wheat, and he went down to harvest his wheat, his partner continuing his survey.

Q. Where does Mr. Fowler live?—A. He lives down near Denver.

Q. How long did he stay at Cheyenne when he came there?—A. I cannot say; perhaps a day or two.

Q. He staid a day or two?—A. He was there two or three times.

Q. Where was the land that he surveyed—where does it lie?—A. It lies along the south boundary of Wyoming. It was in fractional townships along the south boundary of Wyoming, extending westward over the mountain and into the Laramie plains.

Q. You employed a young man by the name of Dallas, did you not?—A. No; I did not.

Q. Did you not have a young man, or did not one of the deputies have a young man, by the name of Dallas working for them?—A. One of the deputies took young Dallas to the field as a flagman, I think.

Q. Who is young Dallas?—A. He is a son of Mr. Dallas, the chief of the bureau of surveys. The deputies took a good many young men in with them from different points.

Q. After you had given a contract to Mr. Fahringer for Mr. Fowler, the brother-in-law of Curtis, and Mr. Dallas came out there to work, you had no more difficulty then with the Department about getting your nephew a contract, had you?—A. My nephew had a contract before that occurred; that had nothing to do with it.

Q. There was no fault found about it afterward?—A. There was no fault ever found about it.

Q. Did Orvil Grant have an interest in any of the contracts?—A. I cannot say as to that, sir.

Q. You have no recollection of the fact that Orvil Grant had an interest in any contract let by you?—A. I do not know that he had, now.

Q. Did you give a contract to Mr. Medary for the benefit of Orvil Grant?—A. No, sir.

Q. And you have no knowledge whatever of the fact that Orvil Grant had an interest in any contract?—A. He never had his name in any contract.

Q. I did not ask you that.—A. Well, you do not want me to answer anything that I do not know.

Q. You have no knowledge of the fact that Orvil Grant had an interest in any of these contracts? Do you say that?—A. I think I can say that; that he had none.

Q. Did you write these letters? [handing some letters to witness, who reads them.]—A. Yes, sir; they are written by me.

Q. Now I ask you again did Orvil Grant have an interest in any contract?—A. It is a very difficult question for me to answer without considerable explanation. If I should say "No," it might not be strictly true, and if I should say "Yes," I should say what I did not know. I gave Medary a good deal of work.

Q. In your letter addressed to your clerk, Mr. Stevens, dated February 7, 1875, written from Washington, you say: "Medary's last draft has gone to Cedar Falls and O. L. G." Do you mean Orvil L. Grant?—A. I suppose so.

Q. [Continues reading:] "seems worried that nothing has come to the source of Medary's large prosperity yet; such is the gratitude of depending only upon honor and no contract to bind it." Please explain what you mean.—A. That occurred last winter.

Q. I do not care when it occurred. I ask you what do you mean by it.—A. I mean by that—from the fact of your mentioning that his initials are there—I met him in Washington at that time, and he was complaining that his brother-in-law had been very niggardly toward him, and had not let him share anything with him in his contracts of surveying.

Q. Who was his brother-in-law?—A. Medary was his brother-in-law. He said he had taken considerable surveying and had never allowed him to have any interest or benefit from it.

Q. Was Medary a surveyor? He was one of your deputies. You gave him a contract. He filed a bond, you say, and took the oath. Now I ask you whether he was a surveyor.—

A. He was a surveyor and had been surveying from the office, under a contract, before I gave him a contract.

Q. Did he do the work of this contract?—A. So far as I know, he did.

Q. Do you not know that he did not do the work?—A. No, sir, I do not.

Q. Do you not know that he did not go out into the field and do the work?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know that he did go out into the field and do the work?—A. I have seen him in the field at work on his contract.

Q. How often have you seen him in the field at work on his contract?—A. I have seen him several times on his contracts at work.

Q. How often?—A. I cannot say the number of times I saw him. I saw him when he was on the Laramie plains at work. I saw him when he was out near Fort Rogers, surveying on his contract. His first contract was from my predecessor, Dr. Latham.

Q. Did not Mr. Medary have a compass-man by the name of Corey, who ran all the lines and whose name does not appear in the notes at all?—A. I understood he had a compass-man by the name of Corey.

Q. Did you understand further that he did the work?—A. I do not know whether he ran all the lines or not.

Q. He may have run them all for aught he knew; may he not?—A. He may.

Q. If Corey may have run all the lines so far as you know, what did you see Medary doing when you saw him out in the field at work—looking at Corey?—A. I did not say that I saw him on the ground with his men running the lines.

Q. You simply saw him, then, on the ground?—A. I saw him on the ground.

Q. The work was all done by Corey, was it not?—A. I do not know, sir.

Q. You think it was?—A. I do not say I think so.

Q. You never saw Medary doing any of it?—A. I remember of my objecting to his expending so much for a compass-man, but he said he could not keep up with his men, to keep in the field all the time. He was a man of very short stature and legs, and he could not make the greatest headway through the sage-brush in surveying—keeping along with his men on the lines.

Q. In another portion of this letter you say, "I have this moment parted with O. L. G. I have suggested that he hire a good assistant and go out on his own hook next season; for all his plans seem to have failed this year, and it is not certain that he will receive a dollar from M."—A. I understood that he was a poor man, and I felt an interest in him after he was burned out in Chicago, and, as stated in my letter, it was my desire, probably, at the time, that he should unite himself with an experienced man for deputy, and have some surveying done.

Q. You knew of the fact that Orvil Grant had an interest in Medary's contracts, did you not?—A. No, sir. I did not know it as a fact.

Q. When did you first learn that?—A. I never learned it as a fact—that he had an interest in it.

Q. If you never learned it, what do you mean by your letter when you say, "Medary's last draft has gone to Cedar Falls, and O. L. G. seems worried that nothing has come to the source of M.'s prosperity yet?"—A. I supposed Mr. Medary would be man enough to divide some of the profits with him. He was a single man, and Mr. Grant was not. Mr. Grant was a poor man, as I understood, and he was supporting Mr. Medary's mother at his own (Grant's) house, and I thought that Mr. Medary might share some with him.

Q. When did you first think that—at the time you let the contract to Mr. Medary?—A. I do not know whether I did or not.

Q. Did you ever suggest to Medary that he ought to divide with Orvil Grant?—A. I certainly did not unless it was latterly—about this time, 1875.

Q. You thought that Medary should pay Orvil Grant a part of the profits of the contract because he had been supporting Medary's mother?—A. I thought it would be no more than brotherly and liberal.

Q. You never suggested to Mr. Medary that he should do that, you say?—A. No, sir there was no suggestion made unless it might have been in the last year there, 1875; I may have said something to him.

Q. You said nothing to him, you are very sure, at the time you gave him the contract?—A. I have no recollection of it, sir.

Q. Why did you give Medary a contract at all?—A. Because I found him a deputy on my return after the second appointment.

Q. Who had made him a deputy?—A. Dr. Latham, as I stated.

Q. Your predecessor?—A. Yes.

Q. Had he made him a deputy?—A. Yes; he had. I would not turn him out of the service, and especially after he had surveyed one contract.

Q. What were the profits realized on that contract of Medary?—A. I cannot say, sir.

Q. It was let at a maximum sum, was it not, making $10 a mile?—A. Yes; all of them were let at the same price. All of our contracts for this year were let at $10 for section lines.

Q. Could you not get any person to survey for a less sum than $10 a mile?—A. I think it is very likely I could.

Q. Why did you not do it?—A. Because trusty, good men, honest men, would not survey for less than the customary price, especially in the mining country.

Q. Do you consider that Medary was a trusty, good man to survey?—A. Well, I suppose him a fair average surveyor.

Q. But you do not know whether he ever ran a line in his life, do you?—A. I did not see him running lines.

Q. You do know the fact that he had a compass-man by the name of Corey, who did run the lines?—A. I know that he had Mr. Corey with him in the field for the purpose of assisting him. That is all I know about it.

Q. How many contracts did Norton Grant have?—A. Well, I cannot state the number.

Q. He is a relative of Orvil Grant, is he not?—A. Let me finish my answer if you please. His name went first into a contract in the fall of 1870, after he had spent that summer with my oldest deputy, Edwin James, who had been a deputy surveyor for me in Missouri nearly 30 years previous to that. I placed him with him as a hand to learn the business. He remained in the field from June to September in that capacity, and learned at the same time to survey. The two Downeys were in the field in that same manner as hands, went out with the surveyors to learn, and in September of 1870, my recollection is, that I gave them the contract, together with Grant's name and Downey's name—one of the Downeys, and perhaps both.

Q. Did Grant have any interest in any contract before his name was put in?—A. No, sir, not a dollar.

Q. How was he paid the first summer that he went into the field?—A. Paid by the deputy as a hand.

Q. How much?—A. Forty or fifty dollars a month.

L. C. STEVENS, being duly sworn and examined, testifies as follows:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Thirty-one.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. I am a real-estate dealer or agent.

Q. At what place?—A. Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory.

Q. How long have you lived in Cheyenne?—A. Between eight and nine years.

Q. Were you at any time employed in the office of Surveyor-General Reed, in that Territory?—A. I was.

Q. When did you enter his office?—A. In the fall of 1870.

Q. In what capacity?—A. As transcribing clerk.

Q. How long did you remain there as transcribing clerk?—A. I remained there as transcribing clerk until the time that Dr. Reed was removed; I think it was in the spring of 1873.

Q. What did you do after Dr. Reed was removed?—A. I continued in the office as chief clerk.

Q. With Dr. Reed's successor?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long did Dr. Reed's successor hold the position of surveyor-general of the Territory?—A. I think between four and five months; about that time.

Q. Mr. Reed was then re-appointed, was he?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was his successor?—A. Dr. H. Latham.

Q. Did he resign, do you know, or was he removed?—A. He was removed; that is, suspended under the "tenure of office act," as I understand it.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the manner in which contracts are let, or were let, to deputy surveyors by Dr. Reed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Contract No. 61 was let to J. W. Hammond, I believe—two contracts were they not—61 and 62?—A. Yes, sir; Nos. 61 and 62.

Q. Do you know J. W. Hammond?—A. I do, sir.

Q. Do you know whether any other person had an interest in this contract?—A. In those two?

Q. Yes.—A. I do.

Q. Who did have an interest in them?—A. John S. Delano.

Q. Do you know what the extent of his interest was?—A. I know the amount that was taken out of the money that Mr. Hammond received in payment of the work, for Mr. John S. Delano. It was $1,400.

Q. Do you know whether it was understood, at the time the contract was let to Mr. Hammond, between himself and Dr. Reed, that John S. Delano was to have an interest in that contract?—A. It was.

Q. Who made the bargain with him for Mr. Delano?—A. I spoke to Mr. Hammond in regard to the matter myself first.

Q. Did you speak to him of your own accord or were you requested to do so by anybody?—A. I was requested to do so by Dr. Reed.

Q. What did you say to him?—A. I told Mr. Hammond that there was a chance for him to come into the field. He was not expecting any work. I told him that if he was willing to go into the field, and let Mr. Delano in on profits, he could get work, and asked him if he would be willing to take a contract on such terms. I talked quite a while with him about it and talked freely. He was an intimate friend of mine and I advised him that that was the only show he had to get anything to do, and that he had better do that than be idle; that he would do pretty well out of it himself, anyhow, and he had better do it, and he said he would. I then reported to Dr. Reed that I had seen Mr. Hammond and it was all right. So the contract was let to Mr. Hammond. I had afterward conversations with Mr. Hammond and with Dr. Reed in regard to those contracts, separately, but never with them together. I know, from both of them, that they both understood the arrangement as it was talked up, and that Hammond went into the field on that understanding.

Q. What was Mr. Hammond to receive for his work?—A. That was to be determined by the amount that he made.

Q. What was Mr. Delano's interest, if you remember?—A. He shared equally with Mr. Hammond in the profits.

Q. After deducting the expenses of the survey?—A. After deducting the expenses of the survey. As I understood from conversations with the doctor afterward, Mr. Hammond had owned the outfit, the mules, the compass, and the equipage generally, and also did the work, and for the use of his outfit and for his services he was to receive $125 a month, which was deducted before the division; so I understood. I had nothing to do in regard to the settlement.

Q. Did you have anything to do with the payment of money to Mr. Delano?—A. I did.

Q. Please to state what you had to do with that.—A. Some time in November, 1874, the draft was received from the Treasury for Mr. Hammond in payment for those contracts. Mr. Hammond was not in town at that time. I received his mail when he was not in town and attended to his business, and I placed these Treasury drafts in the bank to his credit. Mr. Hammond had told me that he had given to Dr. Reed notes; that the doctor had required him to give notes for what was coming to Mr. Delano, and that they were all right. I was acquainted with the arrangement from the beginning. On the 21st of November, 1874, Dr. Reed showed me these notes given by Mr. Hammond. They were notes made on a form of the First National Bank of Cheyenne, and these [producing papers] are exact copies of the notes:

“CHEYENNE, October 26, 1874.

“On or before February 1, 1874, we, jointly and severally, promise to pay to John L. Merriam, or bearer, out of the draft of my surveying-contract No. 62, of May 20, 1874, as soon as received, four hundred dollars, at the First National Bank of Cheyenne, for value received, waiving benefit of stay and exemption laws, with interest at two per cent. per month from maturity till paid.

“J. WESLEY HAMMOND.”

“WASHINGTON, Oct. 26, 1874.

“On or before February 1, 1874, we, jointly and severally, promise to pay to John L. Merriam, or bearer, out of my survey-contract, No. 72, of May 20, 1874, one thousand dollars, as soon as received, at the First National Bank of Cheyenne, for value received, waiving benefit of stay and exemption laws, with interest at two per cent. from maturity till paid.

“J. WESLEY HAMMOND.”

Dr. Reed showed me those notes, and told me that he did not know what to do. Mr. Hammond was not in town, and he did not know how to collect them; that he wanted the money for Mr. Delano. I told the doctor that I would collect them. He said that he would be very glad if I would, and he gave them to me for that purpose. I took the notes and went down to the First National Bank at once, and handed the notes to Mr. Wild, the cashier. I said, “John, I want you to collect these notes,” and passed them over the counter. He took them. I then said, "I will pay those notes for Hammond," and I drew a check for $1,400, which I signed "J. Wesley Hammond, by L. C. Stevens." I was authorized by Mr. Hammond to check against his account at any time. I passed that check over to Mr. Wild. He took it. I said, "Just mark these notes paid." He put the canceling-stamp of the First National Bank on the notes, and handed them back to me. I then took the check for $1,400, made a deposit-ticket, and deposited it to my private account. I had been instructed by Dr. Reed that there was $505 of this amount which was to go to Utah to pay Mr. Merriam's mining assessments, and the balance, which was $895, he wanted to send to Mr. Delano. I then at once drew my check on the First National Bank of Cheyenne for $895, and asked Mr. Wild to give me a check on New York, to the order of J. S. Delano, for $895. He drew a check as requested, and passed it to me. I passed him my check in payment of it. There is my check, (the original,) and here is the original draft which he passed to me, [handing papers to chairman.] I bought the draft that way, paying for it with my check; and $505 I left standing to my credit. I took this draft back to the office. Dr. Reed had a letter written—unsealed it was—addressed to J. S. Delano, San Francisco. The letter was in an envelope with the stamp on, and the envelope all ready to seal. He told me to put in the draft and mail the letter. I folded the draft in the letter, sealed the letter, and deposited it in the post-office. It was directed to John S. Delano, San Francisco, and I put this draft in it.

Q. What did you do with the balance?—A. With that balance of $505, on the 23d of November, 1874, I purchased other New York exchange to the order of Dr. Silas Reed, which I gave to him, and which closed the transaction between the doctor and myself. Some months afterward, I went into the bank and told an officer of the bank, the book-keeper, that on such a day I bought a draft there of $895, on New York, and I wanted to know if it had been paid. He looked through the drafts, and had some trouble to find it, but finally found it, and said it had been paid, and handed it to me. I said, "I would like to take this draft." He says, "We have no further use for it; take it; keep it if you want it." I did so.

"First National Bank Cheyenne, 11, 21, 1874. $895.

"Pay to the order of J. S. Delano, eight hundred and ninety-five dollars

"J. E. WILD, Cashier.

"To Fourth National Bank, New York. No. 11870."

This check is indorsed, "J. S. Delano," with the further indorsement:

"Paid Laidlaw & Co., agents of the Bank of California, or order.

"THOMAS BROWN.

"For deposit in the Bank of New York. N. B. A.

"LAIDLAW & CO."

The WITNESS. I believe that is a complete account of that transaction.

Q. Did you at any time send these papers to any person in Washington City; if so, to whom, and when?—A. In the latter part of March, 1875, I sent them to B. H. Bristow.

Q. When did you get them back?—A. In July, 1875.

Q. Where was Dr. Reed in the latter part of March, 1875?—A. In Saint Louis.

Q. Did he communicate with you before his return home?—A. Quite often; I think he went away in the latter part of November, 1874, from Cheyenne to come East.

Q. And did not return until March, 1875?—A. Did not return until May, the latter part of May, or early in June.

Q. What was the communication that you received from him?—A. It was this telegram.

Witness produced telegram, reading as follows:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., April 27, 1875.

"To L. C. STEVENS,

Surveyor-General's Office:

"How did Campbell obtain D.'s letters to me, about surveys?

"SILAS REED."

Q. Whom did you understand him to mean by D.'s?—A. Delano's.

Q. John Delano's letters?—A. John Delano's letters.

Q. What was the next communication you received from him?—A. I never received any other from him. On the 30th April, I left the office. His nephew received a telegram from him. I cannot be positive as to the exact language of it, but I think it was this: "Relieve Stevens and take charge of office until I return."

Q. You then left the office?—A. I then left the office.

Q. Did you know anything about the contract let to Rogers & Lampton?—A. Yes.

Q. Are they surveyors?—A. Yes; deputy surveyors.

Q. Do you know whether Delano had an interest in the contracts let to them?—A. I was told so by Dr. Reed.

Q. What did he tell you?—A. The doctor told me about the amount Mr. Delano was to receive, and told me the different contracts out of which it was to come. That was one of them.

Q. Please to state what amount the doctor told you that John Delano was to receive out of all the contracts?—A. He told me that he wanted to make up to John Delano, if he could, $5,000.

Q. Did he tell you how much he was to receive out of each contract?—A. I do not know that he did exactly; he had some talk with me about it, and my recollection is that he said the boys could do the townships for about $350, which would leave $250 for Mr. Delano.

Q. $250 on each township?—A. On each township.

Q. How many townships did Mr. Rogers have?—A. I know the liability of his contract. The contract amounted to \$2,100, which would make $3\frac{1}{2}$ townships. That was fractional work there, which made odd amounts. That was the liability of his contract.

Q. What was the liability of the contract of Mr. Hays?—A. The same.

Q. Was Mr. Reed's the same?—A. $1,800 his was; that was for three townships.

Q. Mr. Thomas's?—A. The liability of that was $2,900. It probably embraced some other kind of work—township exterior lines. That was the amount that it was calculated it would be. When the contract was let, it was calculated what the work would come to. They gave a bond for double the amount of liability, and that was the amount of the liability.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the character of the work that has been done by these contractors?—A. I never was on the ground; no, sir. I have seen all the field-notes, however.

Q. Can you form an opinion from the notes as to the character of the work done?—A. Do you refer to this particular work?

Q. Yes; this particular work in all these contracts.—A. Mr. Hammond's work was in the vicinity of Fort Bridger—some smooth work and some timber work.

Q. What could Mr. Hammond's work have been done for? Could it not have been let for the amount that he himself received?—A. It could.

Q. And the amount that was paid to John Delano could have been saved to the Government?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that the case with all the contracts that were let there?—A. Yes, sir; there was a fair remuneration; it was good, profitable work for the deputy, even after giving Mr. Delano his share.

Q. Did Dr. Reed ever exhibit to you a letter which he received from Ex-Secretary Delano in relation to this matter?—A. He did.

Q. Do you know where that letter is now?—A. I do not.

Q. Was it in the possession of Dr. Reed when you saw it?—A. It was. He handed it to me to read. I read it and handed it back to him. I have not seen it since.

Q. About what time was that?—A. That was in October, 1874.

Q. Was it a while before Mr. Delano retired from the Interior Department?—A. Yes; while I was in the office.

Q. It was before sending the draft to John Delano?—A. Yes; a month before.

Q. Can you state the contents of that letter?—A. I can state the sense of the letter correctly. It was a short letter. I read it once.

Q. Just tell the substance, if you can.—A. I would state that before the doctor showed me this letter he spoke to me in regard to it; something like this he says: "I was writing the Secretary not long ago and I mentioned to him that I was doing something for John out here. I got a letter from him this morning, and I want to show it to you; just see how careful he is." He then handed me the letter and I read it. It was an autograph letter of Secretary Delano's, and addressed to Dr. Reed. The first part of it was in regard to some other work, which I did not pay any attention to or charge my mind with. The part to which he directed my attention, and which he had referred to, was like this: "You mention that you are doing something for John; I hope you will be careful not to do anything that will have the appearance of being wrong." That was about all I paid any attention to—all that I noticed particularly.

Q. Do you remember whether there was a clause in the letter thanking the doctor for his kindness to John?—A. To the best of my recollection, there was; it was a complimentary, a pleasant letter.

Q. Did the doctor tell you that he had written to Ex-Secretary Delano, and informed him of what he was doing for John?—A. He did before he showed me the letter. He stated that he had written the Secretary not long before, and had mentioned that he was helping John, and then introduced the subject of the letter and the letter itself.

Q. Where was John at that time?—A. I have no idea. I think he was in California for several weeks previous to the time I sent him the draft, and would have been in California about that time. I think he was there.

Q. Did you ever see John in Cheyenne?—A. I did.

Q. When was he there?—A. He was there some time during the summer of 1874.

Q. How long did he remain?—A. Well, he remained in town some two or three hours.

Q. Is that the only time that he was there, to the best of your recollection?—A. No, sir; he came in there at one time on his way to Denver and staid there from evening until about midnight, when the train went to Denver. I saw him riding in a carriage with three other gentlemen; they drove up to the sidewalk, and Mr. McCann, who was one of the party, and whom I knew, asked me if there were any letters for Mr. Delano at the office.

Q. He did not come to the office himself?—A. No, sir.

Q. I mean this particular time?—A. No, sir; not this time.

Q. Do you know whether he had ever met or had an interview with any of these deputy surveyors who divided the profits of their contracts with him?—A. Not to my knowledge. To the best of my knowledge and belief—and I had a chance to know—they never saw him or had any communication with him.

Q. And, so far as your knowledge goes, they were permitted to do the surveying by agreeing to divide the profits with Mr. John Delano?—A. That was the case with Mr. Hammond.

Q. And the contract was made by Dr. Reed?—A. It was.

Q. Do you know anything about the contracts that were let to Mr. Orvil Grant outside of what is contained in Dr. Reed's letter that has been read?—A. I know nothing about that except what Dr. Reed has told me.

Q. Please state what he has told you about that contract?—A. Mr. Medary came to the office to work, and was given a contract by Dr. Latham, and was at work in the field when Dr. Reed was re-instated. About the time that Dr. Reed returned Mr. Medary came down to Cheyenne from the field, and when I met him I said, "We have got another surveyor-general; look out for heads." He says, "I do not think this change will affect me at all." I had no further conversation with him, but I know—I learned afterward—that while he was there he made an arrangement with Dr. Reed as to other work that he was to have after he got through the contract on which he was engaged at that time. The doctor told me some time afterward in regard to it, that it was a "mighty sharp trick in Latham" to bring Medary out there; that he had it all arranged to help Mr. Orvil Grant, who was poor, had been burned out in Chicago, and was in debt, and he proposed to Orvil to put him in the field, and that Orvil said that he could not go in the field very well, but if he would put in this young man Medary it would be all right. The doctor said that Latham had found this out in some way or other through another Grant, who was working in the office, and had come out and brought Medary along, and the doctor said that that was a very "shrewd trick" in Dr. Latham to capture Medary in order to get the favor of Orvil. Mr. Medary remained in the employ as deputy there from that time as long as Dr. Reed was connected with the office, and did not get through until some time afterward. He worked there last summer. The doctor told me in the fall of 1873 that Medary was to help Orvil out of some of his debts.

Q. Is Mr. Medary a practical surveyor?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did he go in the field himself and remain there, do you know?—A. Yes; he remained out there most of the time, out in that vicinity.

Q. Did you ever know Orvil Grant to do any surveying in that Territory?—A. No, sir; I do not think he was ever in the Territory.

Q. Proceed to state anything else that you know in reference to those matters.—A. In the fall of 1873, in talking about Orvil's matters, and as to what Medary would do for him, Dr. Reed mentioned that Medary was spending his money pretty fast, and he was afraid there would be nothing left for Orvil. When the doctor came back and Medary was going into the field in the spring to work, I asked the doctor in regard to Orvil's matters, and whether Medary had helped Orvil out as he had promised, and the doctor said that was fixed up all right. That was in spring of 1874. Mr. Medary came back in the spring of 1874, and was there during the surveying season, and had contracts all the time to large amounts. When his contracts had been given him, Dr. Reed asked me one day what I thought Medary ought to make out of that work, and I answered him that I did not see how he could make less than $5,000 however he managed. He says, "That is just what I thought, and just what I told Mr. Grant. I told Mr. Grant that that ought to be the basis, and that if Medary did not report that much profit, he had not done it right and had not managed his work right." I do not think I had any more conversation with Dr. Reed that I recollect in regard to Orvil until the winter of 1875. He mentioned the matter to me in several letters, two that I have here, and one or two that I have not got, though I recollect about what he said.

Q. Are those letters missing or lost?—A. I could not find them among my papers.

Q. Did you look for them?—A. I did. They did not say anything particularly, but they referred to the matter.

Q. Do you remember what he said in those letters in relation to Mr. Grant's interest?—A. Yes; Dr. Reed did not like Medary at all, and did not like to have him about, and complained a good deal about Medary, and the way he acted.

Q. Toward Grant?—A. No; acted in the Territory, and he said that Mr. Grant ought to get somebody else; that he could get a man who would make more money for him, and who would be pleasanter to have about. I know in one of his letters he referred to the fact that he had stopped somewhere in New Jersey where Orvil Grant lived, and had some talk with him about putting in a new man in place of Medary, and that he thought (or that probably) Mr. Grant would consent to it.

Q. Is that all, so far as Mr. Grant's interest was concerned?—A. I think that is all I know.

Q. Were there no other persons that you know of who had interests in contracts, and whose names did not appear in the papers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Please state whom.—A. One H. H. Houghton; I think that is the name; I never thought of it until you asked me the question—have not thought of it for years.

Q. Who was he?—A. He was some friend of Dr. Reed's.

Q. Do you know where he lived?—A. He publishes a newspaper somewhere in Illinois, I think; I do not know but it is Galena—the Galena Advertiser, I think.

Q. Did you ever see Mr. Houghton in the Territory?—A. No, sir.

Q. In whose name was the contract made out in which he had an interest?—A. James & Rogers.

Q. Were they surveyors?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know what the amount of the contract was?—A. I do not. I know the amount that Houghton was to receive—$600.

Q. Do you know whether he did receive it?—A. I do not know that he received it; but I know that the transaction was completed and the money paid. The boys told me they paid it.

Q. Do you derive your information from the deputies?—A. Some of it, and some from the doctor.

Q. What did the doctor tell you about it?—A. Well, the doctor told me that he had intended to help Mr. Houghton, who was his old friend, and had offered him some work, but that he could not come out there to work, and so he was going to let some of the deputies, for they would make up to him about that amount which he could make on a small contract.

Q. Do you know of any other persons who had an interest in a contract, and whose names did not appear in the papers?—A. I was told that Norton Grant had an interest in the Downey contracts before his name appeared.

Q. Who told you that?—A. I was told that by C. J. Reed, chief clerk in 1870. The reason that Mr. Grant's name did not appear, as I recollect, was that he was not of age, and therefore not competent to enter into a contract.

Q. Do you know of any other person whose name did appear in contracts, and who did not do any of the work?—A. James M. Fowler was one person of that kind.

Q. Who is James M. Fowler?—A. He is a farmer and postmaster at some little town near Denver, the name of which I cannot think of at present.

Q. Did you ever see him in the Territory?—A. Yes.

Q. How long did he remain there when he came there—long enough to do the work?—A. No, sir; he remained there a day or two—at the time the contract was made.

Q. Who did the work?—A. Mr. Fahringer.

Q. Do you know the liability of that contract?—A. I can give it to you. [Referring to a memorandum.] It was contract No. 68, to Fowler & Fahringer; liability $4,000.

Q. Do you know the amount that Mr. Fowler realized from it?—A. I was told by Mr. Fahringer what he paid him—$1,400.

Q. Do you know of any other persons who had an interest in a contract and who did none of the work?—A. I do not think of any other just now.

Q. If there is anything else that you desire to state to the committee, I wish you would state it. You have sworn to tell the whole truth about this matter. The committee does not know what you know, and therefore we cannot ask you specifically everything that we ought to know in relation to this matter.—A. I would state, with reference to Mr. Medary, that he did very little of his work himself, if any. He had a compass-man hired, who ran the lines, and was surveyor in fact. The compass-man did all of the work, and wrote up the notes, which Mr. Medary swore to and turned in. Medary paid him $100 a month.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Medary understood the business of surveying or not? Was he a practical surveyor?—A. No, sir.

Q. He was not a practical surveyor?—A. No, sir. I do not know that he ever heard of surveying until he came to the Territory and took a contract.

By Mr. BOONE:

Q. I understand you to say that you had seen a letter from Secretary Delano to Dr. Reed?—A. I did; yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember about the date of it?—A. It was in October, 1874. I do not recollect the exact date.

Q. Did that letter acknowledge any services that had been performed by Dr. Reed for John Delano? Was it extending thanks to him for his kindness to John?—A. That was the sense of it.

Q. Was it in reply to a letter that had been written by Dr. Reed, did you understand?—A. Yes, sir. The doctor told me that he had written such a letter.

Q. Did the letter indicate that the Secretary had knowledge of the fact that John had an interest in these contracts?—A. It did not refer to any contracts at all.

Q. Was there anything in the letter forbidding the letting of any contract in which John was interested, or cautioning Dr. Reed upon that subject?—A. The language was about like this: "I hope you will not do anything that will have the appearance of being wrong." It is cautionary, if you interpret it in that way.

Q. There was no order to him, however, not to allow John to have an interest in any of those contracts?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were any contracts let after that in which John was interested?—A. No, sir. The contracts had all been let in the spring and summer. The money had been collected on them then.

Q. Are you pretty certain about your recollection of the contents of that letter?—A. I am.

Q. State to the committee whether or not it was the custom of Dr. Reed to let contracts to parties who were not practical surveyors, upon the idea that they would get practical surveyors to assist them?—A. No, sir; he would let them to persons of that kind, and let them go ahead the best they could.

Q. Not practical surveyors?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did he not let contracts to men who were not surveyors?—A. He did; all they knew about surveying was what they learned there in the field, working for the Government. It was not so in every case, of course.

Q. I do not mean in every case; I mean the general rule. In other words, he did not confine himself to surveyors when he let contracts.—A. No, sir.

Q. John Delano was not a surveyor, was he?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did he ever go into the field and do any particular work?—A. No; not at all, sir.

Q. Did he ever accompany any person to the field, so far as you know, such as the surveyors who did the work?—A. He did not.

Q. Did he ever execute a bond in the office?—A. He did not.

Q. Did he ever take an oath as surveyor or deputy surveyor?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. WOODWORTH:

Q. Where were you when that letter was exhibited to you from Secretary Delano to Dr. Reed?—A. In Dr. Reed's office.

Q. Were you then his chief clerk?—A. I was.

Q. What was the other business that he wrote about, aside from the matter you have detailed—do you remember?—A. I do not recollect exactly; I could not state with any certainty.

Q. But you remember this other part of it?—A. Yes.

Q. You do not remember what the business part was?—A. I do not; something I had no interest in.

Q. Something connected with the business of the land-office?—A. No, sir; it was a private letter, a personal letter.

Q. Was there anything said in that letter with regard to the health of John Delano; any inquiry made in regard to it, or anything said in regard to it?—A. Not that I recollect.

Q. You had seen John Delano prior to that time, had you not? He had been in the Territory prior to that time, as you have already said?—A. Yes.

Q. You knew he was a man out of health—consumptive?—A. I had been told so.

Q. Did you not know that John Delano had been brought there on account of his health, and was traveling at that time on account of his health, and that Dr. Reed felt a good deal of solicitude for his health; and did you not know, further, that that was the matter referred to in that letter, and not any contracts?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Was there anything said about contracts in that letter?—A. Nothing at all.

Q. Do you want to leave the impression upon the minds of this committee that that letter had reference to contracts that John Delano was having from Dr. Reed?—A. I do.

Q. Why do you wish to leave that impression?—A. Because of the conversation with which the doctor led up to this letter.

Q. Not from anything in the letter, but from the conversation. What was that conversation?—A. He said that he had written to the Secretary a short time before.

Q. What did he say he had written about?—A. A letter in which he had mentioned that he was doing something for John.

Q. Did he say what he was doing for John?—A. No, sir; I did not know of anything else he was doing except helping him to share these contracts; that was what I supposed the doctor was talking about.

Q. You did not know anything about the matter of John's being sick, and the doctor being his adviser in his going out West for the purposes of his health, did you?—A. No, sir.

Q. He did not say anything about that?—A. No, sir.

Q. What else was said?—A. He then said, "I will show you the letter. See how very careful the Secretary is;" then, also, the language of the letter: "I hope you will not do anything that will have the appearance of being wrong." That would not lead me to suppose that it was solicitude for his health.

Q. Instead of saying, "How very careful the Secretary is," did he not say, "How very careful the Secretary is of his son's health?" Was not that the language used?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or how very solicitous he is of his son?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you pretend to give us the exact language of that letter at that time—the words of a letter written in October, 1873?—A. Yes; I do not pretend that I can give you every word, but that was the exact sense.

Q. And you are ready to swear that he did not use that language that I mentioned, as to "how careful he is of the health of his son?"—A. I am; I am quite positive of that.

Q. You can remember that, distinctly, over this lapse of time, but cannot remember what was in the other part of the letter, nor what it was about?—A. Because my attention was not directed to it; I did not pay any attention to it; my attention was directed to the other.

Q. How long have you lived in Cheyenne?—A. I have lived there, with the exception of about five months, since December, 1867.

Q. Were you not engaged there before you went into the surveyor-general's office?—A. I was, clerking.

Q. Clerking for whom?—A. At the time I went into Dr. Reed's office, I was clerking for J. R. Martin.

Q. In what business was he engaged?—A. He was engaged in the liquor and cigar business.

Q. Wholesale or retail?—A. Both.

Q. In other words you were "tending bar;" that was the amount of it?—A. That was part of my business; yes, sir.

Q. Who was Dr. Reed's predecessor?—A. Dr. Latham, this last time.

Q. I mean the first predecessor?—A. Dr. Reed was the first incumbent; he came there and organized the office in 1870.

Q. You continued until what time? When were you finally discharged from office?—A. was relieved on the 30th April, 1875. I had already resigned; my resignation had been accepted by Dr. Reed. He was not at home.

Q. Why had you resigned?—A. To go into other business. I had made arrangements for opening a real-estate and collection office.

Q. You spoke of your going into the bank and getting this draft that you have exhibited to the committee from the cashier of the bank; was that before or after your resignation?—A. That was after.

Q. At whose instance did you do this?—A. My own.

Q. For what purpose?—A. I went in to see if the draft had been paid, and I got possession of it, so as to be able to say that Mr. Delano received that particular sum of money.

Q. Why should you want to do that?—A. Because I had determined to make an exposé of the whole matter.

Q. To whom?—A. To the administration.

Q. Did you do it?—A. I tried to.

Q. When?—A. Some time in the month of March—the latter part of March, 1875, I sent the papers to Washington.

Q. To whom did you send them?—A. To Secretary B. H. Bristow.

Q. Did you communicate to any person in Cheyenne before that time what you have communicated to the committee with regard to John Delano's connection with these contracts and drafts?—A. I did.

Q. To whom?—A. I told it to Mr. Corlett, my partner, and I told it to Governor Campbell, who was governor of the Territory at the time; it was about the time when he left the Territory, I believe; and I told it to Major Wolcott.

Q. Your feeling is not very kind at this time toward Dr. Reed, is it, Mr. Stevens?—A. No, sir.

Q. You have spoken of contracts being let to parties who were not surveyors, and have spoken, I think, of this Mr. Medary as being a person not a surveyor; are you acquainted with him?—A. Yes; quite well.

Q. You know that he is not a surveyor, do you?—A. Well, I know that he is not a practical surveyor, not a competent surveyor; he is a deputy surveyor.

Q. Does he understand the art of surveying? In other words, would he be able to run the lines and do the work, if required to do it?—A. It is a matter of opinion; I was not in the field with him myself.

Q. This man, H. H. Houghton, who was he? Do you know him?—A. Only as I have stated here.

Q. Do you know whether he was a practical surveyor or not?—A. No.

Q. You do not know anything about that?—A. No.

Q. What do you know about Rogers; was he a practical surveyor?—A. Yes; he has been there in the office since 1870; learned his business right there.

By Mr. BOONE:

Q. Who is Norton Grant?—A. He is a distant relative of President Grant. I do not know how distant—a second cousin.

Q. Who is Orvil Grant?—A. He is the brother of President Grant, as I understand.

By Mr. WOODWORTH:

Q. I understand Mr. Medary's first contract was under Mr. Latham?—A. It was.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you ever write a letter to President Grant in connection with these matters?—A. I did.

Q. Please tell us what that was—what you complained of in that letter.—A. I will state that shortly after I left the office, (I left on the 30th of April,) there came into my possession a Treasury draft for $90, drawn to the order of Walter Brown. The money was not intended for Walter Brown, but intended for a person who was working in the office and was being paid as a clerk in the office. I took that draft when it came into my possession, (that was after I had sent these papers to Washington,) and made a sworn statement respecting it and forwarded it here.

Q. To whom?—A. I forwarded it to Governor Campbell, and he wrote me that he had received it, and handed it to the President. That is all that I knew about it. I supposed it was in the President's hands. When Dr. Reed came back to Wyoming in the summer of 1875, after he had been there some time, he came to me one day and asked me in regard to this draft, what had become of it. I told him I had returned it to the Treasury Department. He did not have much conversation with me, but he then went and saw the young man, Walter Brown, to whom the draft was made payable, and had some conversation with Mr. Brown in regard to this matter, which conversation Mr. Brown came and repeated to me. I have it here in Mr. Brown's writing. If it would be of any interest to the committee in this connection I will read it.

Q. Produce it. Do you know it to be Mr. Brown's handwriting?—A. Yes, sir; he wrote it at my request and gave it to me at the time.

It reads:

“CHEYENNE, WYO., September 1, 1875.

“The following is a statement made to me in Pease & Taylor's office, August 26, 1875, by Dr. Silas Reed:

“He commenced by telling me about his hiring Mr. Leverett C. Stevens as clerk in his office, at $100 per month, salary, and, finding him to be a good clerk, made him a proposition to sweep and dust out the office, and he would allow Mr. Stevens $30 a month, the amount that would have to be paid if he hired some one else to do it, which he said Mr. Stevens agreed to. After awhile Mr. Blackstone needed a little help, and so Mr. B. was allowed the $30 extra money. Then Mr. Parshall, and, finally, the young man who takes care of the office now. Reed said then that he wished to tell me a few facts, as he knew I was a friend of Mr. Stevens. He told me then that some parties here had got up a plot to have him removed from office, and had succeeded in getting Mr. Stevens to help them. He said that the President showed him some papers while he was in Washington, and he asked him where he got them, but the President didn't want to mention any names, but remembered that Mr. Stevens had sent them on to Governor Campbell. Reed said that one of the papers was a draft drawn on the Fourth National Bank of New York City in favor of Delano, which he had Mr. Stevens mail at Cheyenne, and it went by the way of San Francisco, Cal., to New York, and then it should come back with other papers to the First National Bank of this place, but he looked over the drafts here and it was gone. Some one had stolen it out of the bank, and he said Stevens was the only one that could have done it. He said he explained it to the President, why he had used the appropriation money, and he (the President) said that if Reed wanted to give the money in that way to Delano he had a perfect right to do so. He also had a draft drawn in favor of myself for work done in the surveyor's office, which he explained to the President, and the President said it was all right. He also said that the Government would not allow this young man (before mentioned) to be beat out of his money, and that the said draft drawn in favor of myself would be returned, and he didn't want me to sign it or to do anything with it but to hand it to him. Reed also said that it was damned ungrateful in Stevens to betray him so. He said much more about the matter that I can't remember now, but I can swear that the above statement is just what he told me. Reed also said that he did not know even that I had been in the habit of signing the vouchers, for he didn't take any notice of them; said Stevens made them out and he just signed them without reading them at all.

“W. C. BROWN.”

Mr. Brown came to me and repeated this conversation. About that time Burdett, Commissioner of the General Land-Office, was in Cheyenne. Right after Mr. Burdett went away Mr. Brown came to me and said he had been told by Mr. Hay, who had been a deputy in Dr. Reed's office, that they were going to send out for that draft; that they would send a letter and would request the return of it, and asked me what he had better do, and I told him not to sign it if such a request did come. I told him that I did not believe any such a request would come, but if it did, I said, “Don't you sign it.” He came to me a few days afterward and said they had brought him—(Mr. Hay, who was a personal friend of his whom he did not like to disoblige, had brought him) this request and he did not like to refuse to sign it, but before getting this request signed he had showed him a letter from the Commissioner of the Land-Office stating that if Walter Brown requested the return of that draft it should be returned to him.

Q. You say that money was intended for some other person?—A. Yes.

Q. And not for Walter Brown?—A. Not for him.

Q. Who was the other person?—A. Mason G. Day.

Q. In what capacity was he engaged in the office?—A. He was drawing pay as clerk and also doing the janitor work, for which this money was intended. As soon as Brown told me that he had signed this, I saw at once that Dr. Reed was determined to get possession of that draft. The last I knew of the draft it was in the President's hands. I immediately sat down and addressed a personal letter to the President which I signed and sent to him. I never received any reply to it; I do not know anything about the result of it, but in that letter, which was a long letter, (I have a copy of it here but it would not interest you,) I protested against that draft being returned to Reed or to anybody, without investigation.

Q. Was Walter Brown employed in the office at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. Had he any connection with the office?—A. Not the least.

The CHAIRMAN here inquired of Dr. Reed if he desired to ask the witness any questions by way of cross-examination.

Dr. REED. I have a number of questions to ask, and I ask the privilege of the committee that I may have the opportunity now.

The CHAIRMAN. We will grant it, sir.

Cross-examination:

By Dr. REED:

Q. You spoke of this draft in the name of Walter Brown, and you brought Mr. Brown's statement here to show that I spoke to him about it, and in which he says that I said I had explained about that particular draft to the President. I did not see the President after the 29th of April; upon what day did you receive that draft?—A. I received that draft in the early part of May.

Q. How did the name of Mr. Brown come to be used in that draft?—A. Because the account was audited to him; his name was used and he signed the voucher.

Q. Who prepared the account?—A. I did.

Q. Was that the first account that you had prepared in Mr. Brown's name for that particular purpose, of janitor?—A. It was not.

Q. How long had his name been used to cover that small amount of janitor-salary?—A. I think for a matter of two years; perhaps more.

Q. Let me ask you if you did not use his name in 1870?—A. No, sir.

Q. Late in 1870, was it not used to cover your services in that very capacity?—A. No, sir.

Q. You will swear to that?—A. I will.

Q. Will you swear that his name was not put in, then, very early in 1871 for such a purpose—to cover your service as janitor?—A. It never was put in to cover mine at all. I swear positively to that.

Q. When was the first time his name was used to cover the janitor's account?—A. Well, it was used as soon as it became necessary to have an account. There was a long time in which it went into an incidental account.

Q. It is an incidental account all the time, is it not?—A. Allow me to explain. An incidental account audited in your own name by which the draft was drawn in your favor, and you drew the money, and then paid this janitor's bill. It was done in that way for a long time; but after some time the Department objected to so large an account as $90 a quarter going in in that way, and said that this janitor must sign his own vouchers and draw his own draft, and I think we used Mr. Brown's name always after that, and probably his name had been used before in your account as the name of the janitor.

Q. And who was the janitor in my office in the fall of 1870 when you first became clerk?—A. I was.

Q. When you first became clerk?—A. I am not sure in regard to that. I think it was Charles J. Reed.

Q. Was the janitor not a colored man when you first came into the office?—A. I have no recollection of any colored man when I first came there.

Q. Whoever was janitor, did you not object to him as not being faithful in putting the office in good order each morning?—A. I think very possibly I may have. I do not recollect in regard to that.

Q. When I asked you whom we should select to do that duty better, did you not reply that you would do it yourself?—A. I do not recollect in regard to any statements about doing it better; but I recollect that I either asked you or at my suggestion it was asked of you that you let me do it.

Q. Did you not perform that duty in addition to your acting as transcribing clerk for some time?—A. Some four or five months.

Q. Not until your salary was raised—the next May or June, say?—A. No, sir; I performed it until the boys came in from the field, and then either George Thomas or Lewis Lampton did it during the winter; I do not recollect which.

Q. Your name was used in that account, was it not—the account of the services of the janitor?—A. No, sir.

Q. You made out the account, then?—A. I think I did all of that.

Q. What name was used, then, if yours was not?—A. I do not recollect whether it was a fictitious name; but I think it was.

Q. You were in the habit of keeping my accounts at that time in the office, were you not?—A. I made the accounts out always after I had been in there a few weeks.

Q. What was paid the janitor for services?

WITNESS. When I first took it?

Dr. REED. Yes, and all the time along.

A. When I first took it you paid me $12.50 a month, and when the boys came in from the field—George Thomas and Fred Reed—you paid them $30 a month.

Q. Was it not my universal custom to pay $30 a month for the winter-time and spring-time when they had to make fires?—A. They did the work in the winter. The custom had just commenced.

Q. Was not that the amount paid during all my time there for years, $30 a month for the winter?—A. Not at the first part of it.

Q. Not the first winter?—A. The first winter; but I went into the office in September, and did that work at $12.50 a month until Fred Reed and George Thomas got in from the field.

Q. What time was that?—A. That must have been in November or December.

Q. And do you say that that was all the period that you acted as janitor there?—A. No, sir; the next summer after they had gone out in the field. I did the work again at $20 a month during the summer.

Q. Was not $20 a month my usual custom of payment for the summer months for the janitor's services?—A. At that time.

Q. Was it not all the time up to the last?—A. No, sir; the last of the time it was $30 a month.

Q. In the summer?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are sure of that?—A. After you came back—after you had relieved Dr. Latham, you cut Mr. Parshall's salary down from $1,400 to $1,200, and to help him out then you let him do the janitor's work at $30 a month.

Q. Was that at your suggestion?—A. Very likely.

Q. Do you not know it was?—A. Yes, sir; it was.

Q. In whose name did you make the account out for the janitor's work while Mr. Parshall was receiving the benefit of it?—A. Walter Brown's.

Q. Who paid Mr. Parshall the money?—A. I did.

Q. How did you get it?—A. Out of the proceeds of the draft that came for this amount.

Q. Whom did the draft come to?—A. Walter Brown.

Q. Who made the arrangements with Mr. Walter Brown, to let his name stand for the use of the janitor?—A. I am not sure whether it was myself or Mr. Blackstone; I think Walter Brown's name was first used for Mr. Blackstone's benefit.

Q. And you made the accounts out at that time?—A. All the time.

Q. Do you believe that Mr. Blackstone knew him well enough to ask him to do that?—A. Yes, sir; he boarded with him.

Q. Do you not know that you selected him for the use of Mr. Blackstone after you quit using that?—A. I am not positive about that; it was either Mr. Blackstone or myself.

Q. You and Mr. Blackstone and Mr. Parshall had done the services of the janitor and received pay for them at different periods during three or four years?—A. We had.

Q. This last man that performed the service, his name was what?—A. Day.

Q. When did his time commence?—A. It must have been in the fall of 1874; I cannot say what month.

Q. Was it not late in November, 1874, that his time as janitor commenced?—A. I think it was; I think it was as late as November.

Q. Who was janitor immediately preceding him?—A. Mr. Parshall.

Q. When that account was made out at the end of the quarter on the 31st of December, whose name was it made in?—A. Walter Brown.

Q. Did Mr. Parshall and Mr. Day get pay for that quarter?—A. They did.

Q. How did they get it?—A. I paid it to them.

Q. Where did you get it?—A. From the proceeds of that draft.

Q. Did the draft come to you?—A. No, sir; to Walter Brown.

Q. And you obtained the draft of Walter Brown?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you paid the proceeds of that draft to whom?—A. Mr. Parshall and Mason.

Q. During the next quarter ending March 31, 1875, this draft that you have been speaking of was for janitor services?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it was for services rendered by Mason Day?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That draft came to Cheyenne in May?—A. It did.

Q. In the name of Walter Brown?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you obtain possession of the draft?—A. I did.

Q. Why did you not let it go to the office?—A. Mr. Brown brought it to me, and I, at that time, had no connection with the office. I did not consider the draft a proper draft, I did not consider it audited for the proper account, and I did not consider that it was right for me to pass it over.

Q. Did you not understand that that draft was to pay for the services of Mason Day as janitor?—A. I did.

Q. Have you considered those drafts coming to Walter Brown for yourself to pay for the janitor services as not right?—A. No, sir; that is, they were in violation of law, but they were—

Q. [Interrupting.] Are you positive of that?—A. I do not know that I could quote the law, but my understanding of the law is that no person shall receive pay for performing two different kinds of service during the same period of time.

Q. Have you not been told that that was a mere matter of regulation?—A. No, sir; I did not suppose so.

Q. Have you not been told over and over again, by me, that that was a matter of regulation?—A. I do not recollect of your ever telling me so.

Q. Then why did you not make your account out in your own name in 1870, when you had done those services?—A. Because I understood from you that that would not do.

Q. That that would be contradictory to the regulation?—A. Yes.

Q. And you knew all the time it was contrary to the regulations?—A. I knew that if an account was made out in favor of a man for clerk's services for a certain period of time, and another account for the same period of time for janitor's services, one of them would not be paid.

Q. You felt positive of that?—A. I did.

Q. And yet you received pay for it?—A. I received pay for it.

Q. For all the time you did it?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know why you and these other men were permitted to do that work and receive the janitor's fees at that low rate?—A. I think it was at our request; it was to earn a little more money.

Q. It was all while you had low salaries, was it not—salaries thought too low for the services rendered?—A. Mine was.

Q. Was it not so with Mr. Parshall?—A. Yes, sir; with Mr. Parshall, for his salary was reduced. I think not the case with Mr. Blackstone. I think Mr. Blackstone got one salary all the time he was in the office, and has one now.

Q. Mr. Blackstone had just been to Pittsburgh and married at the time he got it, and was put under great extra expense, had he not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you positive that you did not ask me to let Mr. Blackstone have that pay as janitor and do the work?—A. I am not positive that I did not; I should think very likely I did, because I generally interceded with you in all those matters.

Q. Now, if you had been clerk in the surveyor-general's office on the 3d day of May, the time I understand that draft reached there, do not you believe that you would have taken it from Mr. Brown and paid the janitor?—A. I should have done so, most certainly.

Q. Do you think that you had a perfect right to handle that draft, and send it to the President, as you say you did, or to Mr. Campbell?—A. I conceive that I had.

Q. Do you know where the draft is now?—A. I do not; never heard from it since.

Q. Do you remember what salary janitors were generally paid in other surveyor's offices?—A. I think about $600 a year, as a general thing.

Q. That would be $50 a month?—A. Yes.

Q. These janitor services were paid out of the incidental appropriation?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much of the incidental appropriation remained unconsumed by me generally each 30th of June?—A. I think about one-half.

Q. Did not you understand from me that I would permit these clerks with low salaries to do that work and take the pay for it, in order not only to help them slightly but to save the Government from paying a larger sum to a janitor employed wholly for that purpose?—A. I think you expressed yourself that way, perhaps, a number of times.

Q. Do you not know that there was the largest economy used in the office in respect to incidental expenses?—A. There was.

Q. Did you say that you knew where this draft was now, that you have been speaking of?—A. I did not.

Q. Have you no idea where it is?—A. Not the slightest; except that I have an idea that it went into the hands of the President. I asked Mr. Brown the day or the day before I started for Washington (which was, I think, last Saturday a week ago) if he had got that draft back, or if that draft had come back; and he said not that he knew of; that he had not seen anything of it.

Q. Do you know whether it has been paid or not?—A. I do not; I know that it has not been paid unless the indorsement is forged.

Q. Do you feel that it was just to deprive that young man of pay for his services for three months that cold winter, in making fires?—A. He was paid more than he earned.

Q. How much was he paid?—A. He was paid fifty dollars a month for clerk-hire during that time.

Q. Did you not in the month of November or December propose that very arrangement for that young man?—A. I did.

Q. You have stated you did not know whether that draft was paid or not, yet?—A. I say it has not been paid unless the indorsement has been forged, because the payee told me

Saturday that he had not seen it, and he promised me he would not indorse it under any circumstances. I wish to state, so that the committee can understand the full situation, in connection with my making this arrangement for this young man, that this young man was a nephew of Dr. Reed's; (he could not remember his name a moment ago, though he is his nephew.) He is a young man that Dr. Reed wanted to bring out there to take care of. I suggested to Dr. Reed how he could take care of him. We had to board some of them there in the office every winter, and I devised generally the expedients as to how they should be provided for, and as we did not have money enough to pay him as much as the doctor wanted to pay him out of the clerk-hire, and as the doctor was also very saving in his incidentals, and letting a great deal of it revert, I suggested this arrangement by which this young man could get pay as a clerk, and also draw this janitor's pay, which would make it eighty dollars a month for him.

Q. Do you remember how much of that incidental appropriation of $2,500 was consumed at the end of the third quarter, when you went out?—A. I do not.

Q. You were a clerk in closing it up that quarter?—A. Yes, sir; but I do not recollect the amount.

Q. What do you say was about the amount?—A. I could not state; it is a matter of record.

Q. You said you had a letter from me accepting your resignation?—A. I did; I have it here.

Dr. REED. Let me see it.

The witness produced a letter, and states: "I will remark that my resignation was dated the 22d of February, 1875. I sent it to Dr. Reed, and with it I sent a letter, in which I told him that I had not said anything to anybody about my resigning. He wrote back on the 26th, a letter in which he acknowledged the receipt of the resignation, and requested if I had not said anything about it, not to do so; so I never made it public at all. It was not known there that I had resigned only to a few persons; a few of my friends and my family and the doctor."

Dr. REED. That is no acceptance of your resignation by me.

The WITNESS. Well, the committee can judge of that.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge that Fowler, a partner of Fahringer in a contract, did not go to the field and survey?—A. Mr. Fowler was in the field for, I think, as much as two weeks while they were surveying the townships east, not to survey, but as a sort of a helper about the camp. He then went back home, and Mr. Fahringer finished up the contract.

Q. Did not Fowler come back a second time to my office?—A. I think he was at the office two or three times.

Q. Do not you know that after they surveyed that fractional township southeast, they came into town and started out southwest to the boundary, ten or twelve miles, and that Fahringer and Fowler both went out together to begin that work there?—A. They went out into the field together; I know that, because I went down to Mr. Blackstone's to take Mr. Dallas down to Ilett's ranch. There I met both Mr. Fahringer and Mr. Fowler, who took young Mr. Dallas back to their camp. I know that Mr. Fowler was along there with the party.

Q. I think you have stated that Mr. Fowler did not go into the field to survey at all?—A. I stated that he did not go into the field to survey; but I had stated in my direct examination what I know of this matter as being what Mr. Fahringer told me. I do not know anything else about it.

Q. When did Mr. Fahringer tell you that?—A. When he came up to the office and turned in his notes.

Q. That was what time?—A. That was in the winter of 1874-'75.

Q. You knew nothing about his being in the field, except what Fahringer told you, did you?—A. I do not know of any other means of information I had. I do not think of any.

Q. That was late in the fall of 1874, was it not, that Fahringer came in and finished his contract?—A. After he had finished his work he came to the office, some time after, and turned in his notes.

Q. Late in the fall of 1874?—A. It must have been in the winter, I think.

Q. The winter of 1874-'75?—A. Yes.

Q. That was the time he told you that Mr. Fowler had not been with him a great deal?—A. He told me that Mr. Fowler had not put in a dollar or done any work, and that he was giving him $1,400.

Q. But they were both named in the contract?—A. They were.

Q. Are you positive he said he gave him $1,400?—A. Yes.

Q. You feel certain about that?—A. Positive.

Q. I believe you said Fowler was not a practical surveyor?—A. That is what I said.

Q. Do not you know that he was in the field the year before surveying in Colorado?—A. do; that is, I so understood.

Q. Why do you say, then, he was not a practical surveyor?—A. Well, if going into the field makes a surveyor, he may have been one; but I understand a practical surveyor is a man that understands surveying.

Q. Was not his name in the contract for Colorado?—A. It was.

Q. How did you know that he did not survey?—A. I got that information from Mr. Fahlinger; I was also told as much in the summer of 1873, by the chief clerk of the surveyor-general's office in Colorado.

Q. What did he tell you?—A. He told me that they had had some trouble there about Lessig's brother, and they would not pass him for a contract, and the chief clerk said he had to have it—that Curtis (who was the chief clerk in the General Land-Office) had a brother-in-law in Colorado who was in poor circumstances, and passing through Washington City he said to Curtis: "You have got a brother-in-law out there in Colorado." "Yes." "His circumstances are not very good?" "No," Mr. Curtis said, "he has been unfortunate." Then this chief clerk said to Mr. Curtis: "I don't know but we could do something for him in our office." "Well," he said, "I really wish you could." I said, "There is General Lessig's brother, who is a good surveyor; he is going into the field, and I think to put your brother-in-law in with him, they would make a good team;" and he told me that in that way he got through all right. The contract went through.

Q. That was told you by the chief clerk of the surveyor-general's office of Colorado?—A. Yes; his name I cannot recollect, but he has been chief clerk there for a number of years.

Q. Is it Ashley?—A. Yes; E. M. Ashley.

Q. In regard to Medary, you stated that he was not a practical surveyor?—A. If the committee will allow me, I will first finish what I was going to say with regard to this conversation with Mr. Curtis. In the winter of 1870, it was Dr. Reed's intention to put his nephew, Charles Reed, who was then chief clerk, into the field; and he came on to Washington, and when he got to Washington he wrote back that they told him in the Department that that would not do; that he must not put in a blood-relative, and that a contract under the Colorado office had been rejected because the brother of the chief clerk had appeared in it. In the spring of 1874 he wanted to put his nephew, Charles Reed, in the field—to provide for him in some way or other; and he did not know how to do it. I told Dr. Reed the conversation that I had had with Mr. Ashley; how Mr. Ashley had managed the thing in Colorado; related the whole circumstance to Dr. Reed, and I must have told him that in the fall of 1873. I know that in the spring of 1874, when Dr. Reed came back from Washington, he told me that he was going to give a contract to Mr. Fowler, from Colorado, who was a brother-in-law of Mr. Curtis; and during the time that the contracts were being let, he told me that he had a letter from Mr. Steele, the Delegate from Wyoming, in which Mr. Steele had told him that Mr. Curtis was very much dissatisfied; that he had better fix the thing up, or something of that kind; that Curtis was complaining. He immediately sent for Fowler, and Mr. Fowler came up.

Q. You recollect this very distinctly, do you, as to what Mr. Steele wrote to me?—A. I recollect that you told me so; I am not sure whether you showed me the letter or not.

Q. I think you said that Mr. Medary was not a practical surveyor when I gave him a contract?—A. I did.

Q. What did you judge from?—A. From my acquaintance with him, and knowledge of him—my knowledge of his being brought there, and my general understanding of the circumstances.

Q. Have you ever been a deputy surveyor?—A. I never have.

Q. Do you know that he did not survey any in the field?—A. I do not know that he did not survey any.

Q. Do you not know that he had had a contract prior to my giving him one, and that he had had a contract under Latham, and had surveyed it prior to my giving him one?—A. I am not sure whether he had it surveyed. He had one of Latham, and I think he was at work at that contract when you came back.

Q. What time did I come back?—A. To the best of my recollection it was in August, 1873.

Q. You say Mr. Medary had surveyed one before I gave him a contract?—A. He was surveying one; he had had one.

Q. Had his compass-man, Cary, ever surveyed any contract?—A. He had not.

Q. Was he a practical surveyor?—A. I think not.

Q. And yet you think he is the one that did the surveying instead of Medary, who had the contract?—A. I know that as well as I can know anything that I did not see on the ground.

Q. Did not Mr. Medary write all the notes; did they not all come to the office in his name?—A. In his name, yes; he swore to them all.

Q. In his hand?—A. No, sir.

Q. Well, the most of them?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is he not a very good penman—Mr. Medary?—A. He is.

Q. Is he not an educated, scholarly sort of man?—A. No, sir; I do not think he is a very scholarly man.

Q. An educated man?—A. He is a man of good address.

Q. Is he not educated?—A. I do not know what you mean by "educated."

Q. Please tell us how long you were employed as clerk in the surveyor-general's office at Wyoming.—A. From September, 1870—I think the latter part of September—until the 30th of April, 1875.

Q. You were appointed a clerk in the office by me?—A. I was, in 1870.

Q. Did you know anything about the duties of the office?—A. No, sir; I never had seen a surveyor-general's office.

Q. What was your salary first?—A. Twelve hundred dollars a year.

Q. When was it raised from $1,200?

(The chairman here suggested that questions as to the witness' salary were in no way relevant; that facts had been stated with respect to the participation of various parties in contracts under Dr. Reed, which parties had performed no services, and that if Dr. Reed wished to cross-examine the witness as to that branch of the investigation it would be pertinent.)

Q. You have stated that you were a clerk for a whisky man before I appointed you?—A. Yes; and I will state further that I had been at work for that whisky-man for about six weeks prior to that time.

Q. Is the chief clerk considered the confidential and trusted clerk of the surveyor-general's office?—A. He is the chief clerk, certainly; he has his duties the same as the surveyor-general.

Q. Is he not generally considered the trusted and confidential man in the office of the surveyor-general?—A. I suppose he is.

Q. Were you not intrusted with the office and keys of the desks in my office during my entire absence in Washington in the winter of 1874-'75?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did you get possession of the letter of John Delano that you have exhibited here, addressed to me?—A. That letter was placed in my hands by you, it must have been on the 10th of June, according to my memory.

Q. Do you state that I placed that letter in your hands at that time to keep?—A. You placed it in my hands to send that telegram, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Do you think it was placed in your hands to retain?—A. Well, I suppose it was a matter of public record.

Q. Did you understand that the deputies who took the work that I had allowed to Mr. Delano were dissatisfied in working it upon shares?—A. I never heard but one of them express any dissatisfaction; that was Mr. Hay. I believe one of his townships he did not survey at all, and for that reason.

Q. Did he express any dissatisfaction to you about it?—A. He made the complaint either to me or in my hearing—what I have said.

Q. Do you feel positive about that?—A. Yes, sir. I recollect that one of the townships that he was to survey he did not survey.

Q. Was that not because it was getting too late in the season?—A. No, sir.

Q. What was the reason—because it was too rough?—A. No, sir. He did not want to give Mr. Delano any of it. He did not feel like giving him the amount that he would have to give him, because it was too rough a township.

Q. You are positive about that?—A. Well, I am not stating exact conversations. I am positive that there was something of that kind passed in my hearing or to me. That was the general understanding.

Q. I think you said Hammond had but one contract?—A. It was in two contracts of different dates.

The CHAIRMAN. And different numbers?

The WITNESS. Yes.

By Dr. REED:

Q. This contract amounted to what?—A. Four thousand one hundred dollars was the liability.

Q. After he finished that work, had he not then another contract that season of $2,400?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you understand about that?—A. Nothing particularly.

Q. Do not you know that he surveyed that entirely in his own interest, and received all the profits from it?—A. Yes, sir; he did. I will state to the committee that Mr. Hammond had been working there for a number of years, dividing his profits with Charles J. Reed, the chief clerk—Dr. Reed's nephew—and he was a man that had to be propitiated.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. And that is the reason why he was given the two contracts?—A. Dr. Reed did not like him at all—had no use for him—but he had to give him something to do.

By Dr. REED:

Q. How do you know he divided with Charles Reed?—A. From what he told me and from what Charles told me, and from money that had passed through my hands.

Q. Had that come to my knowledge, do you know?—A. Well, they both told me that you knew it.

Q. Did I express any such knowledge to you?—A. Not to me. I know you were not generally in the habit of picking up strangers, unless they were of some use to you.

Q. Are not my standing deputies there good deputies?—A. Yes, sir; as deputies go.

Q. Do not you believe them capable—such men as Rogers, and Thomas, and Hay, and Reed—are they not capable deputies?—A. Yes, sir. Such men as Hay and Thomas. (that is, John Thomas,) and, I suppose, you would count Charles Reed competent.

Q. Did you not tell me in the fall of 1874, before I left there, when he brought in his last work on the mountain—the last let contract—that it was the best done up of anything you had seen?—A. I said that the field-notes were in the best shape of any that had been brought in.

Q. How about the diagrams of the survey?—A. Possibly the diagrams.

Q. Do you state positively that you have not the letter of Secretary Delano to me in October, 1874, in your possession?—A. I have not; I never saw it after you showed it to me.

Q. You never have had it in your possession?—A. I never have.

Q. You stated that you forwarded those papers that are now in question here to Mr. Bristow?—A. That is what I stated.

Q. Did you forward them by mail?—A. I did.

Q. Are you sure you did not send them down by Wolcott?—A. I am.

Q. Who suggested to you to forward those papers to Mr. Bristow?—A. I did that only on my own responsibility.

Q. What inducements, if any, were offered to you to take those papers and forward them to Washington?—A. None whatever.

Q. From no quarter?—A. From no quarter. I will state that nobody knew that they were forwarded until after they had been forwarded, except Mr. Corlett, my partner—an attorney whom I consulted. Mr. Corlett is a lawyer, and I consulted him.

Q. And no one promised you anything or offered you any inducement for it?—A. Nothing of the sort.

Q. Did not John A. Campbell, ex-governor of Wyoming, offer you any inducement or make any promise to that end?—A. Not in the least.

Q. Nor Joseph M. Cary, ex-judge of Wyoming?—A. No.

Q. Did not W. W. Corlett, an ex-postmaster of Cheyenne, offer you any inducement whatever?—A. Not the least. I will state that Mr. Corlett even advised against my sending them.

Q. Did not Frank Wolcott, Ex-United States marshal, offer you any other inducement?—A. No, sir; not in the least.

Q. Did E. P. Johnston, Ex-United States district attorney, offer you any?—A. No person at all.

Q. And Frank Wolcott did not conduct any negotiations with you about this?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did he not promise you in behalf of Governor Campbell and these other gentlemen that they would make it to your advantage to furnish them with those papers?—A. No, sir; nothing of the sort.

Q. Did not these gentlemen whom I have named, Campbell, Cary, Corlett, Johnston, and Wolcott tell you that they would fulfill any agreement that said Wolcott made with you for the purpose of obtaining said papers?—A. No, sir; they said nothing to me about it—had nothing to do with it in any way, shape, or fashion.

Q. Were you not promised, if the removal from office of Dr. Reed and Secretary Delano could be effected, said Wolcott, Campbell, Cary, Corlett, and Johnston would recommend and support you for appointment as surveyor-general of Wyoming Territory?—A. Nothing of the kind was ever mentioned in any way, shape, or fashion.

Q. I think you said these papers came back to you from Bristow last summer?—A. Last July.

Q. Did Mr. Bristow himself send them back to you?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you met and consulted Governor Campbell since you arrived in Washington about this matter?—A. I have not seen him; no, sir.

Q. No consultation with him?—A. No consultation with anybody except Mr. Mutchler.

Q. You say you have not seen him up to this time since you came?—A. I have not seen him, sir, nor communicated with him in any way, shape, or fashion.

Q. Has Campbell, or any of those other ex-officers whom I have named, advised you of the necessity of so testifying as not to inculcate them in any way?—A. No, sir; nobody has said anything to me about how I should testify.

Q. What did you state the date of the telegram was that I sent out relieving you from duty?—A. I think it was dated the 29th of April. It was received there on the 30th. I am not sure as to the date, but I know I left on the 30th, when it was received there.

Q. Who approved your salary-account for that fraction of the quarter at the time of your leaving on the 30th of April, 1875?—A. I did.

Q. Was I there?—A. No, sir.

Q. After you approved your own account did you not write a letter to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, in my name, transmitting your account, and make me state that your services had terminated by resignation, and while I was yet in Washington?—A. I did.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1876.

JOHN S. DELANO sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. You are a son of Columbus Delano, late Secretary of the Interior?—Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you occupy any position in the Interior Department during the time that your father was Secretary?—A. I occupied the position of chief clerk until the winter of 1872-'73; I think January, 1873.

Q. Was it 1873 or 1874?—A. 1873. In, I think it was January, 1873, I was taken sick, and discontinued my duties until the following summer—I should think in August, when, finding that I could not regain my health, I resigned.

Q. Was that August, 1873?—A. 1873, unless I am very much mistaken. I do not think I can be. The records of the Department will show if I am mistaken.

Q. Where did you go after you resigned?—A. I spent about a year in Minnesota, beginning with the summer of 1873. I spent the summer and winter there, leaving there in the spring.

Q. You spent the balance of the summer and the following winter there?—A. Yes, sir; leaving there in the spring of 1874.

Q. Did you return to Washington in the spring of 1874?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long did you remain in Washington?—A. It is a great while ago to be accurate about dates, but I should think I remained here until June. I was detained here in Washington by the sickness of my wife.

Q. And where did you go then?—A. Then I started West, after locating my wife for the summer.

Q. You started, then, in June, 1874, did you, for the West?—A. I should think it was June, 1874, my purpose being to go to Wyoming.

Q. Did you go to New York before you went West?—A. Yes, sir; I went to the White Mountains with my wife before going West.

Q. How long did you remain in New York?—A. I think it was a very few days.

Q. From there you went to the White Mountains?—A. I took her to the White Mountains; from there I went West.

Q. What point West did you go to?—A. I was detained in Chicago unexpectedly, and from there I was obliged to go to Lake Superior to look out after some interests there that were giving me some trouble; from there I went to Saint Paul, and from there to Wyoming, according to my recollection at this late day.

Q. How long did you remain in Wyoming?—A. I was in and around that Territory for the better part of the summer and early fall; Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado.

Q. How long did you remain in the Territory of Wyoming?—A. I was there several times.

Q. On that trip, I mean?—A. Well, on that trip, backward and forward—I could scarcely give you an idea now—a very accurate one.

Q. Did you meet the surveyor-general of Wyoming Territory in Wyoming?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. At what point?—A. I was with him a great deal of the time there.

Q. At what point did you meet Dr. Reed?—A. I think I met him at Cheyenne, or at some point east of Cheyenne, in Wyoming.

Q. Did you not meet Dr. Reed at Saint Paul?—A. I think I never met Dr. Reed at Saint Paul.

Q. Did you not telegraph him to meet you at Saint Paul or some other place?—A. It is possible, but I have no recollection of it now. I know that I had been detained.

Q. Are you certain that you met him at Cheyenne on that trip?—A. I am not certain that I met him at Cheyenne; I think it more than likely I met him this side of Cheyenne.

Q. Did you go with him to Cheyenne?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long did you remain there?—A. Do you mean on my first going out?

Q. I mean on that trip, when you left the White Mountains and went out West in June, 1874, I think you say it was, or about that time?—A. Well, I think I staid a day at Cheyenne on that occasion.

Q. One day?—A. I think so. It is a good while ago to recollect dates with any degree of accuracy.

Q. Did you have any interest in any surveying contracts in that Territory at that time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In how many contracts?—A. I would not be able to state positively now—two or three small ones.

Q. Two or three small ones?—A. That is the best of my recollection—possibly more.

Q. What was that interest you had?—A. I believe it was a half interest.

Q. Did you obtain those interests before you went into the Territory?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In what way did you get them?—A. By invitation and solicitation of Dr. Reed.

Q. When did Dr. Reed suggest to you to take an interest in surveying contracts?—A. Some six or eight months before I did—possibly longer.

Q. Did he make the suggestion in writing to you by letter, or did you meet him?—A. He made the suggestion to me in writing, I being at that time in Saint Paul, and the doctor being very anxious to have me come to the plains, insisting that it would restore my health more certainly and more rapidly, and he suggested this surveying contract as an occupation more than as a matter of profit.

Q. Are you a practical surveyor?—A. No, sir.

Q. You never learned the art of surveying?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever give a bond as surveyor?—A. I have forgotten whether I gave a bond or not.

Q. Did you ever sign a contract?—A. No, sir; I think I neither signed a contract nor gave a bond.

Q. Did you take the oath required by law?—A. If I did not sign the contract I did not take the oath.

Q. Then you neither took the oath, signed the contract, or gave a bond?—A. I should not now want to state positively that I did not or that I did. I left the whole matter to Dr. Reed to arrange when I found it to be impossible to be there at the time required.

Q. With whom were you interested in contracts in this Territory of Wyoming?—A. With parties who did the work, and with Colonel Merriam, of Saint Paul.

Q. Can you name the parties or any of them?—A. Mr. Hammond was one of them I believe; Mr. Hays was one, and I think that was all.

Q. Were there any others besides Mr. Hammond and Mr. Hays?—A. As I said before I do not recollect now the number of contracts that I was interested in.

Q. Dr. Reed made the arrangement with these gentlemen for you?—A. When it was ascertained that it was impossible for me to get there in time he made the arrangement with the parties, and my recollection is that he drew upon me, or that he wrote me indicating the amount of money necessary to put into the outfit, and I sent him a check. It was either done by his draft upon me or my check to him, in order that the work might go on before it got too late.

Q. Did that check or draft contain the amount necessary for the outfit for each one of these surveyors with whom you were interested, or did you send out checks and drafts?—

A. My recollection is that they were different checks. I know Dr. Reed wrote me that the work of one contract must go on at once.

Q. To whom were these checks and drafts made payable?—A. To Dr. Reed, according to my recollection.

Q. And upon what bank were they drawn?—A. I could not tell. I kept two or three bank-accounts.

Q. Where did you keep your bank-accounts at that time?—A. I think they were drawn upon bank-account at Mount Vernon, Ohio, but that is a matter of memory.

Q. Did you keep an account with Mr. Merriam at Saint Paul at that time?—A. No, sir; I had no account with him.

Q. Had you an account with any banks in the city of Washington?—A. Not at that time, I think.

Q. What other banks were there in which you kept accounts at that time?—A. If it was not on the Mount Vernon, it must have been on Lenard, Suttan & Co., of New York. I may have sent that to him in a draft.

Q. Your recollection is that there was a separate check or draft drawn for the outfit of each one of the deputy surveyors with whom you were interested in contracts?—A. I cannot say that it was for each one. I know positively that the first surveying party that went out I sent a draft or check, or paid a draft of Dr. Reed for an amount sufficient to pay for the outfit of the party.

Q. That party was Dr. Hammond's?—A. That I do not recollect. I have a poor memory for names.

Q. Did you ever meet Mr. Hammond?—A. I think so.

Q. When?—A. I think I met Mr. Hammond on the cars when I first went West with Dr. Reed.

Q. Before or after you had the interest in the contract?—A. Afterward.

Q. You never saw him before?—A. Never saw him before.

Q. Then there was no contract between you and Mr. Hammond?—A. All of those details were arranged by Dr. Reed.

Q. The contract was made by Dr. Reed with Mr. Hammond?—A. Yes, sir; allowing that that is his name.

Q. And he was required to give the bond, sign the contract, and take the oath and do the work?—A. I should not want to make affidavit now, sir, about that; I may have taken the oath.

Q. You have already stated that you neither took the oath, gave a bond, nor signed a contract?—A. I have stated that I thought I did not. My recollection is that I did not.

Q. You were not out there when this contract was commenced?—A. No, sir.

Q. And you could not have given a bond or taken oath?—A. No, unless it was sent to me. I think it was not. My recollection is that it was not. I would not want to state positively. I would like to say that at the time I had contemplated going out West, I was very much annoyed and distressed with the sickness of my family and my inability to go there, and under those circumstances Dr. Reed transacted all that business for me, and the details of it he can give you exactly, where I might make mistakes.

Q. Was it your intention, in the event that you could go out West, to have given a bond, signed a contract, or taken an oath as a surveyor?—A. My intention was to go into the field; my agreement was that, as one of the parties.

Q. In a contract?—A. In a contract, yes, sir; to furnish the money, to do the work, give the bond, take my gun and fishing-tackle, and, at least, get my health back.

Q. You were aware of the fact that the surveyor-general could not lawfully give a contract to any person who was not a skillful surveyor?—A. Not exactly in the sense you would apply to it here; one of the parties in the field must be a practical surveyor.

Q. The deputy must be a practical surveyor by law?—A. Yes; but suppose there were two deputies.

Q. If there were two or a dozen deputies, they would all have to be practical surveyors, would they not?—A. I do not understand the law in that way. It is not so interpreted by the Department. It is a very common thing that one of the parties in the contract is the party to furnish the money, and the other the practical surveyor.

Q. Is it a common thing for a person not a practical surveyor to obtain a contract in his own name?—A. I might say that it was a very common thing. I should think so; I so understood it.

Q. Then I understood you to say that the only reason you had for not signing the contract, taking the oath, and giving the bond, was because you could not get out there in time to do it?—A. Yes, sir; it was my purpose to spend the whole of that summer in the surveying camp.

Q. To take contracts in your own name?—A. In my name with a partner who should be a practical surveyor.

Q. Did you write a letter from the Interior Department to Dr. Reed, in which you stated that he should not put your name in any contract, but should put that of General Merriam in?—A. I did; that letter has been published in nearly every newspaper in the country. I have seen the original two or three times since it has been floated.

Q. (Showing the letter.) Is that the letter?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then if it was your intention to sign a contract yourself, take the oath, and give a bond, why was it you wrote to Dr. Reed telling him to put in the name of General Merriam to stand for you?—A. At that time you will observe, sir, that I found myself unable to go out. My expectation was that Mr. Merriam would be out there long before me, and he was.

Q. The only reason you had for asking Dr. Reed to put Merriam's name in the contract was that you thought he would be on the ground?—A. I did not say that was the only reason.

Q. What were the other reasons?—A. Well, Mr. Chairman, when it was found impossible for me to get out there, the contract could not have been taken in my name because I could not go into the field at that time.

Q. Is that the reason, then, why you wanted Merriam's name in—because you could not go in the field?—A. I say that is one reason; I am a little modest about the use of my own name.

Q. What is the other reason?—A. You might ascribe it to modesty, perhaps; I think it is allowable.

Q. What time was that contract let to Mr. Hammond; was it before or after the date of your letter?—A. I would not like to be positive on that point, for I was a regular correspondent with Dr. Reed, writing him every few days.

Q. And was not the contract made out simply in the name of Mr. Hammond and Mr. Merriam's name not put in it at all?—A. I think it was, because Mr. Merriam did not go there in time, as I recollect now. Neither Mr. Merriam nor myself were there in time to go into the field.

Q. Mr. Merriam did not go there at all, did he?—A. O, yes, sir; he was in that country all the summer.

Q. Did he go to Cheyenne?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Before the contracts were let?—A. I think after, sir.

Q. Did he have a contract of his own?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. He resided in Saint Paul, did he not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He was a banker?—A. He has no fixed business. He was out of business, and, like myself, in very poor health at the time. My object in associating Colonel Merriam with me was simply for company; that we might go out together and rough it out on the plains.

Q. He was not a surveyor, was he?—A. No, sir.

Q. In what way did you get your share of the profits of that contract? I mean who paid that share to you?—A. I do not recollect how it was done now, sir.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Hammond gave two notes, one of $1,000 and one of $400, payable to Mr. Merriam, or not?—A. As I said, Dr. Reed arranged all the details of those contracts—both the outfitting and settling of the contracts. On those questions I would not like to give very positive answers.

Q. Can you tell in what way you obtained your share of the profits of the contract?—A. It was by check or draft from Dr. Reed, I think. I know that there was no effort made to conceal the receipt of the money in any way. It was not then regarded as a dishonorable or a doubtful transaction.

Q. If there was no effort made to conceal the transaction why was it that the two notes for your share of the contract were made payable to General Merriam and not to yourself?—A. I suppose it grows out of that suggestion of mine to make Merriam the active party in that contract—out of my message.

Q. There was no necessity for your being on the ground to get the notes, was there? Dr. Reed could take the notes in your name without your being present?—A. Yes, sir; I presume so.

Q. Then these notes were not made payable to General Merriam because you were not on the ground?—A. Probably not.

Q. Why were they made payable to him; to conceal the transaction? Is not that the fact?—A. By no means.

Q. Why, then?—A. I say probably on account of my suggestion, in my letter to Dr. Reed, that the contract should be given to him. Probably he made the notes payable to him on that account.

Q. But you have stated his name was not put in the contract?—A. Yes, sir; because it could not be.

Q. And that your name was not put in because you were not on the ground?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And his name was not put in, and no one's name put in but Mr. Hammond's?—A. A. Yes, sir, because neither Colonel Merriam nor I were there.

Q. Now, Mr. Hammond gave two notes, which covered your share of the profits of his contract; those notes were made payable to John L. Merriam. That was not because John L. Merriam was present and you were absent?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then why was it done?—A. If my answer to that question before is not sufficient, you will have to ask Dr. Reed. I can give you no better reason than I have. It is really a question that I have no right to answer. I wrote to him suggesting to him to put the contract in Colonel Merriam's name. Colonel Merriam was not there; he could not do it; and I suppose he took the notes in his name on that account.

Q. Was there an understanding between you and Dr. Reed that your name should not appear in the papers?—A. None except what you have there. As I recollect, that was the only mention made on that subject except when Dr. Reed met me, I think in Washington, and repeated his invitation to come out there. He then told me that he had talked with the Commissioner of the General Land-Office about my going, and about taking a contract in my name, and on account of my modesty I objected to having it done in that way. There was no desire or design to do anything improper or wrong.

Q. Is this [showing Exhibit A] the draft that you received for the proceeds of the profits of the Hammond contract?—A. Yes, sir; that is my signature.

Q. That draft was paid to you?—A. Yes, sir; that was paid to me.

Q. Is that all the money you received from that contract—what is contained in that draft—the amount of it is $895?—A. My recollection is that that was all. Will you let me look at that draft again? [After looking again at the draft.] I could not state at this day the precise amount that I received from any of those contracts.

Q. Was not the precise amount that you received from the Hammond contract $1,400?—A. I should think not; but I should not, as I said, want to state the exact amount of any of them now.

Q. And did you not direct Dr. Reed to pay the balance, being $505, to the treasurer of some mining company as the assessment made against you, and did not Dr. Reed pay that assessment for you with the $505, the balance of the money?—A. I do not think that the profits of the Hammond contract amounted to so much as that. I should think that it did not, but I may be mistaken about that.

Q. Do you or do you not remember whether these notes were made payable for your use?—A. In the details of that matter I would rather you examined Dr. Reed. As I said, he managed the whole business when it was found that I could not go there, and these questions of detail he will have to state.

Q. You have stated already that, at your request, the name of John L. Merriam was put in the papers, or that you requested it was to be put in, but that it was not put in the contract, and the only place it does appear is in the two notes.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you not know, then, that the name of John L. Merriam stands there for your own name?—A. I presume that it does. Mr. Merriam may have made contracts that I do not know anything about. I do not imagine he did.

Q. If it does stand for your own name, then your share of the profits of that contract was $1,400?—A. It is quite possible. As I said before, on the question of amounts, I can only give my best recollection. The amount transmitted to me represents the profit of my share and the money advanced.

Q. Now, try and remember—was not the balance of the money, over and above the draft, appropriated by Dr. Reed to the payment of an assessment made against you on account of some mining stock that you held?—A. I paid so many mining assessments that I can't say. At what date would that be?

Q. It would be, I suppose, about November, 1874—about the date of the draft.—A. It may have been done so.

Q. Now, sir, what service, if any, did you render that might enable you to receive this amount of money in the contract given to Mr. Hammond?—A. You have the whole statement before you, sir. You can judge of the amount of service I rendered.

Q. You rendered none?—A. I do not say that I rendered none. I advanced the money on the outfit necessary, and the work was thoroughly done.

Q. Was there an understanding between you and Dr. Reed that the contract should be let at the maximum sum?—A. No, sir.

Q. You never requested Dr. Reed to let the contracts in that way?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know what amount of money was received by Mr. Hammond out of this contract?—A. I do not recollect either the amount of money received by Mr. Hammond or myself. I had memorandums of those amounts. After the contracts were closed, I destroyed my memorandums.

Q. As to the Hays contract, what amount of money did you receive from that?—A. I could not be more explicit in that than in the other transaction.

Q. You do not know how much you received from that?—A. My recollection is that I received from all those contracts about $2,500—possibly a little more, possibly a little less. I certainly could not have received over $3,000. As to the amount for each one, it is impossible for me now to be exact. The aggregate I remember quite distinctly: it would have been under $3,000—probably $2,500.

Q. At what time in the year did you part from Dr. Reed—you say you were traveling together in the West?—A. I saw the doctor several times during the summer and fall. Do you mean the last time?

Q. Yes, sir; when you parted and when you came to Washington.—A. I did not come to Washington from the West for nearly a year after that; but I went from there to California.

Q. Did Dr. Reed go with you to California?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did he go with you to Utah?—A. Yes, sir; I went with Dr. Reed to Utah twice, I think, during that summer and fall.

Q. Were you in the city of Washington on the 20th of April, 1875?—A. I could not tell that at the present time.

Q. Do you remember meeting Dr. Reed in Washington in the spring of 1875?—A. I don't think I met Dr. Reed last spring at all, either in Washington or elsewhere—wait—I did meet Dr. Reed here in the winter or early spring. It must have been earlier than that.

Q. It was in the latter part of April, was it not?—A. I should say it was earlier than that. I recollect now of seeing Dr. Reed last winter or spring.

Q. When you met Dr. Reed in Washington, did you know that Mr. Stevens had sent this draft and other papers to Secretary Bristow, with a request that he lay them before the President?—A. No, sir.

Q. You did not know that?—A. No, sir; I did not know that until the present moment, since you tell me.

Q. You did not know until the present moment that these papers were ever received by Secretary Bristow from Mr. Stevens, a clerk in Dr. Reed's office, and by him given to the President?—A. I have heard a great many stories about those papers. I do not know, and I do not care to know, how they were received by the President.

Q. Do you say you did not know at the time that the President had those papers?—A. No, sir; I did not know.

Q. Did you or not tell Dr. Reed, upon his arrival at Washington from Saint Louis, in April, 1875, that the President had the papers containing the evidence of your interest in contracts in his Territory?—A. I do not recollect of seeing Dr. Reed that late in the season. Dr. Reed was here in the winter. It is possible I may have notified him as soon as I learned it myself. The probability is that I would do so.

Q. You say, then, that the probability is that you did tell Dr. Reed that the President had these papers?—A. When I was advised so; but whether that was in April or May I do not know now, and I have no recollection now at the present time of seeing Dr. Reed about that time. If Dr. Reed was here at that time, and I knew of the papers in use in that way, I would have told him.

Q. But you say you have no recollection of the fact that you ever did tell him?—A. I do not recollect it now. Something might recall the interview to my mind, but I do not recollect it at the present time. If he was here, and I knew of the papers being with the President, I should have told him.

Q. Did you not know that the President had the papers?—A. At that time?

Q. At any time.—A. O, yes, sir.

Q. How did you learn it?—A. I read it in the newspapers.

Q. And you never knew it until you saw it in the newspapers?—A. I have been told many stories about those papers. I think I was told by half a dozen parties a day, before it came out in the newspapers, of their being there. About that time I was notified by a great many parties that such papers were in the hands of the President.

Q. Was that before or after Dr. Reed arrived in the city?—A. Well, I do not recollect of Dr. Reed's being in the city about that time.

Q. Do you recollect having a conversation with Dr. Reed at any time about these papers, and telling him that the President had them?—A. O, yes, sir; I think I do.

Q. When did you have that conversation with Reed?—A. I either notified him verbally or by letter of that fact.

Q. Do you know whether Dr. Reed was in the Territory at the time his clerk sent these papers to Mr. Bristow?—A. Can you tell me when Dr. Reed was here?

Q. I think he swears he was here on the 28th of April, 1875.—A. Can you tell me when these papers were published first?

Q. No, sir; I cannot tell you that.—A. My recollection is, and it is only a recollection, that when these papers were published, Dr. Reed was in Saint Louis. Now, whether I met him here and told him of their being with the President, or whether I wrote him that they were with the President, I do not recollect. I should, however, swear pretty positively that I did not see him here the last of April; but if he was here I must have seen him, and if I saw him I must have told him of the fact, providing the publication was made prior to that time. For those dates I could not be positive now.

Q. Do you remember who the person is who first told you that the President had these papers?—A. No, sir; I do not; but my recollection is it was somebody who got it from some newspaper man—a reporter. I was told a number of times about the time they were made public.

Q. Did you ever have a talk with the President about the matter?—A. Never.

Q. Did you at any time have possession of the papers while you were here in Washington?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see them at any time?—A. I have seen them several times since they have been going the rounds.

Q. Where did you see them the first time you saw them?—A. I should want to refresh my memory on that subject before making a positive answer on it.

Q. Do you say that you do not now recollect where you saw them the first time?—A. I would not like to state positively.

Q. What is your impression, if you have any, as to the place where you saw them the first time?—A. I would rather refresh my memory a little and endeavor to make my answer more definite before I make any on that subject.

Q. If you have any impression we would like to know what it is as to the place where you first saw these papers?—A. I have not an impression positive enough to state it in testimony at the present time. Many of these matters of dates and places of importance I cannot state accurately without recalling some of the attending circumstances.

Q. Were not these papers in possession of the President when you first learned that they had been sent to Washington?—A. They were either in his possession or about to be put in his possession. I heard a number of rumors and reports, and people would come to me and tell me that they heard such and such stories about these papers on Newspaper Row, and all that sort of thing. The papers might not have been in the President's hands when I first heard of them.

Q. Were not they in the President's hands when you first saw them?—A. Not in his hands, but they had been placed in his hands in all probability before I saw them.

Q. Were they not in his possession when you first saw them?—A. I would not like to state that positively. The probability is that they were. I do not know when they were handed to him. I did not take enough interest in it to care one way or the other.

Q. Now, sir, who showed them to you?—A. Do you mean the first, second, or third time?

Q. I mean the first time you saw them, who showed them to you?—A. That question I would not like to answer now.

Q. We must insist that you answer that question.—A. I should like to recall some of the attending circumstances in regard to those letters before I put myself into print or on paper about it. There is nothing that I desire or intend to conceal. I do not care enough about it. You are welcome to all that I know about the subject.

Q. The question is, who first showed you these papers? You can either tell who it was, or you can say you don't know.—A. At the present time, I would answer that I do not know positively.

Q. Was it or was it not some person employed at the Executive Mansion?—A. I was going to say, if you will leave that question to a later day until I ask one or two questions to refresh my mind, I will then give you all the information that I can pick up on the subject.

Q. We desire that you answer the question now, if you can.—A. I cannot now answer it satisfactorily, but I will do so positively, after having asked one or two questions as to dates. There is not anything about it but what you are welcome to know, and I will give you the positive information in regard to it. I would rather answer the question when I can do so positively.

By Mr. BOONE:

Q. What is there that can refresh your recollection on that point that you have not got now?—A. This fact, that I had been told so many times about those letters and papers, and by so many different parties, and there are two or three occasions on which I have seen them, so that I cannot answer without asking at least one of the parties where it was, and when it was, that I first saw them. If you give me time to do that, I will answer the question positively. My recollection is that I first heard of those things being in the President's hands when in New York.

By Mr. MUTCHLER :

Q. The question is not when you first heard that they were in the President's hands ; the question is who first showed them to you ?—A. If you will wait a little while, I will answer that question clearly and definitely.

Q. Do you say that you cannot now remember who showed them to you at any time ?—A. No, sir.

Q. You do not know whether it was any person employed at the Executive Mansion or not ?—A. Would you rather I answered these questions to the best of my recollection, than to wait a day and let me give you positive information ?

Q. Yes, sir ; and if you find you have made a mistake you can come back and correct the error.—A. I would rather you let the question run to to-morrow.

Q. We would rather have your impressions or recollections now ; as, I say, we will allow you to correct them to-morrow if you find you have made a mistake.—A. My recollection is that they were shown to me first by some one connected with the White House.

Q. Who is that person ?—A. It was probably General Babcock.

Q. Was that before or after Dr. Reed came to the city ?—A. As I told you, I had no recollection of Dr. Reed's being in the city at that time. I recollect of his being here in the summer. He may have been here, and if his testimony is that he was here, he must have been here, but I do not recollect of his being here at that time.

Q. Was not that the first intimation that you had of the papers being in Washington ? I mean at the time when General Babcock showed them to you.—A. No, no, sir.

Q. You knew it before that ?—A. I knew it from a dozen parties before that.

Q. Had it been in the papers before that ?—A. That I could not say.

Q. Do you know what time of the year it was when you think General Babcock showed you the papers ?—A. I could not even tell you the month it was in.

Q. Was it in the spring of 1875 ?—A. It was in the spring—last spring.

Q. The month of March or April ?—A. I could not tell now, sir. It is a matter that I did not take much interest in anyhow. The President or the public are welcome to these papers.

Q. Do you remember having a conversation with Dr. Reed in which he told you that he had been to see the President in relation to these papers—a conversation here in the city ?—A. I recollect very well of seeing Dr. Reed after he had had a conversation with the President on this subject, but whether that was in April, or May, or June, I cannot say.

Q. It was immediately after he had had the conversation with the President ?—A. Yes, sir ; and I think it was soon afterward at any rate.

Q. Did Dr. Reed then tell you that he had telegraphed to his clerk—Mr. Stevens—asking him how Campbell obtained “Delano's letters to me” about surveys ?—A. I was trying to recall my interview with Dr. Reed. There has been so much said on this subject that it is difficult to locate it all. I think I recollect the doctor's telling me that he had suspended Mr. Stevens, or some one in the office who, he thought, had made improper use of his records. It is possible he may have mentioned the telegram and probable that he did. If he sent it, undoubtedly he told me of it.

Q. That was after his interview with the President ?—A. That I could not say.

Q. Did Dr. Reed tell you that the President said to him that he would give you those papers ?—A. He may have said so. I had no desire to have the papers, and had made no request for them.

Q. Did you make any request for them after the doctor told you the President said he would give them to you ?—A. No, sir ; I made no request ; never made a request for them.

Q. Did you make any effort of any kind to get them ?—A. No, sir ; I made an inquiry once about them.

Q. From whom ?—A. I think from the President's secretary.

Q. General Babcock ?—A. Either he or whoever was acting at that time.

Q. What did you inquire about ?—A. I think I inquired if the letter was there.

Q. Is that all ?—A. Yes, sir ; I never asked for it.

Q. Did you inquire whether he had any instructions from the President to give you the papers ?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have any interest in surveying-contracts given by Surveyor-General King ?—A. No, sir.

Q. In Minnesota ?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or Charles T. Brown ?—A. No, sir ; this is the only surveying-contract in which I have ever figured.

Q. You have never figured in any other ?—A. No, sir, directly or indirectly ; I think I shall, though.

Q. Did you have an interest in any contract given to a gentleman by the name of Du Bois, who lived in this city ?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you use your influence to obtain a contract for him?—A. No, sir; I had not much influence to use.

Q. Do you know anything about his having a contract?—A. I know that there has been such a contract in the Interior Department, in the Land-Office, I think, for surveys of the lower country, if it is the same man as the gentleman I have in view.

Q. Do you know Mr. Du Bois?—A. I should not know him if I saw him. I have no acquaintance with him.

Adjourned.

WILLIS DRUMMOND was examined as follows :

By Mr. REED :

Question. What is your name and residence?—Answer. My name is Willis Drummond. I reside in Washington.

Q. You have been Commissioner of the Land-Office in this city, have you not?—A. I was Commissioner from about February, 1871, to May, 1874.

Q. Do you remember my consulting you about the month of February, 1874, as to the propriety or impropriety, if any, of uniting Mr. John Delano with a practical surveyor in a contract for surveying land in Wyoming?—A. Yes, sir; I remember a conversation that we had some time in the latter part of the winter of 1873-'74.

Q. Please state what your opinion was which you gave to me at that time in regard to the matter?—A. You said that you had considered the matter of letting Mr. John Delano have an interest in a contract to go out with a surveying party with a view to recruiting his health; he had been at that time in very bad health for a year or two, suffering from consumption; you expressed the opinion that if you could get him out there and connect him with a surveying party, letting him camp out during the summer, that it would cure him, and you asked me if there would be any impropriety in your allowing him to have an interest in a contract with a competent surveyor. I told you that there would not, as Mr. Delano was then disconnected with the Department, having resigned his position, and no longer holding any official connection with the Department, that I did not see that there would be any impropriety in it. The question then came up in some way as to how this should be done, whether it should be done as an open transaction, using his name, or whether he should be allowed an interest in the contract without his name being used. I told you that if it was done at all, it must be done openly, that his name must be used in the contract, and that you should treat him the same as anybody else; that I did not know any reason why he should have the contract because he was Secretary Delano's son, and, on the contrary, I did not know any reason why he should not have the contract because he was Secretary Delano's son, but that I would not approve any transaction unless it was an open transaction in Mr. Delano's own name, he appearing as deputy, and entering into the contract the same as anybody else. That was the substance of the conversation.

Q. It was understood between us that if I gave a contract to him and another competent party you would approve the contract?—A. Yes, sir; I told you that I never had interfered with the letting of contracts by surveyors-general in advance, because I had to hold them responsible for the discharge of their duties: that I never dictated to them in that matter, but that I saw no reason why, if you thought it best to let John Delano, in conjunction with a competent engineer, have a surveying-contract out there, I should disapprove it. On the contrary, I felt inclined to approve it. I said I had no objection to it.

Q. Do you remember whether you in your time adopted the regulation of approving surveying contracts before their execution?—A. No, sir; I think that was done prior to my time.

Q. That practice existed before that time?—A. Yes, sir; they had to be sent up here for approval. I am not sure, but I think that was by act of Congress. I think it was provided by act of May 3, 1862, that it should not become binding upon the United States until approved by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office.

Q. Were you in the practice of requiring at least the name of one skillful or practical surveyor in each contract?—A. Yes, sir. I found after I took charge of the office that there had been a very loose practice on the part of certain surveyors-general; that they had appointed men without any knowledge of the business, and that the surveys were executed very poorly in some instances. I issued regulations in 1873, I think, requiring that they should let their contracts to men of practical experience in the business, and I declined after that to approve any contracts unless one practical man who had had practical experience in the business was connected with those contracts. I issued a circular-letter of instructions to surveyors-general, forbidding their letting contracts except to that class of men.

Q. Do you remember to have ever disapproved or revoked any of my contracts either for that or any other deficiency?—A. No, sir; I never, to my knowledge, disapproved of any of your contracts.

Q. Please state how many copies of each contract have to be signed by the deputies.—A. I think they are signed in quadruplicate.

Q. How many oaths are there taken upon each contract?—A. There is an oath for the faithful discharge of duty, and I think there is also the iron-clad oath.

Q. On each contract up to the quadruplicate?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many copies of township plats, including the original, of each township have to be made by the surveyor-general before the accounts of the deputy can come to the General Land-Office, and does a copy of all field-notes and one plat of each township have to come with the said accounts?—A. The plats are to be executed in triplicate, one for the General Land-Office, one for the surveyor-general's office, and one to be sent to the local land office. One copy of the plat has to be sent to the General Land-Office for examination before the deputy's account can be adjusted.

Q. Do you remember whether you revoked a contract made by my predecessor, Dr. Latham, in the months of June or July, 1873, because neither of the parties to the contract were practical surveyors, or known to your Department?—A. I did not revoke a contract, I disapproved one; it was disapproved because it was shown in the report of the surveyor-general that neither of them had ever had any practical experience in surveying.

Q. If I had sent you a contract with a competent surveyor, who had become a practical, good, trusty surveyor by practice in the field, would you have disapproved it merely because he was my nephew; and to that extent my blood relative?—A. No, sir; the law does not prohibit contract because of relationship; but I ought to state this to the committee: in the history of the office, it appears that upon one or two occasions surveyors-general let contracts to their children—to minors. In other words they farmed out the business of the administration to their own immediate families. That was considered objectionable by the Commissioner, and I would not have approved contracts where a man had farmed out to his own children, and to his own immediate family, but I should not have rejected a contract because it had been let to a relative, if that relative was not a member of his own family.

Q. A nephew you would not object to?—A. No, sir; the object would have been to have got a good surveyor without regard to the question of relationship. I should have objected to the kind of transaction which I speak of where a surveyor-general, as was done in one or two instances, farmed out contracts, as I understand, to his own children, some of them being minors. That is, he farmed out the business of the office, keeping it all in one family.

Q. I have testified here, under oath, that I offered Mr. John Delano an ordinary-sized contract, or a first-class contract for surveying, which means, with my office practice, a contract of from $5,000 to $5,500, he to be united with a practical surveyor; that I took one Mr. Hammond, with an equal amount, say $2,000 to each, in a contract as a partner with Mr. Delano; that I waited some days or a week for the arrival of Mr. Delano; that on the 19th or 20th of May, 1874, Mr. Delano not coming and Mr. Hammond being ready to start to the field with his men and his outfit, I signed the contract with him, he giving a sufficient bond; that he drew on Mr. Delano for his part of the advance expenses, and started to the field, enjoining upon me not to interrupt or stop him if possible. Mr. John Delano did not reach Wyoming and insert his name before I was obliged to forward the contract to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office for approval; that I retained the contract some weeks waiting for John Delano to reach there, and that he failed to reach there before the time elapsed which made it necessary to forward the contract to the Department for approval. I now wish to ask you whether, under such a state of facts, I ought to have recalled that deputy, Mr. Hammond, from the field, on finding that Mr. Delano did not reach there before I was obliged to send the contract away for approval; and if I did not recall him, whether I should be censured for carrying out his verbal arrangement involuntarily dividing profits with Mr. Delano, the same as if Mr. Delano's name had been in the contract. I present two points: whether you, as Commissioner of the Land-Office, think I should have recalled the deputy, or whether I should have interfered in the matter?—A. With the permission of the committee I would say that, under those circumstances, I do not think you ought to have recalled the deputy, unless he was immediately by and could be recalled without great loss to him. If he was a competent deputy, he should have been permitted to go on and execute the contract. Of course it was then a contract with a single individual as it stood on the records. If he saw proper to divide the proceeds with John Delano after that, that was a matter of his own, and it was a matter in which I should say you had no right to dictate to him or to control him. You should not after that have dictated to him anything about the division of the spoils. If he saw proper to do so voluntarily, it was a matter with which you had nothing to do.

Q. This was entirely a voluntary matter, and so considered, and was continued to the very end?—A. It would have done no good to the Government, and would have done injury to the deputy to have recalled him at this stage of the proceedings.

Q. Please give to the committee whatever your opinion may be of the character and fidelity of both the office and field-work of Dr. Reed as surveyor-general, and what you believe to be his fidelity to the interests of the Government as surveyor-general, and whether you ever confided to him important duties in his official capacity in other places than his own district of Wyoming.—A. So far as Dr. Reed's record, while I was Commissioner of the Land-Office, was concerned, it was unobjectionable; he holds the reputation of being a very competent and faithful surveyor-general. His work came up to my office in good shape, and always, I believe, without exception, proved satisfactory. He had the reputation of being one of the most efficient and competent surveyors-general in the service at the time I was Commissioner of the Land-Office. Because of that reputation I selected him, at the instance of Mr. Delano, to make an examination of some work that was performed in the State of California in relation to a private land-grant. The Secretary wanted it examined, and I selected Mr. Reed with reference to his qualifications as a surveyor, as well as his reputation as a faithful surveyor-general, to perform that work.

Q. Did I perform it to the satisfaction of the Government?—A. Yes, sir; I believe so, entirely.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. I understood you to say that all you required was that one of the parties named in the contract should be a practical surveyor?—A. Yes, sir; I say that is all the regulation of the Department requires. I have brought with me, for the purpose of showing that fact, the regulations issued by one of my predecessors. An extract therefrom reads as follows: "When two deputies enter into joint contract for a certain service and only one of them goes into the field, if that one with a single surveying party executes all the work in person, his affidavit alone as surveyor, attached to the field-notes, will be deemed sufficient; and no impediment to the payment of his accounts will result therefrom." That was issued in 1864.

Q. Do you understand the law to require that contracts shall not be let to any persons except such as are skillful surveyors?—A. The language of the law is, I believe, that the surveyor-generals shall select skillful surveyors as their deputies. That is the old act of 1796.

Q. There is no other law except that, is there?—A. No, sir; there is no other law except that, that I know of, on that point. I do not remember any.

Q. Do you also understand that it is necessary for surveyors to give a bond and take an oath?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And also to sign a contract?—A. Yes, sir; the deputy exists by virtue of his contract. It is not an office by commission, but exists merely by contract.

Q. Do you consider a surveyor-general as complying with the law who would let a contract to two men and require only one of the deputies to take the oath, sign the contract, and give the bond, and at the same time have him joined with a party who was not a skillful surveyor, who was not required to give a bond, to take the oath, or to sign the contract, and who did not appear in the Territory at all or upon the land that was to be surveyed? Would you nevertheless approve that contract?—A. No, sir; I do not say so. I was speaking of where two deputies entered into and executed a contract—that it had been the practice of the office, and probably in accordance with the spirit of the law, if not in accordance with the exact letter of the law. I found it had been the practice of the office, almost from time immemorial, to let a contract to two men, requiring one to be a competent surveyor to take charge of the compass and execute the work.

Q. Did you require the two men to sign the contract?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And to take the oath?—A. There are two or three different elements entering into the consideration of a contract. One is the capacity and fitness for the work, and the other is the financial responsibility. Another thing that we find in practical experience in surveying, is executive capacity to manage a lot of men in the field. Those three qualifications constitute a good surveyor. We frequently find in practice that where a man possesses the technical skill to survey he does not possess the financial responsibility, and I suppose in that way the practice grew up of allowing a financial man to be connected with a skillful surveyor. That practice is so old that I do not know exactly how it originated. I suppose, however, that that was its origin, and I found it in operation when I entered into the Land-Office, but we always required the parties interested, so far as we knew anything about it at the Land-Office, to execute the contract or appear upon the face of it.

Q. That is, both parties?—A. Yes, sir; and that kind of a contract, I have no hesitation in saying, I should have approved where it appeared to me that there was one man capable of taking charge of the work, because there was a number of kinds of work that the other man could have done. He could have carried the flag, or the chain, or anything of that kind. It was not necessary for more than one man to be a skillful surveyor in a surveying party.

Q. Had you known that Mr. John Delano had a half interest in the contract let to Mr. Hammond, would you have approved that contract?—A. I should not have approved an arrangement by which one man was to have an interest in the contract without appearing as a party to it.

Q. Then I understand you to say that you would not have approved the contract of Mr. Hammond?—A. This contract was made after I left the office, and of course I had no official connection with it. It was something that I never heard of until it was published in the papers here some months ago.

Q. How long after you advised Mr. Reed that he might connect Mr. John Delano with a competent surveyor in a contract in his territory, did you leave the office of Commissioner?—A. I left the office the next May.

Q. Was that one year afterward?—A. No, sir; it was in February that we had the conversation.

Q. Then you did not, of course, approve that contract or agreement?—A. No, sir; I never knew anything in the world about it, and never heard of it until this affair was published.

Q. But you did advise Dr. Reed that you would approve a contract let to Mr. John Delano, if he would connect with Mr. Delano a practical surveyor?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You meant by that that Mr. Delano should go into the Territory itself, execute the contract, and connect himself with it in every respect according to the regulations of the office?—A. Yes, sir; according to the regulations of the office as the law had been construed from time almost immemorial.

Q. Do you remember approving a contract let to a man named Medary?—A. No, sir; I have no recollection of it.

Q. Do you remember that a man named Medary was one of Dr. Reed's deputies?—A. I have heard so, but I have no recollection of it.

Q. Was that during the time you were Commissioner of the Land-Office?—A. I think it was.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Medary was a practical surveyor or not?—A. I do not. Up to 1873 there was no regulation requiring the surveyors-general to report as to the qualifications of their deputies. They sent contracts, and unless some objection appeared, I think they were approved; but in 1873 I, having had the experience of the year or two before with deputies entirely unsatisfactory in regard to the execution of their work, issued regulations requiring the surveyors-general, whenever they sent to me a contract, to send up a report as to the qualification of the man employed, showing where he had been employed as a surveyor, and what duty he had performed in the field. After that time all contracts which were approved by me were approved upon that kind of a report. But up to that time there had been no report made under the regulations of the office, and consequently I might have approved contracts when they were let to men who were inexperienced without knowing anything about it. The old system did not work to my satisfaction, and I introduced new regulations.

Q. I understand you to say, then, that if you had known Mr. Medary was not a practical surveyor, you would not have approved that contract?—A. I would not, if it was let to him without association with a competent surveyor.

Q. Did you know that the Medary contract was really let to Orvil Grant?—A. No, sir; I never knew Orvil Grant had any interest in a contract while I was in the office; I never heard of him in connection with any contract while I was Commissioner of the Land-Office.

Q. Do you remember approving a contract for two surveyors named James and Rodgers?—A. No, sir; I have no recollection of them. The chief of the surveying division always examines. Of course, in an office where there were 200 clerks, I could not examine into details. The chief of the surveying division was charged with the duty of examining, and he brought the contract to me with an approval indorsed, or brought a report to me, saying that it should not be approved. That was under general regulations which I had prescribed to him in the discharge of his duties. If he brought a surveying contract to me to sign I considered that he had made the necessary examination, unless I had some information or suspicion, and signed it without further examination.

Q. Suppose that you had been apprised of the fact that the contract let to James and Rodgers was really given to a person named Houghton, who publishes a newspaper at Galena, Ill., and who was not in the Territory at that time or any subsequent time, would you have approved that contract?—A. No, sir.

Q. You would not have approved it, although James and Rodgers were practical surveyors, had signed the contract, taken the oath, and given the bond?—A. I never did approve a contract let for the benefit of anybody who did not participate in its execution.

Q. You would not have approved it simply because they had agreed to divide the profits with a man who was taking none of the responsibility and doing none of the work?—A. I should have disapproved it for that reason.

Q. When you said to Dr. Reed that you saw no objection to Mr. Delano participating in the profits of the contract, you meant by that Mr. Delano should go into the field himself, did you not?—A. Yes, sir; the conversation was that Mr. Delano's health would be benefited by going into the surveying party and taking a summer's campaign with the party. That was the idea that was advanced to me. I knew the condition of Mr. Delano's health for the year past, and knew that it was considered by the doctors to be dangerous. I also knew the anxiety of his father as to his state of health. I said to Dr. Reed that I did not interfere with him or with any other surveyor-general in the matter of letting contracts in advance, but that now that John Delano was no longer connected with the Interior Department, but was a private citizen, I saw no reason why, if he wished to do so, he should not let a contract to him the same as to anybody else, if he united him with a practical surveyor who could perform the service, and that if he saw proper to let such a contract, using John Delano's name, and having him participate in the execution of the contract, that I would not object to it, but would approve it. But I told him at the same time that I would not approve any secret arrangement for John Delano's benefit, where he was not to participate in the thing.

Q. If you had known that Mr. John Delano wrote to Dr. Reed a letter in which he requested the doctor to omit his name from the contract and to insert the name of another party who was also not a practical surveyor, would you have approved that contract?—A. No, sir; I should have said the doctor ought not to have let a contract in that way.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the Secretary of the Interior about his son going into the Territory to do surveying?—A. After this conversation with Dr. Reed I thought the matter over, and came to the conclusion that perhaps, as he was the Secretary's son, the Secretary might object to his having anything to do with the contract, publicly or privately. I went to the Secretary and stated what Dr. Reed had proposed, and what I had told him. I told him that I thought inasmuch as he was his son, and that he (the Secretary) was the head of the office, it was my duty as chief of the Land-Office to state the facts to him. I told him I could not see any impropriety in making an open transaction of the kind, but I thought after reflection it was my duty to name it to him. He expressed himself as thankful for the interest we had taken in John Delano, but at the time objected to any such arrangement, and I never talked with him afterward. He would not approve it at that time and I never spoke to him again about it, and never had anything further to do with it nor heard of it again.

Q. You left the Land-Office before the contract was to be let?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was your successor?—A. Mr. Burdette.

Q. Is he the present Commissioner?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. REED:

Q. If I mistake not, you were asked the question if both deputies were bound to appear on the field of survey?—A. They are not bound to appear by the regulations of the Land-Office; I was only stating what the purport of our conversation was. The purport was that John Delano was to go out and accompany the party, and to camp out with it during the summer. That was the idea. And according to the regulations of the Land-Office a contract might be let to two men, one of whom might execute it in the field, although the other was not required to go.

Q. There was some regulation of your Department at one time that one might not go to the field at all, was there not?—A. Yes, sir; that was the regulation of 1864, to which I have called the attention of the committee. It was provided that if both did not participate in the contract, the one who did should take the oath as to the execution of the work. It recognized the fact that there might be a contract with two parties, one of whom was not to be personally present at the execution of the work.

Q. The practical man to go to the field?—A. Yes, sir; as I said a while ago, I suppose that grew out of the necessity of having one man connected with the contract who was financially responsible.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That man, of course, was required to give the bond?—A. Yes, sir; both parties were required to give bond to execute the contract, but one of them, according to the regulations that then existed, need not go into the field. I never approved any contracts unless the parties all appeared in it, during the time I was Commissioner of the Land-Office; that is, I never knowingly approved any such.

By Mr. REED:

Q. Did it make any difference as to the validity of the contract or the interest of the Government whether both those names appeared in that contract?—A. No, sir; the Government could only look to the man who appeared; the Government would have nothing to do at all with the outside party. For instance, you spoke of a contract with John Delano and Mr. Hammond; now, so far as that contract was concerned, the Land-Office could only treat it as a contract with Mr. Hammond, and pay Mr. Hammond, and they would have nothing to do with John Delano.

Q. Did the Government suffer any wrong, by means of John Delano's name not getting into that contract?—A. If the work was executed correctly there was no loss to the Government.

Q. Can you recall to mind the fact which existed in your Department, that Mr. Medary was given a contract in partnership with one of the Downers in June, 1873, by Dr. Latham, my predecessor?—A. I have no recollection of it. I have no doubt but that appears on the records of the Land-Office, but when you come to call upon me for my recollection, I have no recollection of these different contracts. There were hundreds and hundreds of them let every year, and of course I, having supervision of the work with 200 clerks, could not look into these details and charge my mind with them. I could only lay down general regulations which governed the clerks, and required them to work up to those regulations. If I found a clerk not so doing I dismissed him. I have no particular recollection of that contract. But if it was let early in 1873 it must have been let by Dr. Latham. He was surveyor-general in the spring, up to July or August; I do not remember which.

Q. If Mr. Delano wrote a letter which was received at my office about the 30th May, 1874, stating that he could not reach there, and requested me to use another name in the contract in his stead, you know, I suppose, that I could not do that under the regulations of the office?—A. No, sir; you could not do that, because the man had to be there to execute the contract, and take the oath.

Q. If I did not do that, and Hammond was permitted to go on with his contract in the field, and survey, and return, and hand over to Mr. Delano half of the profit of the contract, half of which was his (Hammond's) and half Mr. Delano's, and he did hand over such half, who was harmed in that transaction?—A. I should say Hammond was the only man who was harmed.

Q. If he did it voluntarily, how would it be then?—A. It was simply a diminution of the profit from his contract. It was not anything that the Government suffered if he executed the work according to the contract, but if he paid John Delano one-half of the profit, of course his profits were diminished to that extent.

Q. Do you esteem that a hardship to an old deputy of several years standing, especially if he did it voluntarily?—A. My idea about a contract is that all the parties ought to be connected with its execution; but if I voluntarily enter into an arrangement with a man to advance money toward an outfit, and I am to account to him for a part of the proceeds, or to pay him an enormous rate of interest, that that is a transaction between ourselves. I have been informed that deputies sometimes paid three and four per cent. a month for interest out in the Western States, and that they sometimes gave the party to advance money a certain proportion of the proceeds, but those are things that I knew nothing about. I do not consider that connected at all with the contract with the Government. The only contract that the Government knows is with the party who appears on the papers.

Q. But if old deputies, long in the field, who had made it a business for several years and profited by it, saw fit to take an outside man in with them, and did so voluntarily, dividing with such man some of their profits on a certain occasion, is the surveyor-general to be censured for not interfering?—A. If the surveyor-general is not a party to it, he is not liable to censure, because that is a matter of private transaction between individuals, that he is not presumed to know anything about.

Q. Would he be considered a party unless he exacted it and made a compulsory matter of it?—A. No, sir; unless he exacted it of his deputy, he could not be considered a party to it. As I have said before, if after this transaction grew up in this way, you held the contract for the purpose of having it executed by John Delano, as long as you could, and then returned it to the Land-Office for approval; after that all you had to do was to treat Mr. Hammond as the contractor, and if you did not interfere and dictate a division of the spoils, I should not hold you at all censurable.

Q. If Mr. Hammond, on leaving for the field, drew on Mr. Delano for his quota of money necessary to be advanced to go to the field, that would make the case between them still stronger, would it not?—A. Yes, sir; of course, as between them, that would create an equity which Mr. Hammond could respect if he saw proper.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What are the prices for surveying township division-lines?—A. They vary in different Territories and different States.

Q. What was the maximum in Wyoming, if you remember?—A. I think it was about $10 a mile.

Q. And it ran down about how low?—A. I do not remember whether it was $7 or $8; it depends altogether on the nature of the country.

Q. I know that prices vary in different Territories, but was not $10 the maximum for division-lines in Wyoming?—A. I do not remember that.

Q. Taking it for granted that $10 was the maximum, did you approve all contracts for the maximum price where there were different prices for division-lines of townships?—A. I had to leave that to the discretion of the surveyor-general. I could not tell anything about the ground that was to be surveyed.

Q. The surveyor-general could let the contract at the best price he could have the work done for the best interests of the Government, and that was his duty, was it not?—A. Yes, sir; it was for him to determine what the prices should be.

Q. Suppose that Mr. Hammond had agreed to survey these division-lines for $7 a mile, provided he was to receive all profits or all the money on the contract, and that Dr. Reed gave him the contract at $10 per mile, provided he would divide equally all profits with John Delano, was anybody hurt by that transaction?—A. Yes, sir; the Government would be hurt by it to the extent of $3 per mile.

Q. If Mr. John Delano could realize $1,400 profit out of one contract, it is very likely that Mr. Hammond could have surveyed that contract, had he been permitted to retain all of the profits himself, for a lower sum than $10 a mile, is it not?—A. It would be very difficult to determine, in advance, in a country like that, exactly what a man could do. They have to take surveys somewhat on speculation; a man sometimes goes out, and, taking a series of townships, makes a very fine profit. Then, again, the same man will go out and take a contract at the same amount and either lose money or make very slight profit, owing to the variation of the ground, the gulches, inequalities, &c. Hence the contract is generally let with a view to close drawbacks. If a man happens to get smooth ground, he makes a very fine profit out of the contract; if he happens to get rough ground he sometimes loses, or perhaps just clears himself. I have known deputies who have made nothing during a whole season's work, and others on a contract of the same size would make a very fine profit, striking a smooth piece of ground.

Q. You have no means of knowing at the time contracts are sent you for approval what the condition of the land is?—A. No, sir; and it is hardly ever known at the surveyor-general's office. If the surveyor-general happens to travel over a piece of land, he knows what it is, but generally these surveys are made at remote distances from the office, and in fields which have not been fully explored.

Q. Do you know whether it was customary in all the Territories for surveyors-general to let contracts at the maximum price?—A. Yes, sir; they generally did it.

Mr. REED. There is no other price; there is only one price stated for each kind of work.

Mr. DRUMMOND. I will state that it was the general practice of surveyors to let contracts for the price fixed by Congress.

Mr. REED. There is but one price stated by Congress for each kind of work.

Mr. DRUMMOND. I can see how Mr. Mutchler gets the idea of maximum price. The acts of Congress say not exceeding $10 per mile, so that there may be a lower price at the discretion of the surveyor-general.

The CHAIRMAN. And also at the discretion of the contractor. If he goes into the office and says he will make a contract to survey at $5 a mile, it is the duty of the surveyor-general to let him a contract at that rate.

Mr. DRUMMOND. That could be done if you could get honest and responsible men to do it at a low rate, but sometimes these parties would bid low for the purpose of executing their work imperfectly in the field, and the lower rate would not therefore pay. That practice has been tried.

The CHAIRMAN. It is only reasonable to suppose that Hammond would have executed this work for less than $10 a mile, when we know that he agreed to divide the profits equally with John Delano, a man whom he never saw and with whom of course he never conversed, but with whom the arrangement was made simply at the suggestion of the surveyor-general.

Mr. DRUMMOND. I suppose that if he had got all the profits he could have afforded to take it at a little less sum of course.

By Mr. REED:

Q. Can you figure to your mind what state of things would be produced in the department of the surveyor-general if he attempted to give a portion of his deputy's work at $10 a mile, and another portion of work at $7 a mile?—A. It could not be done unless there was a clear, well-defined distinction between the tracts of country that were to be surveyed. For instance, if you were letting a man a plain known to be a plain, and letting at the same time to another man a tract of country known to be mountainous and full of gulches, there you could draw a distinction, but, as I have heretofore stated to the chairman, these things are not generally known in advance. It is only after survey that the character of the country is determined, and consequently in letting contracts you have to let them all alike.

Q. Do you suppose that a surveyor-general could get along without a mutiny among his deputies if he gave contracts at one price to one and at another price to another?—A. No, sir; not unless there were well-defined distinctions in the character of the country. For instance, in Oregon that is done. Take a heavily-timbered district, and there they get a higher rate per mile. Take a prairie or plain, there they get a lower rate, but it is equally acceptable and creates no difficulty, because one man makes as much money as another, and in fact more, because the man who works on the plain, although he has a lower rate, has a better contract.

Q. If this work, in which Mr. Delano was interested, was 400 miles by railroad away from my office, as I can show that it is, was it the duty of the surveyor-general to go out there, hunt over that ground, and pick out the best of it, and put it at $7 a mile?—A. No, sir; it was your duty to let the contract according to the law, and let the deputies run their chances.

Q. Do you know of a single contract ever coming to the Department from those Territories let at less rate than is stated in the law?—A. No, sir; I do not know of one, nor do I remember one. As I have stated heretofore, it is the uniform practice of the surveyor-general to let the contract at the price fixed by Congress.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That is, you mean by that, at the maximum price fixed by Congress?—A. Yes, sir; at the maximum price. I have stated heretofore that the Government did not lose anything by the operation of this special contract in question, for the reason that the contract would have been let at the same price in any event to somebody else.

Mr. REED. Yes; I esteemed it nobody's business, and it was not anybody's business.

By the CHAIRMAN [to Mr. Drummond:]

Q. Do you consider that it is an honest transaction for the surveyor-general of a Territory to let a contract to a person who gives no bond, signs no contract, takes no oath, who does not even come into the Territory, and who never saw the ground which he was to survey, at the maximum price, in order that he may participate in the profits, without ever rendering any service?—A. No, sir; I have stated that I would not have approved any such transaction as that, and would not approve it now.

Q. Is it not in your judgment a violation of the law?—A. It is a violation of the spirit of the law, undoubtedly, or rather of the letter of the law, if not of the spirit.

Q. It is not an honest transaction, is it?—A. I should not say that it was a correct transaction to farm out a contract for the benefit of a party who was not connected with it.

Q. If Mr. Hammond or any other practical surveyor was willing to accept a contract, with the understanding that he was to divide one-half of the profits with a man who had rendered him no service and could render him no service, and take none of the responsibilities connected with the contract, is it not altogether likely that Mr. Hammond would have surveyed that ground at a lower rate than the maximum fixed by law?—A. That may be so.

Q. And if he would have done so, then the money that the silent partner received was money taken out of the United States Treasury, to which he and no other person had any right. Is not that the fact?—A. If an arrangement was made by which one man was to take a contract in his name and execute it for the benefit of another who did not participate in it, or furnish anything or connect himself with it, then I would say that the Government might suffer, and that it was an improper transaction; but, coming back to the doctor's question as he presented it to me, according to my understanding, his arrangement was that John Delano should go into this contract and execute it; and that he entered into the arrangement with Mr. Hammond on that basis and on no other. That is the reason I answered the question as I did. But if Mr. Reed had entered into an arrangement by which he was to let a contract to Hammond for John Delano's benefit, with the understanding that John Delano was never to come to the Territory, never to execute the contract, or participate in it in any way, then I would say that that was an improper transaction.

Q. And that the Government would suffer for it, would it not?—A. Yes, sir; but that is not the transaction I understood from Dr. Reed's question. As I understood him, he arranged to let this contract to John Delano and Hammond, and they were both to unite in it and participate in its execution.

Mr. REED. Yes; but I explained to you that after waiting for some weeks for him to get there, he did not come; that Hammond could not stay longer at Cheyenne with his hands hired; that he was obliged to go; that he drew on John Delano for money, and that Mr. Delano participated to the extent to which he asked him for such money.

The WITNESS. I answered you by saying, in that transaction you acted correctly in sending that contract to the Government for approval, and that after that you had nothing to do except to recognize it as a contract with Hammond, and if you did not dictate a division of the spoils with John Delano, there was no impropriety about it.

Mr. REED. That has not been shown and cannot be shown; but let me understand one point more. You have been asked if it was not a dishonest transaction to let any other deputy come in and take a portion—

A. [Interrupting.] No, sir; I do not understand that I have been asked that. The question was this: that if you had made an arrangement to let the contract to Hammond, for instance, with the secret understanding that John Delano or any other man who did not reside in the Territory, but who resided perhaps a thousand miles away, was to participate in the profits without appearing in connection with the contract, or executing it, or doing anything about it, if it was not a dishonest transaction? My reply was that I would consider that an incorrect transaction, and it would not be proper to do it.

Mr. REED. Is that a parallel case with anything in hand?

Mr. DRUMMOND. That is a case which Mr. Mutchler puts to me as a case made up in his own mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The evidence makes such a case.

By Mr. REED:

Q. Mr. Hammond drawing on Delano for money before he went to the field, and receiving all the money that he requested from Mr. Delano, would that not affect or change the case in your opinion?

Mr. DRUMMOND. As I have said, that created an equity between John Delano and Mr. Hammond as individuals outside of the Government. That is a matter for adjustment between them, and with which you as surveyor-general had nothing to do.

By Mr. REED:

Q. If I made no interference in the matter, it was proper for Mr. Hammond to carry out his voluntary arrangement with Mr. Delano, was it not?—A. Yes, sir; it was proper for him to do so, if he wanted to do so, or proper for him to repudiate it if he desired.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That is, if Mr. Hammond ever had a voluntary arrangement with Mr. Delano?

Mr. DRUMMOND. Yes; but that I do not know anything about.

Mr. REED. It has not been shown to the contrary.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand it, it has been shown that Delano and Hammond never had any communication, and never met.

STEPHEN J. DALLAS sworn and examined.

By Mr. REED :

Q. State what that book is, [handing book to witness.]—A. That is a manual of surveying instructions, prepared under the act of Congress to reduce the expenses of the survey and sale of the public lands of the United States, which was passed May 30, 1862. That act validated the manual of surveying instructions issued by the General Land-Office as law, requiring that each contract entered into by the surveyor-general should be based upon the requirements in the manual of surveying instructions, and make a part of the contract of the parties to perform the duties as required in the manual of surveying instructions.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. What is your present position?—A. I am now filling the position of principal clerk of surveys in the Interior Department.

Q. How long have you held that position?—A. About fourteen years.

Q. What are your duties as principal clerk of surveys?—A. To instruct surveyors-general under the laws passed by Congress for the surveying of public lands, receive returns of surveys, and examine the contracts entered into by surveyors-general with their deputies. When the work is returned to the surveyor-general and approved by him, that work is sent to the General Land-Office, and my duty is to examine whether it is well performed in accordance with the laws and with the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office as contained in that manual; also to attend to the liquidation of the payment of the accounts of the deputy surveyors who perform their work. The Commissioner of the General Land-Office certifies to the First Comptroller of the Treasury all those accounts.

By Mr. REED :

Q. Does this printed manual of surveyors' instructions set forth a complete system of instructions to the deputy surveyors as well as to the surveyors-general?—A. Yes, sir; up to a certain period. It was prepared and continued in force until May 30, 1862, when additional instructions, under date of June 1, 1864, were issued under new additional laws which were not provided for in the original manual of surveying instructions.

Q. Are those contained in your supplement?—A. Not everything. The old instructions did not provide for such requirements as the subsequent laws passed by Congress. Then this manual of surveying instructions was issued in 1864. The provisions therein are different, regulating all duties under the new law. The Commissioner of the General Land-Office was required to approve each contract, which had not been the case heretofore. Surveyors-general entered into contracts, but they had to send them to the Commissioner for him to approve or reject. It provided also that one deputy might get a contract, or two deputies join in a contract. One might survey and the other might not; the one surveying to swear to the field-notes. There is another provision that joint contractors, both going to the field and both surveying, shall swear to the parts of the work which each have performed, swearing that they have performed such work in accordance with the instructions contained in their contract. There is also another provision that in the joint contract one may be a moneyed man and advance the money merely; the other to execute the work in the field. Whoever executes the work has to make affidavit to the field-notes of the survey, which he returns to the surveyor-general, that he has performed the work in accordance with the contract. That is the addition which did not exist in the original manual of surveying instructions.

Q. If two deputies go into the field under a contract, and both survey, it is understood and expected that each of those deputies will have a separate company of men and a separate compass?—A. Yes, sir; and each man must make affidavit to his own work.

Q. I understand you to say that this printed manual of instructions to deputy surveyors contains a complete system of instructions to the deputy surveyor as to how he shall do everything in regard to his work?—A. Exactly—as to how he is to measure, how he is to run the lines; how he has got to mark the corners. It is all prescribed, not at random, jumping here and there, but the form which he is to follow is distinctly pointed out.

Q. In his oath to the contract the deputy is required to swear that he will follow all instructions contained in this manual of surveying, is he not?—A. Yes, sir; before he gets a contract he has to make affidavit that he will perform the duties in accordance with the law and instructions; and then, when he returns his work, he also has to swear, as the law requires, that he has performed those duties in accordance with the law and instructions; so that there are two affidavits needed—the first one before he goes into the field, and then when he returns, swearing that those are the original field-notes, and that they were executed in accordance with the manual of surveying instructions and special instructions, if any, from the surveyor-general. But those instructions of the surveyor-general must be in accordance with the law. The surveyor-general cannot give instructions which are not legal.

Q. When I was surveyor-general in Wyoming I issued nearly one hundred contracts. All those contracts came to the General Land-Office, did they not?—A. Yes, sir; every one of them had to come to the General Land-Office, or it was no contract. It is not binding unless the Commissioner of the General Land-Office approves what the surveyor-general of the Territory does.

Q. Were those contracts of mine all approved?—A. All were approved; there were about eighty-six or eighty-seven of them; some of them were made by your successor in 1873, I believe. Some seven or eight contracts were made by Dr. Latham, who was appointed in your place. The majority of the contracts, however, were entered into by you and submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office; they were examined by myself and assistants to see whether they were within the means appropriated for a particular surveying-district; whether they were in accordance with the per-mileage that was allowed, and whether they were in all other respects in accordance with law. The Commissioner then approved the contracts.

Q. You and your clerks are very familiar, of course, with all the contracts I made in Wyoming. State as to the character of the work returned to you under those contracts, the field-notes, plats, &c.—A. Your surveys in Wyoming Territory, which was organized in 1870, you being yourself an old surveyor, favorably known, were very satisfactory. We had no difficulty whatever with the contracts under you; everything was done in nice style, returns made, protracted in excellent taste, and very few irregularities discovered, those being clerical errors easily remedied. That was so, with the exception of one case, which was the case of Poland and another man named Cayton.

Mr. REED. That was not my contract.

The WITNESS. No; that was not yours. It was your successor's, Dr. Latham's; it was brought to light by you that they were deficient in some respects.

Q. It was improperly surveyed?—A. Yes, sir; that is, the mounds and posts were not of the proper size. You went to the field yourself to correct that, and the Government afterwards paid for it. You yourself have always manifested good judgment in the selection of your deputies, in my estimation, and we have never found anything objectionable.

Q. Could you judge from the accuracy and character of the field-notes and plats of the surveys, whether I had a competent set of deputies?—A. Yes, sir; we never found any trouble as we did in other districts. All the records passed under my supervision before the Commissioner signed any letters or gave instructions. No objection was raised to your work, and nothing was found that was either fraudulent or irregular.

Q. Or incorrect?—A. Or incorrect; in all cases where you doubted whether you could approve the surveys, or doubted as to the proper way of carrying on surveying, you have applied to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, and he has given you the proper instructions for the performance of the business.

Q. Do you remember in the case of the first or second contract I gave out in Wyoming to an old, experienced deputy, that I had a year or two of trouble in correcting it?—A. That was the case of Cook. I recollect that you sought instructions from the office.

Q. I sought instructions frequently, did I not, in this case?—A. Yes, sir; he was surveying in the western part of your district.

Q. Do you know T. B. Medary, deputy surveyor?—A. Yes, sir; he was deputy surveyor in Wyoming. He had contracts there in 1873, '4, or '5.

Q. Have you ever seen him?—A. Yes, sir; I saw him when he made returns. He was deputy surveyor, also, in Dakota Territory. He had a contract for surveying the Indian reservation. The contract was entered into by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office for Indian surveys, by direction of the Secretary of the Interior. He made returns in person to the office. We had to examine those surveys ourselves, and the Commissioner approved them, and not the surveyor-general, for the reason that they were Indian surveys.

Q. What is your belief as to his fitness or competency as a deputy surveyor, judging from his work and from your personal observation?—A. I was not sufficiently familiar with him to judge. He was quite an intelligent man. I do not know what his mathematical attainments were, or his education, but he looks a man of intelligence and education, and made a very good survey.

Q. Did you have any occasion to find fault with his surveys in the matter of the contract that I gave him?—A. No; I forget now whether you entered into a contract with him or Mr. Latham.

Q. Do you know Fowler and Farringer as surveyors?—A. Yes, sir; Farringer is an old surveyor, who has been in Colorado Territory, surveying, probably for five or six years. He had several contracts. He had a joint contract one time with Fowler. He also had a contract with you. Fowler and Farringer had contracts in Wyoming.

Q. Look over your record and state if you observe a contract from me to Fowler and Farringer in the summer of 1874.—A. I find that he had a contract with you July 24, 1874.

Q. What was the liability?—A. $4,200.

Q. Under what appropriation was that?—A. Under an appropriation of $40,000, act of Congress June 23, 1874, for surveys in Wyoming.

Q. Both their names were in the contract, which was a mutual contract, was it not?—A. Yes, sir; it was a joint contract.

Q. Have you any recollection of the character of their work as returned to your office?—A. It passed without any difficulty, but I could not say whether they did any better than anybody else.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Is that the only contract Farringer had in Wyoming?—A. Yes, sir. He had two in Colorado, the next surveying-district.

By Dr. REED :

Q. Do you find a contract among your records made to Medary and Downey in June, 1873? And if so, state by whom that was made with them.—A. I recollect that was by Latham, under an appropriation of $50,000, act of March 3, 1873. The amount was $4,300. It was under date of June 17, 1873. The number of the contract is 49.

Q. To whom was contract No. 50 given that season?—A. Contract No. 50, under the same appropriation, was given to M. N. Grant.

Q. What is the amount?—A. $4,800.

Q. Who was that given by?—A. By Dr. Latham.

Q. You have stated that the Commissioner approves all the contracts?—A. Yes, sir; or the Acting Commissioner, under the law.

Q. Do you know of any law or departmental regulation that prohibits the surveyor-general from giving a contract for surveying to his own nephew?—A. No; there is no law, but there was a circular issued by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office in 1867, I think, prohibiting surveyor-generals from entering into contracts with their immediate relatives.

Q. Do you mean sons or brothers?—A. Sons, and persons in the same family. That was on the principle that the surveyor-general might be biased in approving the work of his son, while he would not be likely to be biased if a stranger had a contract. There is, however, no law on the subject. It is merely for the good of the service.

Q. Is there any regulation prohibiting the employing of a nephew?—A. No, sir; we have never come across such a case. There was a case of a brother of a surveyor-general in Colorado, but the contract was not approved by the Commissioner.

Q. Is that, according to your recollection, as far as the regulation went?—A. Yes, sir; it referred to immediate relatives.

Q. Do you remember Charles J. Reed as having been a chief clerk for some years in my office?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember of his surveying for my office?—A. Yes, sir; you gave him a contract for the survey of public lands; one or two or three contracts, I think.

Q. That is in late years?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you recollect as to the character of work that he performed?—A. It was unobjectionable. No difficulty was found in his returns. In fact, surveys in Wyoming were unexceptionable, because the district was organized at a later period.

Q. By whom?—A. By Congress. You were the first appointed as surveyor-general. You were appointed from your familiarity with your business. You had been surveyor-general, many years ago, of Illinois and Missouri, and it contributed doubtless to that end, because you were known as a great disciplinarian, and sometimes bore pretty hard against the poor deputies. I noticed that anything that was then not in accordance with regulations you sent back into the field. That I gathered from correspondence with you.

Q. Do you understand that I inaugurated and executed those surveys from the start, in Wyoming?—A. You were the first surveyor-general. The duty of the principal clerk of surveys was to indicate and prepare instructions.

Q. There were no surveys in the Territory before I went there, were there?—A. No, sir. Thinking over that, however, a little prior to the establishment of the boundary between Wyoming and Colorado, surveys in Colorado proceeded northward and passed into what is now Wyoming, some few miles only, and into a few townships. Then when the boundary line was established astronomically, it cut certain townships which had been made in Colorado Territory; but not many surveys had been made before the organization of Wyoming Territory.

Q. Is it admissible with the Department to permit contracts by the surveyor-general to a man not familiar with surveying, providing he associates such a man with a competent surveyor?—A. No, sir; the rules and regulations require a man familiar with the system of surveying public lands.

Q. That is, in regard to the main deputies?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But where you associate a partner sometimes, how is it?—A. Under the instructions of June 1, 1864, a man who is not familiar with the surveying system may be a joint contractor, but he is not permitted to dabble in the surveys if he does not understand them. Deputy surveyors are generally short of money, and cannot furnish supplies, &c. They find some man who has money, secure him by associating him in the same contract, so that he is indemnified. If the office knew that a man did not know anything about surveys, a contract would not be approved. Frequently we have to call on a surveyor-general as to what evidence he had as to the ability of a man. If that was not forthcoming, the survey was not approved by the Commissioner.

Q. I believe you rejected a survey of that kind in June, 1873, did you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In that case neither of them had any knowledge of surveying?—A. That is the case, sir.

Q. But you never rejected where one was reputed as a good, competent deputy to go to the field?—A. No, sir; not if he could perform the work.

Q. How did my field and office work, and deputies, and everything connected with my office as surveyor-general, compare with those of other surveyor-generals of the mountain Territories?—A. Very favorably, sir. Everything that came from your office was in good shape. Field-notes were transcribed in very good style, and correctly. The township plats were protracted in a neat style, although it is not in all districts that the same can be said. There are some where the work is very poor. Artists cannot be obtained to represent the survey as neatly as yours have done.

Q. Look at contract No. 57 and state to whom it was given.—A. Medary and Grant.

Q. What was the date of it?—A. April 22, 1874.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What Grant was that?—A. M. N. Grant. The amount was $4,800.

Q. Under what appropriation was that made?—A. Act of March 3, 1873.

Q. Do you notice that, as a balance of an old appropriation of the summer before, there was no appropriation for that year then passed, was there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. There had been no appropriation on the 22d of April for that year, had there?—A. No; but the appropriation was of March 3, 1873, the date of the contract being April 22, 1864.

Q. Now in regard to contract No. 59?—A. It was under the same appropriation of 1873, to C. J. Reed.

Q. Of what date?—A. May 12, 1874. The liability was $1,800.

Q. Were Nos. 59 and 57 both made by me?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Look at No. 58, and state to whom that was made.—A. H. G. Hay and George R. Thomas.

Q. What is the date?—A. May 2, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $4,800.

Q. What appropriation was that under?—A. That was under an appropriation of $20,000, March 3, 1873, for survey of vacated, abandoned military reservations; that was Fort Bridger. It was a large reservation, twenty miles by twenty-five, selected by the President for some years, and afterward it was reduced under the act of Congress.

Q. State now in regard to No. 60.—That was a contract of Rogers and Lampton, May 18, 1874; ability, $3,700. That was for the military reservation under the special appropriation.

Q. State in regard to contract No. 62.—A. Sixty-two was of the same character, to J. Wesley Hammond.

Q. What is the date?—A. May, 20, 1874.

Q. State the liability.—A. $2,900.

Q. Under what appropriation?—A. Out of the $20,000 appropriation for abandoned military reservation.

Q. State in regard to contract No. 61. How much is the liability?—A. That is a contract to J. Wesley Hammond. It is dated May 23, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $1,200. That, however, was paid out of the deposit of the Union Pacific Railroad, under the act of Congress, of money to have their land surveyed.

Q. Now state as to the contracts after the 1st of July, under the appropriation of 1874.—A. The contract No. 63 is chargeable to the appropriation June 23, 1874; it is dated July 1, 1874; it is in the name of Charles J. Reed.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $3,000.

Q. Now as to No. 64; what is the date of that?—A. It is a contract of T. B. Medary, July 6, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $3,400.

Q. What is the date of contract No. 65?—A. That is with M. N. Grant; it is dated July 6, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $2,400.

Q. State now as to No. 66.—A. That is with Rogers and Lampton.

Q. What is the date?—A. July 9, 1874. The liability is $6,000.

Q. State now in relation to No. 68.—A. That is with Fowler and Farringer.

Q. What is the date?—A. July 14, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $4,200.

Q. State now in relation to No. 69.—A. That is with H. G. Hay.

Q. What is the date?—A. July 15, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $3,000.

Q. State now in relation to No. 71.—A. That is with J. Wesley Hammond.

Q. What is the date?—A. August 14, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $2,000.

Q. State now in relation to contract No. 72.—A. That is with Rogers and Lampton.

Q. What is the date?—A. August 14; the amount $2,000.

Q. State now in relation to contract No. 73.—A. That is with Henry G. Hay.

Q. What is the date?—A. September 1, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $2,100.

Q. State now in relation to No. 74.—A. That is with Charles J. Reed, dated September 1, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $1,800.

Q. State now in relation to No. 75.—A. That is with John D. Thomas.

Q. What is the date?—A. September 1, 1874.

Q. What is the liability?—A. $2,900.

Q. All these contracts that you have last referred to since we spoke of No. 63 are under the appropriation of June 23, 1874?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. I understand you to say that it is your duty, as principal clerk of surveys, to examine all the contracts as they come into the office, to see that they are in conformity with the law?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then, upon your recommendation, they are approved by the Commissioner of the Land-Office?—A. Yes, sir; I write an answer to the surveyor-general, and the Commissioner signs the letter of approval.

Q. What facts do you want to know in order to convince yourself that the contract which you are examining is in conformity with law? Do you gather all the facts from the face of the contract itself, or do you ascertain from outside evidence?—A. The intrinsic evidence of the survey, which we gather from the field-notes, showing where a man starts from, how he finds out the measures, &c., and seeing whether he is within the limits prescribed by the law.

Q. You misapprehend me. Is there a description of the land to be surveyed contained in the contract?—A. Yes, sir; by townships and ranges.

Q. That is all set forth in the contract?—A. O, yes.

Q. The person who takes a contract does not understand or know the ground, and never has been upon it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then he does not know anything about the country that he is to survey, except what he gathers from the contract itself?—A. Yes, sir; and the instruction which he receives from the surveyor-general. The surveyor-general has to furnish him, under instructions from the General Land-Office, the descriptions of corners of the adjoining lands, and he is to identify them, &c., so that he may not start from a wrong corner and mix up the surveys.

Q. Do you require to know whether the person named in the contract is a skillful surveyor or not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How do you ascertain that?—A. We have the list of the surveyors who have been in the business since the commencement of the system. We have their names. Whenever we find that a man is a new man, then we call on the surveyor-general to give us the information as to whether he is a capable man, and what evidence he has as to his ability; and before a surveyor-general gives him a contract he examines him as to whether he is familiar with the system, and has proper qualifications.

Q. Suppose there are two contractors; do you then only require that one of them should be a skillful surveyor?—A. We direct them both to go if they are skillful.

Q. I say, suppose there are two contractors named in the contract; say they are both strangers to you; do you require information as to whether they are both surveyors or not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Suppose you should ascertain that one of them was a shoemaker and the other was a surveyor, would you approve the contract?—A. Yes, sir; we would approve the contract, but we would not take the affidavit of the shoemaker.

Q. Under what law would you approve the contract where one of the deputy surveyors is a shoemaker and not a surveyor?—A. Under the law of May 30, 1862.

Q. Where do you find that?—A. It is contained in the manual of surveying instructions.

Q. What do you understand by the term deputy surveyor?—A. He is sent by the principal surveyor.

Q. Then anybody can be a deputy surveyor?—A. If he proves his qualification to the surveyor-general, he can.

Q. Then it is necessary, in order to be a deputy surveyor, that he must be an actual surveyor?—A. O, yes.

Q. You do not comprehend by deputy surveyor a person who never saw or handled a compass, do you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Not any more than you would say a carpenter was a shoemaker?—A. No, sir; we would not give a contract to such a man.

Q. Then how do you construe that law and say that two deputies means two persons who know how to survey, when you now say that you mean one deputy who understands surveying; when you say two deputies, do you mean two men who can survey?—A. That means that both may be surveyors.

Q. Can a man who is not a surveyor be a deputy surveyor?—A. Yes, sir; if he is associated in a joint contract.

Q. By what law?—A. By the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office.

Q. By the instructions heretofore referred to by you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If I were to send to you to build your house a carpenter and a shoemaker, would it be proper for me to say to you that I sent you two carpenters?—A. No, sir.

Q. When I send you two deputies, when one is not a surveyor and the other is, is not that the same thing?—A. Yes, but there is a qualification there.

Q. It says, "When two deputies enter into joint contract for certain work, and only one of them goes into the field, then that one shall be required to take affidavit." Now, I want to know how you construe that instruction to mean that only one of the two shall be a surveyor and the other may be anything else but a surveyor?—A. He is a joint partner in the survey.

Q. But he is to be a deputy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have already said that a deputy means a person who knows how to survey.—A. He would not be a deputy if he went there alone. But he is a partner. One furnishes the means and the other knowledge. It is admitted by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, whose instructions under the act of May 30, 1862, are tantamount to law.

Q. State whether you admit that one deputy surveyor must be a skillful surveyor.—A. Yes, sir; or a contract could not be had at all.

Q. But if you attach one deputy surveyor and a shoemaker together, does that make two deputies?—A. The instructions make them deputies.

Q. Those instructions to which you have referred?—A. Yes, sir; those instructions make them deputies.

Q. Please point out to me where it makes a shoemaker a deputy when he is attached to a deputy.—A. Here it is: "If two deputies, joint parties in a contract, both go into the field, each on a separate survey with a party, the field-notes must show clearly the particular surveys done by each deputy."

Q. What do you mean by each deputy?—A. That is, if both are surveyors and understand the business, they may have two parties or both go. One may take a compass and run the line, and the other will take sketching—the topography of the country, for instance.

Q. Suppose the other is totally incompetent to do anything of the kind?—A. Then he does not do it.

Q. Is he then a deputy, in accordance with these instructions?—A. With these instructions he is regarded as a partner in the contract.

Q. That is to say, when one man who is not a surveyor goes in partnership with another who is a surveyor, then he becomes a surveyor under the law—under these instructions, according to your interpretation of them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And according to the interpretation of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office?—A. Yes, sir; and the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office are recognized as tantamount to law.

Q. It is a very nice arrangement to let to people who want to make money and not do any work.—A. Well, no; it was intended in this way: Deputies do not get any pay from the Government for some time. They have to wait from six to eight months, and the money has to be advanced. They have not got it. They find somebody who has got money, and say, "If you will loan it to me, I will repay you. I am going to the field. You may go or not. If you want to go, you can go as chainman or axman, or something of the kind, or not." One of the parties thus advances the money to enable the deputy to purchase provisions.

Q. Does the one who advances money to a deputy become a deputy?—A. Yes, sir; in the acceptance of the office-ruling.

Q. Then all that is necessary, in the acceptance of those instructions, is for a man to advance money to a deputy to become a deputy?—A. Yes, sir; but if both of them were without experience, of course we would not give a contract.

Q. Suppose that A obtains a contract from Dr. Reed; that he signs the contract, gives a bond and takes the oath, and that B advances him some money. B's name, however, does not appear in the contract, he does not give a bond or take an oath. Is B a deputy surveyor?—A. No, sir; the Commissioner would not approve such a contract.

Q. Why?—A. Because if he is no surveyor, he would not approve his contract in his name.

Q. You approved the contract of Mr. Hammond, did you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you know that Mr. John Delano was associated with Mr. Hammond as a deputy when you approved it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Suppose that you had known that there was an understanding between Mr. Hammond and Dr. Reed that Mr. John Delano was to have one-half of the profits of that contract, would you have approved the Hammond contract?—A. No, sir; unless it was in the name of Hammond and Delano.

Q. It was not in the name of Hammond and Delano, however, was it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Would you have approved that contract if you had known in advance that Mr. John Delano was to receive one-half of the profits therefrom?—A. The contract would have been approved if we had known that Hammond was a good surveyor. He would survey, and swear to the field-notes. Delano might be a moneyed man or go in a subordinate capacity. Delano's name does not appear on the records. He has never been a surveyor.

Q. What is the maximum price per mile for surveying township-lines in Wyoming?—
A. $14 per mile.

Q. What is the price of division-lines?—A. Subdivisions, $10.

Q. These contracts of Mr. Hammond's were for subdivision-lines, I believe, were they not? Refer to the contract of $2,900, and the contract of $1,200.

Mr. REED. He had a good many township-lines besides, and also some timber.

The WITNESS. There were several contracts with Hammond; one was $4,318.73.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he not have two contracts in 1874?—A. Yes, sir; they were for subdivisional lines.

Q. Are the maximum prices $10 a mile?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever know Dr. Reed to let a contract for less than $10 a mile for subdivisional lines?—A. No, sir; I do not remember it.

Q. Did you ever know him to let a contract for any other work for less than the maximum sum?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is there not a great deal of difference in the topography of the country in Wyoming?—
A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there not a very material difference in some of the work which has to be done under the contracts?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Could not some of the contract-work be done for a great deal less than others?—A. Certainly.

Q. And yet all the contracts were let at the maximum sum, were they not?—A. I think so; but some of the rates may be inadequate, especially in the case of those who have to go to a great distance.

Q. Has it been the practice in all the Territories to let all the contracts at the maximum sum?—A. No, sir.

Q. Some contracts are let for considerably less than the maximum sum, are they not?—
A. Very seldom; but there are instances of that kind. In former years, when Mr. Wilson was Commissioner of the General Land-Office, we have said to surveyors-general, "This is the maximum, but you must try to get contracts for less." In some instances they could, but in the majority of cases they said they could not.

Q. You never knew Dr. Reed to give a contract for less than the maximum price, did you?—A. No, sir; I could not say that I ever did.

Q. Suppose that you had known, after Dr. Reed's contracts came in, that there were other parties who were to receive profits from those contracts, who were not surveyors, and who were not in the Territory; would you have approved those contracts at the maximum sum? I mean, there being only one man named in the contract. If you knew that that one surveyor took the contract, and could only get it upon his agreement to divide the profits with a gentleman, who was not in the Territory and who took none of the responsibility, would you have approved that contract?—A. No, sir.

Q. If not, why not?—A. Because we require payment to be made to the man who performs the work. Direct payment is to be made to the person who is contracted with.

Q. Would you not, however, have come to the conclusion that if the man who does the work could afford to divide the profits of the work equally with a man who took no responsibility and did no work, that that work could have been done for a much less sum than was mentioned in the contract?—A. It is their own arrangement.

Q. Answer the question, if you please.—A. Certainly.

Q. Suppose that this contract, let to Mr. Hammond for $2,900, was such a contract that $1,400 could be paid to a man who took no responsibility and who did none of the work, would you have approved that contract?—A. If we had known it the Commissioner would not have approved it; but these things never come to us, they transpire at a great distance from the office.

Q. Then you never inquire what the contour of the country is which is to be surveyed before you approve the contract?—A. We do not know in that particular.

Q. You do not know whether it is prairie land or cleared land, or whether it is woods?—
A. Yes, sir.

Q. You approve all contracts as you receive them?—A. Yes, sir. Our system is this: Townships are placed in their proper places, but we do not know whether they reach certain mountains or rivers, and we do not know how much the surveys will cost.

Q. You have to depend on the surveyor-general for that information, have you not?—A. The surveyor-general does not know that either. He does not know whether there are lakes or mountains which cannot be surveyed. Of course we do not require him to spend public money on mountains, which are not fit for agricultural purposes. Frequently deficiencies occur, because a contract stipulates so many townships and so much money. Sometimes they exceed, and sometimes they fall short, which is owing to the want of knowledge of the topography of the country.

Q. Do you know why Dr. Reed received the office of surveyor-general of Wyoming Territory?—A. I do not. The political affairs do not come to me. They are attended to by the Commissioner and secretary of the General Land-Office, and the chief clerk. I only attend to the surveying business.

Q. Did you hear that there was any complaint lodged against Dr. Reed for permitting Mr. John Delano to share in the profits of contracts out there?—A. It was merely rumor. I did not hear it from any responsible person who knew it of himself. There was a rumor in regard to that.

Q. At the time he resigned, or before that?—A. I do not know. I believe it was afterward.

Q. If that rumor was true, then, it was considered contrary to the law and the instructions of the Department, was it not? That is, if he permitted other persons to share in the profits of contracts who took none of the responsibility and did none of the work. Mr. Delano was not in the contract. Mr. Hammond was given the contract. Now, suppose Mr. Hammond was given that contract with the understanding at the time that he received it that he must divide with Mr. John Delano. If that had been known to the Department, what would have been the result?—A. The Department would not have approved it.

Q. Nor would you as chief clerk of the contract-office have approved that contract?—A. No, sir.

Q. For the reason that you would have thought that was in violation of law, would you not?—A. Well, I do not know that. If a man performs work and gets pay, and if he divides or gives away his earnings, of course that would not weigh with us.

Q. And suppose that when he is given a contract he is given to understand by the surveyor-general that he must divide with a man whom he never saw. How would it be then; that occurring, too, with a man who would not sign the contract, take the oath, or give bond?—A. He could not be recognized, of course, as a deputy if he did not do one thing or the other.

Q. Would the action of the surveyor-general be approved by the Department in doing that?—A. Not if it was known; and such a thing has never been brought to our attention.

Q. Then you never knew at the Land-Office that Dr. Reed was assisting John Delano by allowing him contracts in that way?—A. No, sir; we never knew anything about it. As I say, such matters the Department may have known of, and the Commissioner may have known, and the chief clerk may have known, but they reserve to themselves all such questions in regard to political appointments. They did not communicate such things. I never knew up to this time who the man was that did the work with Mr. Delano.

Q. Do you know Mr. Medary to be a practical surveyor?—A. He was a deputy surveyor.

Q. Do you know whether he ever went in the field?—A. He has gone in the field, because he swore to the field-notes. That is all the evidence we have.

Q. Do you know whether the field-notes were made out in his handwriting or not?—A. No, sir; I do not know that. We get merely the transcript of the field-notes, and not the original. The original is filed in the surveyor-general's office, and the transcripts in our office.

Q. So far as your knowledge goes, you do not know whether Medary ever went into the field or not?—A. No, sir; I could not tell you that of my personal knowledge.

Q. You do not know but what the work was done by somebody else?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not know but what the profits of the survey were divided between Mr. Medary and somebody else, who was never in the Territory?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. REED:

Q. Do you know whether any of my deputies ever went into the field, of your own personal knowledge?—A. I do not know. We took it for granted that they did, because they swore to it, saying "I have performed the duties set down by the instructions, and these are the original field-notes of survey."

Q. Have you any doubt but what Mr. Medary and the others have surveyed their work?—A. No sir; I have never suspected any of them, but, of course, I could not say personally that they did.

Q. If three or four of my deputy surveyors took, say, $5,000 worth of work to execute for themselves, and that much for Mr. Delano—say the two parties have that much work; it so happens that when these contracts are to be made out, the deputies taking their portion and taking Mr. Delano's portion with it, and he not getting there to sign the contract with them, but they signing the contract, they being my deputies; suppose that they go to the field, that some of them draw on him for advance-money for the outfit, and that they voluntarily arrange to work up that survey and give him a portion of the profits, I ask you if that is any business of the Department?—A. No; we do not know of any such arrangement. We deal with the man in whose name the contract is entered into, and when the work is returned and passes examination they are paid. If they squander their means and give it to somebody else, we pay them only for so much work performed, and no more.

Q. In the Hammond case he took a contract for $4,100; Mr. Delano was to be with him in half of that; Delano does not get there, for certain important reasons, to sign the contract before Mr. Hammond is obliged to start to the field; Mr. Hammond gets restive and says he will go forward—he will sign the contract, get the bond, go on, leave the contract blank for his (Delano's) name, and the bond blank for him to sign and swear to, if he arrives, and if he does not arrive he will survey that work; in the mean time, before I start, I will draw a draft on him (Delano) for his half of the money needed to get to the field with—say he does that—and Mr. Delano fails to arrive and sign that contract; Hammond surveys the land, and keeps an account of all his expenditures, the cost of his hands, his railroad-fares, &c.; he charges for half of that work, and for half of that time he charges for his services at $125 a month; he takes that all out before any profits are divided; he allows for the money which has been advanced to him before the profits are divided—now, I ask you if Mr. Hammond has not a right to do just what he pleases with that half of the profit?—A. All the profits are his.

Q. And he may do what he pleases with them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where would your Department have any right to interfere with such a transaction as that? Does the Department, in fact, pretend to interfere in a case like that?—A. No, sir; because even if the Department had known that Mr. Delano or somebody else was in that relation, the Department goes on with the contract and pays no attention to the private arrangement.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you say that if the Department had known that Mr. Delano had stood in that relation it would, nevertheless, have approved the contract?—A. No; not if the Department had known those circumstances.

Q. What would the Department have done?—A. It would have required the name of Mr. Delano to be inserted into the contract.

Q. Would they have approved the contract without the name of Mr. Delano?—A. Yes, sir; in the name of Hammond.

Q. If the Department had known that Mr. Delano was to realize one-half the profits of the contract, would they have approved that contract? Here you have the contract of Hammond with his name in, and the name of nobody else. You know at the same time that Mr. John Delano is to have one-half the profits of that contract. He has not signed the contract. Would you have approved it?—A. No.

Q. Why not?—A. Because John Delano is not a contractor.

By Mr. REED:

Q. But if his name is not in the contract how are you to know anything about it?—A. Of course we would not know anything about it.

Q. Did you ever hear of such an instance as the Department stepping in between private individuals in that way to interfere about an arrangement which a deputy might make with a private individual in relation to his contract?—A. No, sir. If the Department knew that a member of Congress was sharing in the profits of a contract or subcontract, of course that would be against the law, but they never will know it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Then it is all right, in your judgment, if the Department does not know it. The only thing that is wrong about the matter is when the Department knows it. Is that your judgment?—A. How can the Department condemn anybody?

Q. Answer my question, if you please. I want to know whether it is all right, in your judgment, for Mr. John Delano, or anybody else, who does no work and takes no responsibility, to share in the profits of a contract if the Department does not know it?—A. Certainly, if I were the contractor I would not like that at all.

By Mr. REED:

Q. You would not like what?—A. In my judgment I should consider that it was a hardship on the deputy to share the profits in such a case as that; but if the deputy is willing to dispose of his hard earnings in that manner, what can be done?

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. If Mr. Hammond was willing to make a survey and take all the responsibility of the survey for a certain sum of money, and to give $1,400 of that amount to John Delano or to anybody else, is it not very likely that Mr. Hammond would have surveyed that same quantity of land for $1,400 less than he did?—A. He might.

Q. Would it not be very likely that he would do so?—A. Very likely.

Q. Would there not have been a saving to the Government, in that particular instance, of $1,400?—A. Certainly.

Q. Then, did not Mr. John Delano get $1,400 out of the Treasury of the United States that did not belong to him? If Mr. Hammond would have agreed to do that work for $1,400 less than he did, but Dr. Reed gives him the extra $1,400, provided he will give it to John Delano, that is taking $1,400 out of the Treasury, which belongs to the Government, is it not, and giving it to a party who has no right to it?—A. This contract stipulates for a certain amount. Of course the Government must pay that. But if he had said he would perform it for less, that would have been a different matter. If I was a contractor myself and got my mileage, and somebody had assisted me pecuniarily, of course I would feel obliged to pay him.

Q. That is to say, if he had advanced you the sum of $300 for a few months you would return him $1,400?—A. O, no; I would not do that, of course.

By Dr. REED :

Q. You have answered upon the principle that a certain deputy is furnished by the surveyor-general with a certain amount of surveying, which is his surveying, or his work.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have taken it for granted, in your answer, that the surveyor-general exacts of that deputy to divide the profits of that work, which is his own work, with an outsider. You say that is not right, and the Department would not like it if they knew it. But that is not exactly the case. The half of the contract that he goes out to survey I give to him as his part, and the other part is Mr. Delano's. Mr. Delano could let him have half the survey to work out on shares, or let anybody have it at the same rates. If he (H.) takes it to survey on shares, and he receives the money for part of his outfit of the advance expenses, and there is no coercion or request about it, and it is all a voluntary matter which he does—when he finds that work is on hand to be surveyed on shares, as partners, whose business is it? Is he not required, after he has gone that far, to divide his profits in good faith, provided there is no coercion about it?—A. That is a private arrangement; but if the Commissioner knew that a certain survey could be executed for less than the contract called for, and knew, at the same time, that part of the money was to go to somebody else, and that he could execute it for less—of course, if that knowledge was in the Department they would not approve the contract.

Q. Do you know of any surveys being made in any of those mountainous Territories of Colorado, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, or New Mexico for less than the Government price per mile?—A. No, sir; on the contrary they asked for an increase, and we had to submit estimates to Congress for three years of augmented rates in those mountainous countries. The rates were increased to $16 for subdivisions, although not everywhere. That was only the case in Colorado, Montana, and Wyoming, where the mountains and the abrupt country existed, and where the parties are far away from their base of supplies.

Q. What is the price now out in Wyoming and in other Territories for surveying timberlands?—A. For township-lines $18, and for subdivisions $16 and $14, and the tendency is to pay the maximum rates which Congress prescribed.

Q. Was it expected that the surveyor-general should go out over the Territory to find a township here and a township there which could be surveyed for a little less than $16 a mile?—A. No, sir.

Q. If a man's name is put into a contract, and he swears as a deputy surveyor in the surveyor-general's office, is he not considered a deputy surveyor, whether he is a practical surveyor or not?—A. Yes, sir; the office regards him as a deputy surveyor if his name is in the contract. We only look to the man who is the deputy to say that his work is properly returned.

Q. And in the case of a man not known to the office, and whom you do not know as a practical surveyor, if he is sworn as a deputy surveyor he is considered and called a deputy surveyor?—A. Yes, sir. But as I have said, sometimes one of them may not serve in the field; he may assist. He may be a chainman or an axman. The other, however, is to swear to the field-notes. One of them must be a practical field-surveyor to swear to the field-notes.

Q. Have you any means of knowing that young men without any knowledge of surveying are often thrust into contracts by politicians, members of Congress, and others?—A. I have heard of such cases, where they were merely attached as joint contractors.

Q. Have you ever known of any one, being attached as a friend of a politician, going into the field and receiving a part of the profits?—A. I cannot recall them now, although I have heard of such instances. The office, however, always looked to see who swore to the field-notes.

Q. The lines that the deputy is to survey are stated in the contract, are they not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The price per mile is also stated in the contract, is it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you ever seen any prices stated in my contracts above the Government price?—A. No, sir; we would not have approved the contract if such had been the case.

Q. I think you said you did not know of surveys being let in mountain Territories, such as Colorado, Montana, New Mexico, and Utah, for less than Government prices, did you not?—A. It may be that in the execution of the surveys in Colorado there may have been cases of that kind, but I do not recall them now to my mind. Generally maximum rates are paid and the surveyor-general frequently urges an increase per mile, saying that the surveys cannot be executed, and that they are not able to get deputy surveyors to undertake the contract for Government prices. The plains have all been surveyed. The mountains are now approaching, together with the timber, and the surveyors want enhanced prices.

Q. Colorado extends into the plains a hundred and more miles farther east than Wyoming, does it not?—A. Yes, sir; Colorado, Kansas, and Nebraska are the easiest fields for working.

Q. There is very little of the plains in Wyoming, is there not?—A. Very little.

Q. You have been asked some questions about regulations, showing that a second man might go into a contract with an old deputy, the second man not being a practical surveyor.—A. We have no printed regulations referring to them.

Q. I ask you if the practice of the Department has not become a rule in that respect itself, even if it were not printed ; that is, in regard to permitting a second person to go into a contract, even if he is not an experienced man, provided he goes in with a good deputy?—A. That is the way they educate the surveyors of public lands. Nobody is born with a practical knowledge of the business. Some have to learn. When they understand the business they associate others with themselves, so that in like time they may be instructed.

Q. And the practice is to allow an intelligent man, if the surveyor-general recommend him, even if he has never surveyed? He may go in with an old surveyor?—A. Yes, sir. He, however, does not swear that he has performed the work.

Q. If there are two in the field, and one does not understand surveying, and does not survey, he does not swear to the notes?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did I understand you to say that if a deputy took work from an inexperienced man and united it with some work of his own, in a contract, and went out and surveyed that work and divided the profit, or a portion of it, with this inexperienced man who was not in the contract, that that would be objected to?—A. If it was known to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, of course he would object to it.

Q. What right has he to interfere between a deputy and a man outside?—A. He does not interfere, and has no means of knowing.

Q. Where would be his right to interfere with a competent deputy surveyor who makes a contract, gives a good bond, and is known to the office, if he contemplated dividing some of the profits? What right has the Commissioner to interfere?—A. He would not interfere. But I was asked by the committee what would be the result in case the Commissioner of the General Land-Office knew that an inexperienced man was a contractor and was not named in the contract. Of course the Commissioner would not agree to that.

Adjourned.

PATRICK H. JONES, LATE POSTMASTER OF NEW YORK CITY.

AUGUST 3, 1876.—Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCHRANE, from the Committee on Claims, by unanimous consent, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill H. R. 2173.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2173) for the relief of Patrick H. Jones, late postmaster of New York City, make the following report :

Patrick H. Jones was appointed postmaster and took charge of the post-office at New York City on May 1, A. D. 1869. Between this date and the 3d of August, A. D. 1871, one John W. Norton, a clerk having charge of the money-order department in said office, embezzled Government funds to the amount of about $85,000. Norton made an assignment to Jones of a large amount of property for the benefit of the Government. A part of this property has been sold, and between $15,000 and $20,000, proceeds thereof, has been paid by Jones into the United States Treasury. The balance of the property, worth perhaps $30,000 or $40,000, is still held by Jones in trust for the Government. The said Patrick H. Jones asks Congress, upon the payment by him of the proceeds of the sale of the balance of Norton's property into the United States Treasury, to relieve him of any further liability to the Government. The claimant alleges that he was guilty of no negligence either in the employment or retention of said Norton, and in his petition gives a full statement of facts which he claims are sufficient to acquit him of any negligence in the premises. The committee do not deem it necessary to state these facts bearing upon the question of negligence, as they have not considered them in arriving at a conclusion.

The question which lies at the threshold of the case is this: Will Congress, in any case, come to the relief of a citizen where the courts are open to him, and where all questions in the case can be fully and fairly passed upon by a jury? In this case an action has been brought by the attorney for the Government in the United States court at New York City upon the official bond of Jones. Mr. Jones has put in defense thereto that he was guilty of no negligence in the premises. So far as can be ascertained, every matter now relied upon by claimant is made an element of his defense. That case is now pending and likely soon to be tried under these circumstances. Should Congress interfere in the matter? Should a committee be called upon, amid the press of other business, without the Government being represented, and relying only upon ex-parte testimony, to decide matters which are of grave importance, and which are about to be decided by a court and jury? Your committee think not, and, therefore, upon that ground, and without expressing an opinion upon any other question raised by claimant, report back the accompanying bill, (H. R. 2173,) with the recommendation that the same do not pass.

CHICAGO PENSION-AGENCY.

AUGUST 4, 1876.—Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.
[Accompanied by H. Mis. Doc. 182.]

Mr. HURLBUT, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, by unanimous consent, submitted the following

REPORT:

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom was referred certain allegations in reference to the Chicago pension-agency, report back to the House the testimony taken and the conclusions to which the majority and minority of the committee have arrived, and ask that the testimony and the reports of the majority and minority be printed and laid upon the table.

[House Report No. 678.—Forty-fourth Congress, first session.]

JUNE 17, 1876.—Recommitted to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HURLBUT, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service have had under consideration certain matters relating to the pension-agency in Chicago, and beg leave to make the following report, and to ask the adoption of the resolutions:

Two cases of alleged wrong-doing have been presented to the committee, both referring to the pension-agency at Chicago, but differing in the elements of time and of parties.

The first presents a case of contract for influence to procure an appointment, and a valuable consideration agreed to, and paid and received, in relation to a public office.

The testimony before the committee establishes beyond a reasonable doubt that, in the year 1869, General B. J. Sweet, a distinguished officer, severely wounded in the war, now deceased, was a candidate for the office of pension-agent at Chicago; that George W. Campbell was also a candidate for the same office.

That J. Russell Jones, then marshal for the northern district of Illinois, and now collector of the port of Chicago, was the person principally relied on by Campbell to procure his nomination.

That the friends of General Sweet, especially Mr. Charles L. Wilson, of Chicago, sought to secure Mr. Jones's supposed powerful influence for Sweet.

That Jones suggested that if Sweet would appoint George W. Campbell as chief clerk, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, his influence could be secured for Sweet.

That Sweet accepted the offer, and was appointed pension-agent, and did in fact appoint George W. Campbell chief clerk, at the rate of $2,500 per annum.

That such employment continued for nearly a year, Sweet paying and Campbell receiving pay at the rate named.

That at the end of about eleven months Sweet and Campbell made a new arrangement, by which Campbell was to receive $1,500 per annum, and do no duty and perform no work in the office, but it is in evidence that Mr. Jones knew nothing of this last arrangement and was absent from the country. Mr. George W. Campbell's recollection about this, and especially as to the reasons for this singular arrangement, is exceedingly vague and unsatisfactory.

It is further in evidence that the sum of $2,500 is exorbitantly high, if considered as wages, and that Mr. Campbell was of very slight use and advantage, if not a positive disadvantage, in the office, and it is fully proven that the chief clerk in the office only earned and received $1,500 per annum.

This employment of George W. Campbell, or rather this tribute to him of $1,500 a year without any corresponding services, continued until General Sweet was removed from office.

The evidence in support of these statements is contained in the depositions of Charles L. Wilson and George W. Campbell, as to the contract; and of M. B. Johnson and Miss Ada C. Sweet, as to the value of services and usual wages of a clerk in that office.

There can be no doubt whatever that this sum of $2,500 per annum, although nominally for the hire of George W. Campbell as a clerk, was in truth and in fact the moving consideration, and the only consideration, for the transfer of the influence of Mr. J. R. Jones to the support of General Sweet.

Mr. George W. Campbell expressly so states the fact to be in his testimony, pages 41 and 42.

The second case is one of special cruelty and hardship, and develops a degree of criminal conspiracy to defraud and injure a young and innocent woman, which cannot fail to disgrace all the participants in the plot.

Miss Ada C. Sweet, orphan daughter of General B. J. Sweet, is the victim, and James H. Baker, then Commissioner of Pensions, now surveyor-general of Minnesota, and David Blakely, are the wrong-doers, and Mr. Benjamin H. Campbell, now marshal of the northern district of Illinois, appears to have been made a party to one portion of the plan, but without any conclusive evidence that he was cognizant of the character and extent of the frauds intended to be perpetrated.

In the early part of the year 1874, David Blakely was pension-agent at Chicago, having succeeded General Sweet. He was also editor and part proprietor of a newspaper in that city.

It is in evidence that, from losses caused by the great fire in that city and other causes, he was desperately involved, and in fact practically insolvent.

He had procured from Mr. Benjamin H. Campbell, and Mr. Bradley, clerk of the United States circuit court, a loan of their credit by an indorsement on his note for $5,000, discounted in the National Bank of Illinois, in Chicago. This note he was unable to meet, and it was from time to time renewed, on payment of interest.

He appears to have made up his mind to withdraw from Chicago and seek new fields at Saint Paul. The only thing which appears at that time to have held which he considered merchantable, was his position as pension-agent.

Miss Sweet, then a clerk in the internal-revenue office in Chicago, wished to obtain this place, and appears to have had the support of many good citizens, both on her own account and that of her dead father. General Sweet had died a poor man, and she was naturally anxious to do something for her family. The difficulty appears to have been to create the vacancy, as Mr. Blakely's term did not expire until April, 1875. She was familiar with the duties of the office, having been clerk for her father.

In March, 1874, Blakely proposes to her to create the vacancy by resigning, and to give all the influence he can muster to secure her appointment, on condition that she will devote all the earnings of the office above necessary expenses, and a small salary for herself during the first year, to the payment of the one among his many debts which he chose to consider a debt of honor.

Why he should have selected this particular debt for that pre-eminence does not appear, nor is it material, except to his other creditors.

This proposition he binds this young girl to consider as an exceeding personal favor to her, and compels her to secrecy, positively interdicting that she should communicate with or consult her friends on the subject.

Miss Sweet accepts the proposition with its accompanying obligation of secrecy, and evidently considered this man Blakely as her benefactor, and the arrangement was consummated. She agreed to pay Benjamin H. Campbell, within the year, $2,100, out of the earnings of the office, and to pay the expenses of the office, and also to pay Blakely $2,000 for books, furniture, papers, and outstanding fees.

Mr. Campbell was informed by Mr. Blakely of the arrangement, and by his request Miss Sweet came to his office, and stated in precise terms the sums to be paid him, the installments, and the times when such installments would be due and payable.

Punctually as the days of payment arrived Mr. Campbell called at Miss Sweet's office after she was appointed, and received the amounts agreed to be paid, and his receipts are produced and are in evidence.

Blakely resigned according to contract, and Miss Sweet was appointed according to contract, on the first of April, 1874, and Mr. B. H. Campbell received his installments of Blakely's debt to him and Bradley according to contract, until the 10th of April, 1875, when Miss Sweet claimed that her contract was fulfilled, which was at first disputed by Campbell, but, after referring to Blakely, was admitted as final.

Meanwhile another and darker feature in this disreputable transaction took place.

On the rendition of Blakely's final accounts an item improperly charged by him of about $3,200 was disallowed by the proper accounting-officers, and he was ordered forthwith to make it good by paying over the amount to Miss Sweet, his successor.

Again this bad man tries his powers of persuasion upon the feelings and sympathies of this young lady, who was still under the mistaken conviction that she was under great obligations to him. He represents to her that he cannot raise the money at the time, but will soon be able to; that discovery will ruin him; that she ought to help him, and can safely do so; and thus, by prayers and promises, overpersuades her to give him a receipt as a public officer for money which he owed the Government, without actual receipt by her of the sum pretended to be paid, and thus shoulders both the crime and the consequences of the default from himself, over upon her.

She yielded, very unwisely, to his importunity, and gave him a receipt for $40,000, in round numbers, when she had only received from him $37,000, in round numbers. Elated with this present success, Blakely departs for Minnesota, and then comes the usual sickening story of a successful scoundrel shutting his ears to the piteous appeals of the party whom he has cheated and betrayed. Letter after letter, telegram after telegram, follow him to his various haunts. Miss Sweet is left alone to her own counsel, for this same odious pledge of secrecy has been demanded and given. It is, however, largely to her credit that no attempt was made by her to conceal by any arts of book-keeping the fact which was always apparent on her books, that she appeared in default to the United States. In addition to all her other burdens, this man Blakely had borrowed of her on private account $400, which of course remained unpaid.

In October, 1874, Mr. Lockey, then Deputy Commissioner of Pensions, called at her office, and, in course of a casual examination, ascertained the apparent deficit, and called Miss Sweet's attention to it. She, still bound by the pledge of secrecy, did not at that time explain to Mr. Lockey the real nature and cause of the deficit. Lockey left, promising to return in a few days and fully examine into the affair.

Miss Sweet follows Blakely up with telegrams, and on the 2d and 3d of October receives from him the two telegrams printed on page 10 of the testimony. The parts which specially relate to the pending investigation of the deficit are as follows :

BRADFORD, VT., October 2, 1874.

Don't worry. Baker will understand, and will make all right.

D. BLAKELY.

BRADFORD, VT., October 3, 1874.

All right. Have telegraphed Baker this morning.

D. BLAKELY.

Thus the fact of the communication by Blakely of the impending danger of discovery to Baker, then Commissioner of Pensions, is established, and Baker himself, in his testimony on page 34, admits the fact :

Q. During the absence of Mr. Lockey on this trip had you any communication with Blakely?—A. He telegraphed or wrote to me, or did both, from Vermont.

Q. Have you either the dispatch or the letter?—A. I have neither. I think it was destroyed.

It is also in evidence that Miss Sweet wrote to Baker more than once about this deficit, and the cause of it, before Lockey's visit in October. She, however, kept no copy of the letters, and Baker does not produce them.

Mr. Lockey returned to Chicago within three or four days, but while absent at Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, had received from Mr. Baker the following telegram :

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 3, 1874.

[Received at Dubuque October 3, 1874.]

HON. JOSEPH LOCKEY,

Deputy Commissioner of Pensions, Dubuque, Iowa. (Care of Pension-Agent.)

You need not stop at the Chicago agency, as I will go there.

J. H. BAKER,

Commissioner of Pensions.

On his arrival at Chicago, Lockey had a long and full conversation with Miss Sweet, who then informed him precisely how the deficit occurred, and how she was persuaded by Blakely to assume his deficiency.

Particular attention is called to his testimony on page 12, which clearly establishes that he then received a full statement of the case from Miss Sweet, and on his return to Washington informed his superior, Baker, of the entire transaction.

Thus, in the early part of October, and before Baker went out to Chicago, he was informed of this deficit, and the manner in which it occurred, from three sources—from Blakely, from Miss Sweet, and from his official deputy, Mr. Lockey.

It is further in evidence that Blakely and Baker passed through Chicago, on their way to Minnesota, to attend the November elections, and that after the elections in that State they appeared together in Chicago, and that a peremptory demand was at once made by Baker on Miss Sweet to settle this deficit on that day. This whole most infamous transaction is detailed in full in the testimony of Miss Sweet on page 5. And your committee have no possible doubt that by deliberate conspiracy between Baker and Blakely it was purposed to make Miss Sweet pay up this amount, both of them having full knowledge of the manner in which she became liable.

Blakely had procured of some friends in Minnesota notes to the amount of $2,000, which he proposed to leave with his friend Baker as security to that extent, and that Miss Sweet should pay the balance in cash, and then Baker would allow her to carry the rest of the deficiency on the security of these notes. Miss Sweet insisted that the notes be delivered to her, and at last broke the bonds of secrecy under which she had been held and consulted her friends.

By the aid of these friends she raised the whole amount of the deficit, partly on her own credit and partly on the discount of the notes given by Blakely, and thus escaped from the power of these designing and dishonorable men.

Your committee have no doubt that it was the purpose of Commissioner Baker to force her to pay up the whole of Blakely's liability, or compel her to abandon the office in dishonor as a defaulter; and your committee feel bound to say that a more utterly wicked and criminal combination for oppression and wrong has never been before revealed.

These cases, connected with the Chicago pension-agency, disclose a very low and discreditable tone of opinion, among men of standing and prominence, in relation to the public offices of the Government, and the propriety or impropriety of the barter and sale of real or supposed influence in the procurement of appointments to office.

Persons themselves in high and responsible office and alleging themselves to have influence with the appointing power, and undoubtedly believed by others to possess such influence, make that influence the subject of barter and sale, and put it upon the market as a merchantable commodity.

In the case of the original appointment of General Sweet to the pension-agency, a clear contract is established by which Mr. J. Russell Jones, then United States marshal, and believed to be on terms of special intimacy with the President, agreed to use his influence for General Sweet's appointment on the clear bargain and express condition that George W. Campbell, a connection and friend, should be put on duty as a clerk at an exorbitant and unusual salary—a salary which it is also in evidence he never earned. It is this feature particularly which compels your committee to stamp their disapprobation on the transaction. The services of the very best of clerks could have been procured for $1,500 per annum. This man was paid $2,500 per annum, and the additional $1,000 was a gratuity, or rather an extortion, demanded and paid, not for services to be done, but for the influence of his patron and his connections.

The worthlessness of Mr. Campbell as a clerk is further and most convincingly proven by the extraordinary fact, established by himself, that after a year's trial General Sweet actually paid him $1,500 a year to leave the office entirely, and Mr. Campbell does not seem to consider this as a singular arrangement.

There can be no doubt but that this transaction should be considered in precisely the same light as if General Sweet had agreed to pay so much money as a consideration for influence.

There is no law on the statute-books forbidding or making criminal the practice of office-broking, or the barter of real or pretended influence in the matter of appointments, except as to members of Congress and certain other named officers.

But the sound sense of the people will condemn the practice as having the most direct and deplorable tendency toward corruption, and toward securing public offices by unworthy means.

David Blakely succeeded General Sweet, and when he, in his turn, wished to retire, he sold out his interest in his unfinished term of office, and his personal and political influence, to the orphan daughter of his predecessor.

Words fail to set forth the convictions entertained by this committee of the baseness of this man and his coadjutor, Baker.

They both pass from the respect of all honorable men and take their appropriate place in the ranks of swindlers and confidence operators.

Blakely holds no place under the Government, but Baker is now surveyor-general of Minnesota, and this committee desire to state that no such man should be allowed to hold office under the United States.

He appeared before the committee with a carefully-prepared statement, which he read as evidence, evasive, indirect, and contradicted by his own cross-examination and by the testimony of all the other witnesses. His relations with Blakely are known to have been very intimate and confidential, and there is no reasonable doubt that he was a willing partaker with Blakely in his dishonorable schemes.

Mr. Benjamin H. Campbell, now United States marshal in Chicago, desires the committee and the country to believe that he knew nothing whatever of the transactions between Blakely and Miss Sweet which were the consideration for the assumption and payment by her of the debt due by Blakely to Campbell.

The committee desire to believe this statement if it were at all consistent with the evidence. But the fact remains that, for some reason, Miss Sweet agreed to pay, and did pay, to B. H. Campbell $2,100 due by Blakely; that Blakely did resign; that Miss Sweet was appointed; that the payments commenced from and were dependent on her appointment; that the arrangement for the payments was talked over and agreed to by Miss Sweet in the presence of and at the request of Mr. Campbell; that Miss Sweet was known to Mr. Campbell to possess no means from which to pay; that she was a young woman, working at the time as clerk in the Internal Revenue Office at a small salary.

Under all these known facts, the committee are of opinion that any ordinary business man must have assumed that the payments would come from the pension-office, and that Blakely's surrender of that office to Miss Sweet was the consideration.

It is very probable that this may not have been said in express words, but that it was understood can hardly be doubted.

On any other hypothesis it would puzzle Mr. Campbell or any one else to show where he expected the money to come from, or what motive there was for this extraordinary benevolence on the part of Miss Sweet toward Mr. Blakely and Mr. Campbell.

In the view which the committee are forced to take from the evidence, the transaction is illegitimate and improper, and tends to the sale of offices, and is closely of kin to the similar transaction in relation to the original appointment of General Sweet.

Mr. Campbell himself seems to have so regarded it, when, as he states, he became fully acquainted with its real effect, for since this investigation commenced he has repaid to Miss Sweet the entire amount paid by her to him.

The committee cannot close this subject without stating that as soon as the President of the United States learned from Miss Sweet, in January, 1876, the fact that she had been paying money to Mr. B. H. Campbell, he at once expressed his most decided and emphatic disapprobation, and informed her that she must not pay any more money; that any further payment would be deemed by him cause of removal. And the committee have no doubt that this disapprobation by the President was one, at least, of the causes which led to the restitution made by Mr. B. H. Campbell.

Your committee do not propose to criticise with any severity the course taken by Miss Sweet. She was evidently anxious to secure a position by which she could aid her father's family. She was unacquainted with the world; young and inexperienced. She believed that Blakely was doing her a favor; she was hopeful of good results; she found men of position and character proposing a transaction, and she evidently thought it was right. She has been deceived, wronged, and cheated by false pretenses, but she has kept her plighted word and only spoken in self-defense. Her sympathies have been played upon, and it was not until she was threatened by the conspirators with financial ruin and official dishonor that she took counsel of her friends and stood up for her rights.

Her testimony is direct, modest, clear, and conclusive, and is fully believed by the committee. Her relations with the procurement of office for herself under the contract, as proven, are, in the judgment of the committee, venial, and to be passed over with light censure, if any, as not of her own devising, but the suggestions of others in whom she believed.

As the result of their examination, the committee recommend the passage of the following resolutions:

1. That, in the opinion of this House, the demanding or acceptance by any person of money or any other valuable thing for himself or any other person as a consideration for real or pretended influence to be used in procuring appointments to public offices, is disgraceful to the individual, prejudicial to the public interest, and leads inevitably to corruption and dishonor.

2. That such misconduct, when found to exist in the case of a public officer, is, in the judgment of this House, good cause for removal.

3. That the Judiciary Committee of this House be directed to report a proper bill for the definition and punishment of offenses of this nature.

4. That a copy of this report and resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States for his information.

Since the foregoing report was made and approved by the committee, certain other witnesses have been examined, at their own request, namely: Mr. J. Russell Jones, Mr. E. H. Gary, Mr. David Blakely, and Mr. J. L. Lumbard; and Mr. M. P. Johnson and Miss Ada C. Sweet have been recalled and re-examined.

Their testimony is now printed, and has been very carefully examined by the committee; and after careful consideration of the whole matter, the committee can discover no reason for changing either the conclusions or the expressions in their report.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY

Mr. LEAVENWORTH submitted the following as the

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY:

The undersigned members of the committee feel constrained, as a matter of justice, to dissent from the report made by the majority in this case, and without imputing to the majority any improper motives, regret to say that it appears to us that reproach has been cast and crimes charged upon persons needlessly, and for which no warrant can be found in the evidence.

The examination has gone back to the year 1869, when General B. J. Sweet was appointed to the position of pension-agent at Chicago, and the first case of alleged wrong-doing in connection with that place has reference to the manner in which he procured his appointment. The censure of the majority of the committee, it seems, is aimed at the Hon. J. Russell Jones; yet it is quite plain that if Mr. Jones has been guilty of any impropriety, General Sweet was guilty in like degree, and that fact cannot be obscured by pronouncing the encomium, as the majority report does, and very properly, upon General Sweet, that he was "a distinguished officer, severely wounded in the war."

The simple, unvarnished truth of the whole matter is this:

General Sweet was an applicant for the position of pension-agent, and was getting all the influence he could to secure his appointment.

Mr. George W. Campbell was also an applicant for the place, and was using like means to obtain it.

The Hon. J. Russell Jones was, and had been for many years, the personal friend of Mr. Campbell. In his early life Mr. Campbell had assisted him. This kindness he remembered, and at the time the contest for the place was going on, Mr. Campbell having met with reverses and needing assistance, Mr. Jones was willing and desirous to aid him in getting the appointment. But General Sweet also appealed to Mr. Jones to assist him in procuring the place. He was informed by Mr. Jones of the relations of the latter to Mr. Campbell, and at the same time that, but for this, he would be glad to aid General Sweet in the matter. He asked General Sweet if there was not enough in the place for both of them, whereupon the latter proposed that if he got the place he would employ Mr. Campbell as his clerk at $2,500 per year, and thereupon Mr. Jones signed General Sweet's recommendation. Mr. Campbell was a man who had had large business experience; had been a paymaster in the Army, and was at the time competent for the position he was seeking.

Mr. Jones had no connection with this matter other than as above stated; he had no pecuniary interest in it—no private interest to subserve, and what he did was purely and simply a matter of disinterested friendship to these two men. In considering this transaction, and Mr. Jones's connection with it, it should be borne in mind that the Government had nothing to do with the employment of clerks in a pension agency. The agent employs his own clerks and pays them just such salaries as he chooses out of the fees allowed by law. Whether he pays much or little is of no concern to the Government, and General Sweet could pay his employes just what he chose and could select whomsoever he would. To attempt, as the majority report does, to tarnish the reputation of Mr. Jones for what he did in the premises (and he did nothing but what is above stated) can hardly be regarded otherwise than as an act of great injustice to him. In our opinion, he has done nothing that merits criticism, or that an honorable gentleman could not do with perfect propriety.

It appears in evidence that some months after General Sweet was appointed he made an arrangement with Mr. Campbell by which the latter was to cease to render active service in the office, and be paid $1,500 per year instead of $2,500. Up to this time Campbell had been rendering active service constantly. This last arrangement was made at General Sweet's own solicitation. When it was made, Mr. Jones was abroad as minister to Belgium, (having gone there soon after the first arrangement was made,) and had no knowledge of it whatever.

After disposing of the case of General Sweet and Mr. Jones, the majority proceed with the case of Mr. David Blakely, who succeeded General Sweet as pension agent, and introduce it as follows :

The second case is one of special cruelty and hardship, and develops a degree of criminal conspiracy to defraud and injure a young and innocent woman which cannot fail to disgrace all the participants in the plot.

Miss Ada C. Sweet, orphan daughter of General B. J. Sweet, is the victim, and James H. Baker * * * and David Blakely are the wrong-doers, and Mr. Benjamin H. Campbell, now marshal of the northern district of Illinois, appears to have been a party to one portion of the plan, but without any conclusive evidence that he was cognizant of the character and extent of the frauds intended to be perpetrated.

After some recitals of what purport to be the facts of an arrangement made between Miss Sweet and Mr. Blakely, the report proceeds :

On the rendition of Blakely's final accounts an item improperly charged by him, of about $3,200, was disallowed by the proper accounting-officer, and he was ordered forthwith to make it good by paying over the amount to Miss Sweet, his successor.

Again, this bad man tries his powers of persuasion upon the feelings and sympathies of this young lady, who was still under the mistaken conviction that she was under great obligations to him. He represents to her that he cannot raise the money at the time, but will soon be able to; that discovery will ruin him; that she ought to help him, and can safely do so; and thus by prayers and promises over-persuades her to give him a receipt as a public officer for money which he owed the Government without actual receipt by her of the sum pretended to be paid, and thus shoulders both the crime and the consequence of the default over upon her.

From these extracts it will be seen that it is alleged in this report—

1st. That General Baker and Mr. Blakely had entered into a "conspiracy" or "plot" to defraud and injure Miss Sweet.

2d. That Benjamin H. Campbell was, at least in part, a party to this "conspiracy."

3d. That Mr. Blakely had persuaded Miss Sweet to enter into an arrangement with him, the particulars of which will be hereafter stated.

4th. That Blakely had attempted to procure for himself a credit of $3,200 to which he was not entitled; that he was a defaulter to the Government in that amount.

5th. That by his persuasions and importunities he induced Miss Sweet to take this upon herself, and thereby make herself appear to be a defaulter; that Baker aided him in this; and

6th. The report proceeds then to paint Blakely as a "successful scoundrel," flying from place to place to escape the appeals to him by letters and telegrams of her whom he had cheated and betrayed.

To these conclusions of the majority we cannot assent; and, with all due respect to the majority, are constrained to say, as a matter of justice, that they are not warranted by the evidence. An examination of the evidence will show that Miss Sweet was by no means an inexperienced girl. She had been her father's clerk while he was pension-agent. She had been Mr. Blakely's clerk during a portion of the time he held that position. She was perfectly familiar with that agency; knew all about the duties of the office—the work to be done, the expense of conducting it, and its emoluments. She was an experienced, sagacious, business woman.

In the language of Mr. Gray, a witness who is an executor of her father's will, and is intimately acquainted with her, she is "a very intelligent business lady." "She has had a good deal of experience in business for a young lady, and she is a superior girl, very intelligent and capable in a business way." In addition to her experience in the pension agency, she had had considerable experience in the internal-revenue department.

An effort was made to remove Blakely from this office, and Miss Sweet became an applicant for it in the event of his removal. She procured the assistance of friends to aid her in getting the appointment, among whom was Mr. Gray. In this effort she failed. Her friends informed her that Mr. Blakely would not be removed, and consequently she could not get the appointment. She accepted this as a fact, and ceased further efforts in that direction.

Subsequently Mr. Blakely had a business offer at Saint Paul, but having previously become financially involved by reason of the great fire in Chicago, and Mr. Campbell being his indorser to the extent of $5,000, for which Campbell had no security, Blakely had promised him that out of his salary as pension agent he would periodically make certain payments on account of this liability to the end of his term of office. Having made this arrangement, he felt constrained to continue in the occupancy of the office to the end of his term, and therefore not to accept the business arrangement above alluded to.

These facts he communicated to Miss Sweet, and proposed to her that he would resign, would aid her in getting the appointment, on condition that he should have the benefit of the net proceeds of the office until the end of his term, just as he would have done had he continued to hold it until that time. Miss Sweet was at that time receiving a salary of $900 or $1,200 a year, but as a part of the proposed arrangement she was to have out of the proceeds of the office a salary of $1,500 per year.

After paying this to herself and all the other expenses and paying, Mr. Campbell just as Blakely would have paid him, the balance was to be paid to Mr. Blakely until the end of his term, which was a little more than a year.

The advantage of this to him was that he would receive just what he would have received if he kept the office, and the advantage to her was that she would at once get an increase of salary and get possession of the office, and all the emoluments after the period of Blakely's term.

This arrangement was entered into; she entered into it understandingly, willingly, and gladly. She deemed it to her advantage to do so; there was no fraud, artifice, or deception practiced upon her to induce her to do so by any one.

General Baker knew nothing about it until months after it had been done. Mr. Campbell did nothing but accept from her, out of the proceeds of the office, what he would have received from Blakely if the latter had not resigned.

If evidence is of any value whatever, the evidence in this case proves what is above stated clearly and indisputably; and, in our judgment, the position of the majority, that there was a "conspiracy" or a "plot" against Miss Sweet to induce her to make this arrangement, is without any support in the evidence whatever.

Again, the report of the majority seeks to show that Blakely was a defaulter, and sought to defraud the Government by giving himself credit for $3,200 to which he was not entitled, and afterward to shift this in a disreputable way from himself to Miss Sweet, thereby making her appear to be the defaulter.

A recital of the facts as shown by the evidence (and for the accuracy of our statement we appeal to the evidence) will show that this is unjust to Blakely. Blakely was not a defaulter. While he held the office it was admirably managed, and he left it in good condition. When he gave it up there was not a farthing wanting—the money was all there. When he came to make up his final account there was standing on the books of the Treasury Department a credit of $3,200, known as the "ante-fire account."

The books of the Department showed that amount due him from the Government; and in making up his final account he embraced in it that sum as a credit to himself, and retained a like amount of money out of the moneys in his hands, thereby paying himself the amount that the books showed that the Government owed him. The balance of the money on hand, $37,000, he paid over to Miss Sweet, his successor. His final account came to the Department, and there the accounting-officers disallowed the item of $3,200, not because it was unjust, not because it was not due to Mr. Blakely, but because of some technical difficulty that was in the way; and he was informed that he must pay the money over, and get it back again through some congressional action. To brand a man as a defaulter under such circumstances is certainly most unjust. But, being called upon to pay over this money, he arranged with Miss Sweet that she should pay it or assume it, and receipt to him for it. With reference to the arrangement that was made between them as to this, they differ in their testimony. Miss Sweet claims that he induced her to receipt to him for the money, she to advance it, and he to repay her shortly afterward; while he claims that the arrangement was that she should assume the payment of that sum, and that (with the payments she was to make to Campbell) should be a finality as the amount she should pay to him under the original arrangement. Blakely claims that the net emoluments of the office were $6,000 per year. She says that they were actually $5,500. So that if she did assume the payment of the $3,200, this, with $2,100 to be paid Campbell, was still less than she had agreed to pay, and to her the only material difference under the agreement was in paying it at once or in paying it as she received it out of the office. The weight of the evidence is that she did assume to pay this $3,000 and make an end of the matter as between herself and Blakely. Blakely says so. Mr. Gray and Mr. Lombard both got that understanding from Miss Sweet herself, as will appear from their testimony.

Some time after she had receipted for this sum, by reason of it she got into trouble about her accounts. Her office was about to be examined, and she made application to Blakely for assistance. Then, for the first time, Baker learned of these transactions, six months after the original arrangement was made. All the evidence conduces to show this, and so far from joining with Blakely to wrong or oppress her he actually aided her in getting out of her difficulty, and at the same time took care that the Government's interests should be protected, as will be more fully shown hereafter.

It is but just to him to say this. And so far from Blakely doing anything to injure her in this emergency, and undertaking to evade her letters and telegrams, he responded to them promptly; he manifested a disposition to aid her; he furnished her with $2,000, and when she asserted that the office was not yielding as well as she had hoped, while he did not consider himself bound to do so under the agreement they had made, yet he gave her this $2,000 absolutely.

Mr. Gray and Mr. Lombard, executors of her father's estate and her personal friends and advisers, who had an interview with these two parties together, and heard from them their respective versions of these transactions, (and their versions did not materially differ,) did not think that Mr. Blakely had acted otherwise than a manly and honorable part, and so freely expressed themselves at the time. Certain it is that she has not paid to Mr. Blakely as much as she agreed to.

It appears that the books, papers, &c., connected with the pension-agency are the private property of the agent, and are always and properly sold by the outgoing to the incoming agent. Blakely purchased them from General Sweet for $1,500 or $2,000, and he sold them to Miss Sweet for $2,000, which she paid him. In getting at the profits of the office, for which she was to account to him, she seems now to think that this sum should be deducted; but that was manifestly not the original agreement between them, nor was this any part of the expenses of the office. She agreed to pay $2,000 for the books, &c., of the office, and did pay it, and also agreed to pay the proceeds of the office, after deducting expenses.

As she states, the proceeds were $5,500. She paid $2,100 to Mr. Campbell, (which he has since refunded to her.) She paid the $3,000, of which Blakely furnished to her $2,000, and she paid or loaned to Blakely $400. So that in reality by this arrangement she got possession of the office which she much desired. She got an increase of salary, and only paid out the sum of $3,500, of which Mr. Campbell has returned to her $2,100, making only $1,400 which she has paid, and she still holds the place, whereas, according to her agreement, she agreed to pay, according to her own showing, $5,500.

In all this business the Government has not suffered to the extent of a farthing; and while we do not by any means approve of the arrangement which the parties made, but, on the other hand, condemn it as against public policy, it is but justice to Mr. Blakely to say that any charge of "conspiracy," or "plot," or "defalcation" is without warrant in the evidence, and that his conduct toward Miss Sweet in relation to this business has been in the highest degree manly and honorable.

There is but the one act that we deem censurable, and that applies to Miss Sweet equally with him, and that is the entering into the original agreement.

We desire, also, most emphatically to dissent from and express our disapprobation of that portion of the report which reflects upon General Baker.

As before stated, General Baker knew absolutely nothing about the agreement between the parties until about the 1st of October, six months after it had been made.

About the 1st of October, Mr. Lackey was about to make an examination of the office. Miss Sweet then applied to Blakely, who was in Vermont, for assistance. The latter at once communicated with her on the subject, and advised her that he would have the examination of the office omitted, to give time to adjust the difficulty. He telegraphed General Baker on the 3d of October from Bradford, Vt., in these words, "Telegraph Lackey to pass over Miss Sweet's office for reasons which I will explain by letter. Important. Answer."

To this General Baker telegraphed as follows: "I have so telegraphed. What can you mean?"

To which Blakely replied that he had sent an explanation by mail.

These telegrams of themselves show that at this time General Baker was in absolute ignorance of what had occurred. In addition to these, Baker and Blakely both swear that Baker knew nothing about it, and nobody pretends to testify that he did.

After this Baker was fully informed as to these matters. He went to Minnesota, and on his return saw Miss Sweet at her office in Chicago. Blakely was in Chicago at that time. Baker saw her in relation to the deficiency in the account, and she says that "One morning they both appeared suddenly in my office. General Baker said, 'Miss Sweet, I understand you are short $4,000.' I said, 'Yes.' He said, 'It must be made up to-day. I leave for Washington to-night to report to the Secretary of the Interior, and you must make up the amount.' I told him I could not raise $4,000. I told him that it was all Blakely's deficiency, not mine. He said that made no difference; that I had assumed the amount, and must be responsible for it." Now, this testimony is absolutely all that there is in all this case to indicate any collusion, combination, or conspiracy on the part of General Baker in this matter in any manner or form whatever. Blakely testifies that he and Baker were not there together, and so does General Baker. Shortly before this she had told General Baker what the trouble was, and he at once called upon Blakely to assist her out of it. She did the same, and Blakely at once made preparations to do so, and at the very time that it is attempted to be made to appear that Baker was in collusion with Blakely to injure her, Blakely was in Chicago with notes of undoubted character to the amount of $4,000, which he had procured in Saint Paul, because of the communications he had received from Miss Sweet and General Baker, and had brought to Chicago for the express purpose of aiding her. With these at that time he did aid her to the extent of $2,000, all that she asked of him.

Now, how, in the face of these facts, it can with any reason or justice be said that General Baker was in any way wronging Miss Sweet or oppressing her, or conspiring or plotting against her, is difficult to conceive. On the contrary, when he discovered the situation he at once took steps to make the Government secure; and in doing this he acted with the utmost kindness and consideration toward Miss Sweet. His conduct throughout the whole affair, so far as he has been connected with it, has been that of an upright official and an honorable, high-minded man.

He is deserving of praise and not censure.

MRS. MARY SCOTT.

AUGUST 5, 1876.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLIKEN, from the Committee on War-Claims, submitted the following

R E P O R T :

[To accompany bill H. R. 4062.]

The facts in this case, as fully sustained by the testimony, show that Mary Scott, of Jessamine County, was a loyal citizen of the United States, and the owner in fee of about 1,266 acres of land, located upon the turnpike road between Lexington and Danville, about six miles south from Nicholasville, the terminus of the Kentucky Central Railroad; that in May, 1863, the troops of the United States, under command of General A. E. Burnside, took possession of all of said farm, and established upon that and adjacent farms a large and extensive military post, known as "Camp Nelson," which was intrenched and heavily manned with artillery, and made the base of military operations for the Union Army in Eastern Tennessee, and a purchasing-point for supplies, and point of defense for all Central Kentucky.

The camp was garrisoned at all times during the war after May, 1863, and was made a place for the enlistment of colored troops, and a place of refuge for their families. The United States caused Mrs. Scott and her family to remove from her farm in May, 1863, and kept uninterrupted possession of said farm until September, 1866, during which period she was deprived of its use and control, and compelled to seek subsistence and residence elsewhere. The evidence shows that, at the time Mrs. Scott was required to give up her property for the public use, it was agreed between her and the commanding general of the district of Kentucky, J. T. Boyle, with the consent and approval of General A. E. Burnside, that she should be paid a just and reasonable compensation for the use of her property; and in earnest thereof General Burnside, at the time, instructed General Boyle to pay Mrs. Scott $500, which was done. The necessities of the public service required many buildings in the camp for barracks, commissary and quartermaster stores, hospitals, &c., most of the lumber for which was cut and sawed from Mrs. Scott's farm. All or nearly all of the remaining wood upon the farm was cut and used for fuel for the Federal Army, public necessity requiring it to be so used. The fencing upon the farm was all or nearly all used as fuel by the military authorities. The evidence shows that when General Burnside first occupied the farm of Mrs. Scott, in May, 1863, it contained 570 acres of heavy timber, which was used by the Federal Army. The claimant now asks compensation for 37,240 cords of wood in the tree, at $1.50 per cord; for 860½ cords dry wood in rails, at $4 per cord; and 25,000 feet of lumber, at $15 per cord; amounting in the aggregate to $59,677.

Although the proof, made by something like fifty witnesses, whose veracity is well vouched for, seems to sustain this claim as just and reasonable, said proof showing that even larger prices were paid to owners of other timber and wood within the camp and adjoining Mrs. Scott's farm, yet, in view of the fact that said payments were made at war-prices, and that some compensation has been paid her, the committee recommend that Mrs. Scott's administrator be paid as follows :

For 532 acres of wood, at 35 cords to the acre, the sum of $1 per cord, making	$18,620
For 860½ cords dry wood, at $4 per cord	3,442
For 25,000 feet lumber, at $15 per thousand	375
Total	22,437

The committee, therefore, recommend that the sum of $23,437 be paid to the administrator of Mrs. Mary Scott in full of all demands or claims of her estate against the United States for lumber, wood, and rails, and submit the accompanying bill with recommendation of its passage.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. J. PROCTOR KNOTT.

AUGUST 5, 1876.—Recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HURD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, by unanimous consent, submitted the following

R E P O R T :

The Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the House relating to a telegram received by Hon. J. Proctor Knott, its chairman, from one Josiah Caldwell, concerning an investigation authorized by a resolution introduced into the House by Mr. Tarbox, of Massachusetts, would report:

That while the investigation contemplated under that resolution was in progress, it was developed that one Josiah Caldwell had made certain statements to parties as to the subject-matter of that inquiry. These statements were offered in evidence before the committee, but they were excluded upon the grounds, first, that they were irrelevant to the subject-matter of the Tarbox resolution; and second, that Caldwell was in Europe, and therefore beyond the reach of the process of this House. Under these circumstances it was determined by the committee that a telegram should be sent by the chairman to Caldwell, asking him to appear before the committee to testify.

After the action of the committee, and before any communication had been had with Caldwell, a telegram purporting to come from him was delivered to the chairman, as follows:

Have just read in New York papers Scott's evidence about our bond transaction, and can fully corroborate it. I never gave Blaine any Fort Smith bonds, directly or otherwise. I have three foreign railway contracts on my hands, which makes it impossible for me to leave without great pecuniary loss, or would gladly voluntarily come home and so testify. Can make affidavit to this effect and mail it if desired.

The resolution referred to your committee in substance demands that this telegram be made part of the testimony taken by the subcommittee engaged in the investigation under the Tarbox resolution.

If this demand is to be complied with, it must be upon the ground that such telegram is competent evidence in this investigation, for otherwise the proposition would be that incompetent testimony might be introduced to establish facts before a tribunal constituted by this House.

The sole question, in this view of the case, is, is this telegram competent evidence?

It is impossible to conceive upon what ground such a proposition can be maintained.

In the first place, with the concession that the telegram came from Mr. Caldwell, its statements cannot be received as evidence, because not made under oath. It would be singular, indeed, if in an investigation where witnesses actually present before the committee are required to be sworn, the unsworn statements of an absent person should be admitted as testimony. Such a rule would make too uncertain proceedings before an investigating committee, proceedings which require limit and definiteness rather than wider latitude.

But in the second place, when the telegram was received by the chairman there was not the slightest evidence that it had been sent by Mr. Caldwell. As it stood then, it simply appeared that a message with Mr. Caldwell's name subscribed to it had been delivered to the chairman of the committee.

But no one will pretend that this establishes the fact that Mr. Caldwell sent the message. In every case where the contents of a telegram are to be proven, or its authenticity to be established, the original message written by the sender must be produced. It is true that secondary evidence may be admitted, but then only after such proof of the loss or destruction of the original as is required to make such evidence admissible in other cases.

In Matteson vs. Noyes, 25 Ill., 59, it is said :

"The paper filed at the office from which the message is sent is, of course, the original, and that which is received by the person to whom it was sent, purports to be a copy. If the dispatch is sought to be used in evidence, the original must be produced and its execution proved precisely as any other instrument, or its absence accounted for in the same mode, before the copy can be received."

The same doctrine is maintained in Williams vs. Buckell, 37 Miss., 682; Durkee vs. The Vermont Central Railroad Company, 29 Vt., 39; and Hawley vs. Whipple, 48 N. H., 487.

In the third place, it may be said that while the message received is not evidence, yet its receipt gave rise to a presumption that it was sent by Mr. Caldwell and that its contents are his statements. As to this it may be remarked that it had already been decided by the Judiciary Committee in this very investigation that statements made by Mr. Caldwell to others, who were present before the committee to testify as to them, were not admissible in evidence. The rule established by the committee by that action seems decisive of the present question, for the same reasons which required the rejection of the oral statements of Mr. Caldwell should exclude his written statements, and certainly such statements as are contained in what is only a copy of his writing. But it has been repeatedly decided that a copy of a message raises no presumption as to the original. In Hawley vs. Whipple, 48 N. H., 487, it was held that "the fact that a telegram was sent to a person at a particular place, and an answer received by telegraph at the office from which the original telegram was sent, purporting to come from that person at that place, is no proof he was there at that time." If an answer to telegram affords no presumption that the person sending such answer was at the place from which it purports to be sent, a fortiori, no such presumption can arise where the message is not in answer to another previously sent; and if no presumption could arise (to speak of the present case) that Caldwell was in London on the 31st of May, certainly none will be claimed to arise that the message received was a copy of an original deposited in London.

It has been charged that the withholding by the chairman of this message from the subcommittee conducting this inquiry was a suppression of evidence, and that the ordinary presumptions arising from such suppression could be claimed as against him so far as they would relate to persons interested in the result of the investigation. The unreasonableness of such a claim is manifest when the principles of law established upon this point are considered. It is the suppression of instruments of evidence that is condemned by the rules of law. But in this case the message received was not an instrument of evidence, and therefore withholding it is not suppression of evidence.

It must be recollected in this connection that the chairman of the committee was not a member of the committee conducting the investigation. His only duty in reference to that inquiry was that imposed upon him by the general committee, of securing the attendance of Mr. Caldwell to testify. Suppose Caldwell had been within the United States, where process could have been served upon him? Would any one pretend that a message from him upon the subject-matter of the investigation, before a subpoena had been served, should be presented to the subcommittee as evidence? If not, then, how does Caldwell's absence from the country change the rules of evidence as to his telegram? Such a message from a witness might be of use in enabling the chairman to get service upon him in the one case, or to communicate with him in the other; but in both cases it should be regarded as a message for the chairman only, to be used as he should determine, not as evidence in the inquiry but to accomplish the object contemplated by the committee, viz, to bring the person before it to testify. In the accomplishment of that result, it is manifest that by the action of the committee the whole discretion was intrusted to the chairman. No person ought to complain, providing that discretion were exercised in good faith. If the object were to procure the attendance of Caldwell, it is manifest that it could be better accomplished by withholding the telegram from the committee than by spreading it upon the records as evidence; for if Caldwell could testify by a telegraphic dispatch, there would be little likelihood of his crossing the Atlantic to appear before the committee.

Other considerations seem to have occasioned doubts in the mind of the chairman as to whether the telegram really originated with Mr. Caldwell or not, which doubts, from the testimony since taken, he appears to have been justified in entertaining. That testimony, however, shows that while a telegram, of which this was substantially a copy, was sent by Mr. Reed, a former clerk of Caldwell, to him, it was, in fact, adopted and forwarded to the chairman by Mr. Caldwell.

From these considerations the chairman felt warranted in withholding the telegram from the committee until an inquiry could be made as to the circumstances attending its origination.

Your committee, therefore, would report: 1. That the telegram received by the chairman from Mr. Caldwell was not evidence, and could not have been received as such without a violation of the rule before that time established by the committee. 2. That withholding it was not a suppression of an instrument of evidence. 3. And that the whole subject as to procuring the attendance of Mr. Caldwell to testify had been referred to the chairman of the committee, and that all communications with or from Caldwell in reference to such subject were in the hands of the chairman, to be used according to his discretion in accomplishing the object of the committee, and that no just complaint can be made of any use of such communications providing the discretion were fairly and reasonably exercised.

Your committee would further report that they are satisfied, from all the circumstances, that the chairman in withholding the dispatch from the committee acted in good faith, and without any purpose to injure any person involved in the investigation.

And would recommend that the further consideration of the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

CONTRACTS TO FURNISH SOLDIERS' HEAD-STONES.

AUGUST 4, 1876.—Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, by unanimous consent submitted the following

REPORT:

The Committee on Military Affairs, having taken the testimony of various witnesses in the matter of contracts to furnish soldiers' head-stones, report :

That Congress having appropriated $1,000,000 for the erection of soldiers' head-stones at the graves of soldiers buried in national cemeteries, the Quartermaster-General, on the 27th of June, 1873, invited proposals to furnish these stones in an advertisement, from which the following is an extract :

PROPOSALS FOR HEAD-STONES FOR NATIONAL MILITARY CEMETERIES.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 27, 1873.

“ Provided, That the head-stones required by an act entitled ‘An act to establish and protect national cemeteries,’ approved February 22, 1867, and the act amendatory thereof, approved June 8, 1872, shall be of durable stone, and of such design and weight as shall keep them in place when set, and the contract for supplying the same shall be awarded by the Secretary of War, after sixty days’ advertisement in ten newspapers of general circulation, to some responsible person or persons whose samples and bids shall in the greatest measure combine the elements of durability, decency, and cheapness ; and the sum of one million dollars is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated ; and the Secretary of War shall first determine for the various cemeteries the size and model for such head-stones, and the standards of quality and color of the stone to be used, and bids shall be made and decided with reference thereto ; and contracts may be made for separate quantities of such head-stones ; and the contracts made under this act shall provide for furnishing and setting all the head-stones, and shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum hereby appropriated.”

The total number to be furnished is estimated at 253,088. For the known, 147,694; for the unknown, 105,394.

Specifications describing in detail the standard fixed by the Secretary of War can be had on application by letter to this office, where, also, a specimen will be placed on exhibition within a few days.

The proposals should be in sealed envelopes, marked, “Proposals for head-stones for national military cemeteries,” and addressed to the Quartermaster-General of the Army, in whose office they will be opened, in the presence of bidders, on Saturday, September 6, 1873, commencing at 11 o'clock a. m.

By order of the Secretary of War :

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General United States Army.

On the 6th of September, 1873, the various bids to furnish head-stones were opened at the Quartermaster-General's Office.

The following is a schedule of the bids coming within the terms of the advertisement :

II CONTRACTS TO FURNISH SOLDIERS' HEAD-STONES.

For some reason not explained, the contract was not awarded until the 17th of November following, a period of nearly two and a half months after the bids were opened. The award under the provisions of the law was not made by the Quartermaster-General, who superintended the advertising, the receiving and opening of bids, but by the then Secretary of War, General Belknap. General Belknap did not give the contract to the lowest bidder. The Knoxville Marble Company's bid was $796,154.75, being $61,349.14 less than any other bid. Although this was the lowest bid, and one that was deemed within the terms of the advertisement for proposals by the Quartermaster-General, the Secretary of War, in the exercise of his discretion, ruled this bid out, because the color of the marble did not suit him. This ruling of the Secretary of War against the bid of the Knoxville Marble Company cost the Government $61,349.14.

Walsh Brothers, of New York, claimed to be the lowest bidders for the contract. Their bid was $923,271.15 for the work. They proposed to use Italian marble. The duty on the Italian marble they claimed would be over $200,000, and as this duty would be paid to the Government, they claimed that they would only receive for the work $723,271.25.

The ruling out of this bid by the Secretary is best explained in the testimony of Mr. Walsh, (page 47,) which reads :

Q. Where were the lettings conducted ?—A. The bids were opened in the Quartermaster-General's Office, and those of the bids that were entertained were sent to the Secretary of War. The Quartermaster-General recommended my specimens of marble as being the best inside of the appropriation, and I was given to understand that he sent a letter to the Secretary of War to that effect. The Secretary of War told me that General Meigs recommended my stone as being the best. Some time afterward I went to see General Belknap, and asked him how it was that I did not get the contract, and whether he found any fault with my ability to perform it, or my security. He said no. I told him that if he did, I would furnish him with real-estate security to the full amount of the contract. He said that that was not the trouble, but that the President had told him that he should not have foreign stone over the heads of American soldiers. I asked the Secretary whether the act of Congress barred foreign stones, and he said he did not care anything about the act of Congress ; he would hold himself responsible.

Charles S. Jones, whose proposal complied with all the requirements of the advertisement, was the next lowest bidder for the entire work ; his bid was $857,503.89. The next lowest bidder was T. P. Morgan, being $860,033.40. The next is the bid of Samuel G. Bridges, of Keokuk, Iowa ; this was a bid in gross for the entire work of $900,000, being $40,000 more than Morgan's bid, $43,000 more than Jones's, and $100,000 more than the bid of the Knoxville Marble Company.

Among the bidders was D. C. Sage, whose bid for the entire work was $994,146.54. Mr. Sage bid to furnish the slabs at $5 each, and the blocks for $2.42 each. The Secretary awarded Mr. Sage a contract to furnish all the blocks at $2.42 each. He awarded to Charles S. Jones a contract to furnish 49,597 slabs at $3.39 each; to Morgan a contract to furnish 49,597 slabs at $3.40 each, and to Bridges a contract to furnish 48,500 slabs at $3.56 each.

Why Mr. Bridges should receive a contract for about one-third of the slabs at $3.56 each, when Mr. Morgan only got $3.40 for the same slabs, and Mr. Jones only $3.39, is a matter unexplained by either Mr. Bridges or any of the witnesses examined, but it is just to say that the Secretary of War was not examined before this committee.

Why the contract was not given to the lowest responsible bidder, as the law required, and why the contract for the slabs was given to three different persons, at three different prices, who were not the lowest bidders, the testimony does not explain, and justifies the conclusion that the awarding of these contracts was unfair and illegal.

Mr. Charles S. Jones, the lowest bidder for the entire contract, (except the Knoxville Marble Company,) to whom a contract for about one-third of the slabs was awarded, says :

On the 27th of October, 1873, nearly two months after the opening of bids, I received a communication from the Acting Quartermaster-General of the Army, (a copy of this letter is appended, marked "A,") desiring to know whether I would agree to furnish about one-fourth the total number of slabs required in the cemeteries at the same price each for which I had in my bid of September 6 offered to furnish both slabs and blocks for the entire work. Now, I had averaged both the slabs and blocks as to price, (as had most of the bidders,) knowing full well that while very little would be made at my price on the former, there was a considerable margin of profit on the latter.

Could I have anticipated any such division of my proposal it would have been stated at $4.39 for slabs and $2.39 for blocks; but supposing that, as in all such cases, the aggregate in dollars and cents would be the controlling element in a final award of the contract, I averaged the bid for the two descriptions of work as a mere matter of convenient calculation. Three days before the receipt of this letter from the Acting Quartermaster-General, namely, on the 25th of October, D. C. Sage, one of the bidders, who was then in the city, informed me that he was authorized to state that I would only be given a portion of the work, and if I did not accept what was offered I would not be allowed to have any of it.

Notwithstanding this, regarding the proposition contained in the letter just referred to as being grossly unjust and inequitable, as well as in violation of my legal rights as the then lowest bidder for the whole work, four days thereafter, viz, on the 31st of October, I addressed a letter to the Quartermaster-General's Office, (a copy of this letter is appended, marked "B,") in effect declining it. On Tuesday, November 4, 1873, about 11 a. m., I was standing on Seventeenth street, near the northwest corner of the War Department, awaiting a friend from the direction of Georgetown. Turning my eye in an opposite direction, I saw Mr. Sage and another person enter the War Department inclosure at the north gate, and upon reaching the main door under the portico they were met by Secretary Belknap, who received them very cordially, and the three walked together out of the inclosure to the avenue, and eastwardly until I lost sight of them.

About 1 o'clock p. m., same day, Mr. Sage, whom I did not at the moment see, hailed me as I was passing along the north side of F street, near Fifteenth street, opposite the Treasury Department. After the exchange of a few friendly salutations, he asked me how things were going on in regard to the head-stone contracts. I replied that it was impossible to tell, as everything in that line seemed very much mixed. "So I understand," said he, "since coming here this morning, and I hear that Secretary Belknap is very much embarrassed on the subject, hardly knowing what to do." He then proceeded to express his great regret that I had not accepted the offer contained in the letter of the Acting Quartermaster-General of October 27, evidently having a full knowledge of it before meeting me. He stated that if I did not ultimately accept it I would be altogether excluded from the work; but that if I would reconsider my determination, and accept the same, he would pay me as high as $15,000 in cash upon its being assigned to him, and the same amount to Mr. Morgan for his part. This I agreed to do, and on the same day addressed a letter to the Secretary of War (a copy of this letter is appended, marked "C") withdrawing my letter of October 31, preceding, and signifying my acceptance of the proposition of the Acting Quartermaster-General, dated October 27, 1873. I stated the conversation alluded to, within an hour after it occurred, to Mr. T. P. Morgan, of this city, who will verify what I say in respect to it.

This awarding of the contract as shown by the testimony was unfortunate for the Government, unfair to bidders, and surrounded by circumstances that indicate collusion between the Secretary of War and the successful bidder, Bridges. An impression seems to have prevailed among bidders before the opening of the bids that the letting was not to be a fair one; that it was the intention to give the contract to S. G. Bridges, of Keokuk, Iowa, a man of slight pecuniary responsibility, of no knowledge of the marble business, never having been in it, a jeweler by trade, and a friend of the Secretary. Upon this subject Charles F. Benjamin, chief clerk in the Southern Claims Commission, says in his testimony, (page 68:)

Mr. Eagleson and his partner, Mr. DeVean, had been here several times in the interim, on their way to and from the South, where they had a large business with marble-dealers there, and generally stopped in to see me. They desired to go into the bids the second time. There seemed to have been a great deal of gossip in the mean time, and they were in doubt as to the sincerity of this thing. They told me that they had spent a great deal of money to get information on which to make their former bids; that they had to write to all the transportation companies in the country and spend money to get friends to go and get information about the location of the cemeteries, and so on, and they were not disposed to go into it a second time unless there was going to be a contract given, nor unless it was going to be given out fairly. I told them that, so far as General Meigs was concerned, I was satisfied that it would be fairly done, and that, as I was quite intimate with the Secretary of War, I would go and see him and tell him frankly just how they felt about this thing, that they would like to go into it, but wanted to be assured that it was going to be a fair thing.

Again, this witness says, (page 69:)

What they feared was that there was to be jobbery and political influence, bribery, and all sorts of things of that kind. About a couple of days before the bids were opened one of them came to me and said that he had been over to Baltimore the night before, on the New York train, and on the train he saw the Secretary of War and a man named Bridges, who, he was told, was from Keokuk, and he said some stone-men had said that Bridges was on here with reference to this contract. I said, "I don't think that can be. Why, Bridges is a jeweler at Keokuk; he has got nothing to do with the stone business."

There is some proof tending to show that Bridges's bid for the work was deposited after a part of the bids had been opened; and in this connection the committee refer to the testimony of John M. Wright, viz, (page 20:)

Q. Were you present when those bids were opened?—A. I was.

Q. And that bid of Bridges came in after the other bids were opened?—A. It is my impression that it did. I know that one bid came in, and I am under the impression that it was this one from the color of the envelope. Mr. Bridges and myself then walked toward the Ebbitt House. He said that they could not do anything against that bid; that it was all right; and he invited me to go up to his room in the Ebbitt House, which I did. He then showed me specimens of marble which he had obtained from quarries in Vermont, together with the prices with which the parties had agreed to furnish him with the stone; and then he showed me the amount of work he had done in preparing his bid, showing that he had made abbreviations of names, ranks, regiments, and States, and that he had made close calculations on the lettering. He also showed me a letter, which he claimed was sent by the Secretary of War, in which the Secretary consents that certain abbreviations of names and ranks shall be made. He showed me, also, other letters, which he claimed to have received from the same source on the same subject, or, rather, he showed me the envelopes that inclosed them. This occurred on September 6, 1873. Mr. Bridges professed to be an intimate acquaintance of the Secretary of War, and said that he had seen him frequently on the subject.

Q. Did he intimate to you that he knew that he was going to receive the contract?—A. He intimated to me that he thought he would—that he was certain of it.

But this statement is explicitly denied by Mr. Bridges; and Captain McGonnigle, who superintended the reception of bids, has not been examined before the committee.

The evidence shows that the Secretary of War retained the bids for two and a half months before he made any award; that he divided the contract into four parts among bidders who did not stand on an equality of price, which the committee believe he was not authorized to do; that he gave as an excuse therefor that one person could not perform so large a contract, although the fact appears that Bridges did buy out all parties to whom contracts were awarded, and thus obtained the control of all the work; that he accepted Bridges's bid, and allowed him more money for his contract than he allowed two other parties for the same character and quantity of work; that after the contracts were let, modifications were made in the lettering and shape of the stones very decidedly in the interest of the contractors; that the original contract, which provided that all work in a cemetery must be completed before any money could be drawn on it, was so modified as to allow contractors to draw 60 per cent. as soon as $5,000 of material was delivered to a cemetery.

The conclusions of most moment to the public service to which your committee have arrived are the following:

That the awarding of the contracts for head-stones referred to were made in violation of law, and show a disregard of official duty.

That the contracts were not awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, as required by law.

That the separation or division of the contract, and the awarding of parts of the same to different contractors at different rates, claimed to have been done by the Secretary of War in the exercise of discretionary power, is not warranted by any law, and that such discretion was assumed without right, to the prejudice of the Government and the injury of bidders.

That some of the inspections appear to have been corruptly made, and the inspector who made them was unworthy of trust, and the committee are informed that he has been dismissed.

That the changes in form and dimensions of the head-stones, without a corresponding change in the price, have been made by the Secretary of War after the work was commenced, in the interest of the contractor, and, in the judgment of the committee, constitute an abuse of official power on the part of that officer.

In conclusion, your committee find that the awarding of the contracts appears to have been unfair, unjust, and in violation of law, and to have been decided without any proper consideration of the rights of bidders, and with the special purpose to give a portion of the contract to Samuel G. Bridges, of Keokuk, Iowa, who, under his bid, was not entitled to the contract, nor any part of the same; that this Samuel G. Bridges, who figures in the evidence as the friend of the Secretary, purchased all of the contracts that were awarded to others; that he was not a man of sufficient pecuniary means to carry out this contract alone, and without large assistance from other persons.

Your committee further find that the assignees and attorneys of Bridges, who in fact are now performing the work, are responsible and trustworthy men, and are finishing the work speedily, and, so far as your committee can learn, in a workman-like manner.

Your committee further find that when the work shall have been completed there will be left of the appropriation $200,000 to be covered into the Treasury.

The Secretary of War, Hon. J. D. Cameron, having on the 25th day of July, 1876, issued an order, under the law passed by this Congress, transferring the entire management of national cemeteries and the head-stone contracts to the Quartermaster-General of the Army, who has returned to duty since this investigation commenced, and the committee having entire confidence that under the management of this officer the work will be prosecuted rapidly and properly, and the rights of both the Government and the contractors protected, do not deem it necessary to offer any resolutions for the consideration of the House, either in regard to the conduct of the officer criticised, or the annulment of the contract.

TESTIMONY

TAKEN BY THE

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

IN REFERENCE TO THE

CONTRACTS TO FURNISH SOLDIERS' HEAD-STONES.

WASHINGTON, February 26, 1876.

A. F. ROCKWELL appeared before the committee and was examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your rank.—Answer. I am a captain in the Quartermaster's Department.

Q. In what are you at present engaged?—A. I am in charge of the office of the national cemeteries.

Q. How long have you been in charge of that office?—A. Since the 18th of August, 1874.

Q. Who was in charge of them before you?—A. Captain McGonnigle, of the Quartermaster's Department.

Q. By whom are you detailed?—A. By order of the Secretary of War.

Q. Where are your headquarters?—A. My office is in the Quartermaster-General's building, corner of Fifteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue.

Q. Is that a rented building?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What other Army officers are detailed with you in charge of the cemeteries?—A. No others here.

Q. What commissioned officers at any other place?—A. Probably twenty-five commissioned officers in various parts of the country have charge of the cemeteries in their vicinity, and report to the Quartermaster-General.

Q. How many officers are there whose exclusive business it is to look after cemeteries?—A. I am not able to state here exactly. My impression is, however, that there are but three or four; most of the officers in charge of cemeteries are on duty as post-quartermasters or regimental quartermasters, or on other military duty; the care of the national cemeteries in their vicinity being incidental work in addition to their other duties.

Q. Who is in charge of the cemetery at Chattanooga?—A. There are twenty-five or thirty of these officers scattered around the country, but I cannot tell from recollection the name of the officer in charge of that particular cemetery; he has charge of three or four cemeteries. I could tell in a moment if I had my records. I think it is Lieutenant Clark, but I cannot tell positively.

Q. The Army Register does not tell?—A. No, sir; it shows nothing about the duties of any officer.

Q. Has he any other duty besides the charge of cemeteries?—A. He has. He is a post-quartermaster or a quartermaster in some military command; I think at Atlanta.

Q. Is not there a post-quartermaster besides him at Atlanta?—A. Possibly there may be; I don't recollect. By a moment's consultation of my records I can answer these questions accurately.

Q. How many clerks are in your department?—A. There are eleven clerks employed in my office.

Q. Are they all citizen clerks?—A. They are.

Q. How many soldiers are there detailed in your office besides the eleven clerks?—A. None.

Q. How many non-commissioned officers are now on duty in charge of cemeteries and managing them?—A. I do not recall any. All the national cemeteries are managed by civilian superintendents appointed under the law by the Secretary of War.

Q. Do you recollect how much the salaries of the clerks in your department are?—A. There are three who have $150 per month, two at $125, five at $100, and one at $85 a month.

Q. Making in all how much?—A. One thousand two hundred and eighty-five dollars monthly compensation for the eleven.

Q. How many enlisted men are now on detail in charge of cemeteries?—A. None that I remember.

Q. How many citizens are employed in charge of cemeteries?—A. Do you refer to the superintendents?

Q. All the employés.—A. That I should have to refer to the records to answer.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Are not superintendents enlisted men?—A. No, sir; they are appointed under a law of Congress by the Secretary of War from soldiers who were disabled in the service. Generally they are cripples; without an arm, or thoroughly disabled for any physical work.

Q. Do you know how many there are of those superintendents and other employés?—A. I cannot answer that without reference to my records. I can give you the number of superintendents; there are seventy-one. There are eight national cemeteries without superintendents.

Q. Can you give me the aggregate pay per annum of the seventy-one superintendents?—A. I could by figuring in a very few moments.

Q. Have they all the same pay?—A. No, sir; under the law there are four classes; one at $75 per month, one at $70, one at $65, and one at $60. These are assigned according to class, under the law, by order of the Secretary of War. Subject to revision, the compensation of the superintendents is $59,000.60. They are paid by the paymaster of the Army from the appropriation for the pay of the Army.

Q. You say that beside these there are other citizen employés?—A. Yes, sir. If I am allowed, I will make a brief statement, which will perhaps answer several questions. The cemeteries, first, have been provided for under a law.

Q. Are the other citizen employés paid out of the Army appropriation too?—A. They are paid from the annual appropriation for the care and maintenance of the national cemeteries.

Q. What is the business of the citizen employés other than the superintendents?—A. The only other employés are generally at certain seasons of the year laborers, who are employed for the care of these various cemeteries.

Q. Have those employés or superintendents houses to live in at the cemeteries?—A. The superintendents have lodges, which are built by the Government from the appropriation for national cemeteries.

Q. Have they any rations?—A. They have not.

Q. Have they any other perquisites of any kind?—A. None, sir, except their pay and their houses to live in.

Q. You say they are all old soldiers?—A. Under the law they must be disabled soldiers, men who have been disabled during the late war.

Q. Are there any officers of the Army living at any of those cemeteries?—A. None that I know of, not one.

Q. How much was the appropriation for those cemeteries last year?—A. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Q. Tell us how the balance of this money is expended other than that paid to the employés.—A. There is paid from the cemeterial appropriation, first, for the construction of walls and lodges; then there is the rent of quarters; (I might explain with regard to that item that at a few of the cemeteries no lodges have been built, and temporary quarters outside have to be hired;) rent of quarters, sheds, and stables, green-houses, trees, and plants, employés, drainage, barrack and office furniture, purchase of tools and stores and miscellaneous expenditure, improvement of grounds, flag-staffs and monuments, water supply, purchase of land, examining titles, &c., and interments. This $150,000 is used for those various purposes; and in my report, which is before me, there are items for each cemetery and each head of the appropriation.

Q. You say part of this is paid for monuments?—A. Yes, sir. For example, a requisition will be made on the Chief of Ordnance for the erection of a gun-monument at some national cemetery, say a ten-inch gun; the expense of setting that gun up in masonry with shell and cannon balls; that is what is meant by the item of monuments. The items are all small for that work; various cemeteries have that kind of work done.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. That is purely ornamental?—A. Yes, sir; purely ornamental.

Q. Do you recollect how much appropriation you have asked for of that kind for next year?—A. Yes, sir. I have asked for $250,000. In explanation of that I would like to say that at all of these eighty cemeteries there have been erected lodges for the superintendents and inclosing-walls of brick or stone, with the exception of at thirteen cemeteries there are no lodges, (including Phinn's Point, one which has been recently established, fourteen,) and there are eleven where there are no walls—twelve, including Phinn's Point. I state in my report that "this office has estimated for $250,000, $100,000 more than what is annually used, for the ensuing fiscal year, and if this sum be appropriated it is confidently expected that, in addition to the ordinary maintenance of the cemeteries, all the walls and lodges can be built out of that sum." Out of the eighty cemeteries there are fourteen lodges yet to build and eleven inclosing-walls.

By Mr. REILLY:

Q. Do you mean walls entirely around the cemetery?—A. Yes, sir. The wall is the fence around the cemetery. They are built of stone or brick.

Q. How large is the largest one of those cemeteries; how many acres?—A. I cannot speak without reference to the record, but my impression is that Arlington is one of the largest; there are in the vicinity of three hundred acres in it, and that is entirely inclosed with a stone wall.

Q. How large is the one at Chattanooga?—A. It is not so large, but its area I can tell by reference to the records.

Q. How large is the smallest one?—A. The smallest one is probably the one at the battle-ground, out near the Soldiers' Home; that is probably not to exceed three acres; perhaps four.

Q. Would not a wooden fence be more lasting than a brick wall?—A. O no, sir; the wooden fence that we built at Fort Gibson in 1868 is now in ruins, and we hope to be able to build a wall there.

Q. It must have been built of poor material.—A. It was built of oak and walnut that I sawed from trees that I cut down, logs that I hauled to my mill, lumber that I sawed myself.

Q. How much do the lodges that you build cost?—A. So far as my recollection goes, they average between four and five thousand dollars; of the four lodges which were built within the last year three cost $4,600 each, and one something less than that.

Q. What are they built of?—A. They are of stone or brick.

Q. How many rooms do they contain?—A. They contain three rooms on the first floor, with three attic rooms; they are a one-story building, with a Mansard roof and attic rooms.

Q. Do you build stables to all these cemeteries?—A. At some of them there are stables. At some of the large cemeteries there is kept during the year sometimes one or two animals for the care of the cemetery. A good deal of money has been spent upon the cemeteries and their beautiful places. They partake somewhat, in my judgment, of the nature of national parks in various parts of the country.

Q. How many of those cemeteries have stables?—A. That I can answer by reference to the records.

Q. How many horses have you at those cemeteries?—A. That also I can tell by reference to the record.

By Mr. REILLY:

Q. Where there are horses furnished, the Government pays for them too?—A. Certainly, sir. Everything is public property.

Q. Is the entire place at Arlington covered with graves?—A. No, sir.

Q. Does not the party occupying that cultivate portions of it in any way, or does he get grass off the portion that is not so occupied?—A. The place is in charge of the superintendent, and the cemetery is under the immediate charge of the deputy quartermaster in this city, General Myers. It is nearly covered with trees, according to my recollection of driving through it. It is more of a park than anything else, filled with beautiful drives and roadways.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do the superintendents at those cemeteries mostly all have gardens?—A. Under the direction of the Secretary of War, if there is any portion of the cemetery that can be properly used for that purpose, they are allowed to cultivate a small piece of ground for such vegetables as they need for their own use. Such cultivation does not grow into an abuse. Frequent inspection is made of the cemeteries; one inspection a year by the officer appointed under the law. These things are all regulated by the local officers in charge, and by the inspectors. Frequent inspections also are made by the engineers in my office.

Q. How many Government wagons or other vehicles have you at these cemeteries?—A. I will answer that by reference to the record.

By Mr. REILLY:

Q. Does the law require the furnishing of houses to the superintendents?—A. I don't recollect whether the law calls for that, but in the annual appropriation made for the past ten years I think the language of the law covers the expenditures that have been made. These lodges and walls have been building during the past ten years, under the annual appropriations made by Congress for the care and maintenance of the cemeteries.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Does the Government pay for the furniture of these lodges?—A. It does not, except that the superintendent is entitled to a desk to transact his business and take care of his papers—some office-furniture.

Q. There is, I see, an item of $5,943 for water-supply; does that mean for digging wells, or what?—A. Yes, sir; that is for digging wells and for the supply of water at the various cemeteries.

Q. Employés, $47,617; what does that include?—A. Those are the employés of the cemeteries outside of superintendents. Those employés are paid from the annual appropriation for the care and maintenance of the cemeteries. The superintendents are paid from the Army appropriation; those employés consist of laborers and gardeners—those that have charge of the trees and flowers—but principally laborers.

Q. How many cemeteries are there at which you have green-houses?—A. That I can answer by reference to the record.

Q. You have two miscellaneous items, "miscellaneous purchases and repairs, $6,000," and "miscellaneous, $8,000." Why are the miscellaneous charges put in two items?—A. One refers to the purchase of any little article that is required at a cemetery, for example a tool of any kind, and the other refers to repairs.

Q. One of them reads, "miscellaneous purchase and repairs," and the other simply "miscellaneous."—A. The last item of $8,610.22 refers to clerks, advertising, and printing; clerks, postage and stationery, transportation, barrack and office furniture, and seeds for distribution. Those are the miscellaneous expenditures in my own office, clerks and everything of that kind. Then the other "miscellaneous repairs" refers to any simple purchases of tools that are authorized by either of the quartermasters at the various cemeteries; for instance, a cart has been repaired or any little item of repair which involves an expenditure of five, ten, or twenty dollars, whatever it may be.

Q. What is the advertising you speak of?—A. It is advertising for contracts. I have an advertisement now out authorized by the Secretary of War.

Q. Contracts for what?—A. For the building of lodges and walls. They are built under contract.

Q. Do you know how much you pay for advertisements?—A. There is the item of last year, $378; the advertising is done by order of the Secretary of War under existing laws.

Q. The seeds for distribution are those that you purchase and distribute to the various cemeteries?—A. Yes, sir. They are principally flower-seeds, flowers, shrubs, &c., for beautifying the cemeteries.

Q. Where are these purchases made?—A. They are, as a rule, made by the local officers in charge of the cemeteries. The mode of distributing this appropriation is this: The $150,000 at the beginning of the fiscal year is allotted to the various cemeteries according to their size and importance and the probable expenses that will be required. To a cemetery there will be allotted so much for employés, so much for seeds, so much for drainage, so much for the various heads that you see there in the report. Then the allotment is made out and submitted to the Quartermaster-General, by whom it is approved. Then the various local officers in charge are informed of their allotment, and they know that they cannot expend a dollar in excess of the allotment. It is equivalent to an estimate for the year. If from any cause it becomes necessary to make a greater expenditure, for example under the head of drainage, than is allotted for that particular cemetery, they report the facts and request the authority to have so much more. If approved by the Quartermaster-General, that additional amount is remitted to them from the Treasury. The remainder of the appropriation after the allotment is made has been, since I have been in charge of the office and during my predecessor's time, used for the erection of these walls and lodges. We have been gradually trying year after year to get up a few walls and lodges. During the past year we have erected four lodges and two walls. I have advertisements out now for two lodges and two walls for erection the coming year.

Q. Would not any one of several of the cemeteries afford ample room for the interments that are made in all the cemeteries?—A. Possibly it might; but with reference to that I might say that the cemeteries are now a fixed fact, as it were; a great deal of money has been expended upon them; the new head-stones are being rapidly erected under the appropriation of $1,000,000 which was made in 1873.

Q. Would it not be attended with very great economy even to disinter all of them and remove them to one general cemetery?—A. I think it would involve a very great expense to begin with; and I think it would shock the sentiment of the relatives of the dead.

Q. I did not ask you about that; I asked you about the economy of it.—A. Pardon me, sir; I made the answer on impulse.

Q. Would not the annual expenses that will be necessary, according to your report to keep up these different cemeteries, pay for disinterring and burying these people all in one general cemetery, in a very few years?—A. In my judgment it would not, for this reason: So far as I can look at the question here, the expense of transferring the 300,000 bodies from various parts of the country to one general cemetery would involve a very great amount of outlay, and the money which has already been expended upon these various cemeteries would be lost.

Q. Is the fee of these cemeteries mostly in the United States Government?—A. It is, sir. I think, with scarcely a single exception, the United States has the title to every cemetery. The cession of jurisdiction by the States in some instances has not yet been granted, but as the legislatures meet we are making application to them for cession of jurisdiction, and it is in most instances granted.

Q. After these cemeteries are completed as to lodges, what will be about the necessary annual appropriation, in your opinion, to keep them up?—A. I think $100,000 a year would be ample to keep them in good repair, in good condition. That would be a minimum amount, in my judgment.

Q. What amount of money has been appropriated by Congress to supply head-stones to these cemeteries?—A. One million dollars was appropriated for the purchase of head-stones for the national cemeteries.

Q. Are the contracts for those head-stones under your supervision?—A. The details of their execution are under my supervision.

Q. Under whose supervision is the making of the contracts?—A. Under the law the contracts were made by the Secretary of War.

Q. How were these contracts made?—A. They were made in obedience to law by advertising for sixty days in the usual way; the awards were made by the Secretary of War, and the contracts were made, under his direction, by the Quartermaster-General.

Q. Have those contracts all been made?—A. They have, sir. They were made, before I assumed charge of the office, by the Quartermaster-General, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Q. Are those contracts in your keeping or in the Quartermaster-General's?—A. They are in my charge; one copy of each contract. There is a copy on file in the War Department and in the Quartermaster-General's Office for information.

Q. With whom were those contracts mostly made?—A. Five contracts were made; four of them for the erection of the head-stones for the graves of the known soldiers and one contract for the head-stone blocks to mark the graves of the unknown soldiers.

Q. Who were the parties with whom those contracts were made?—A. One contract was made with Samuel S. P. Morgan, of this city; another with C. S. Jones, of this city; another with S. G. Brydges, of Keokuk, Iowa; another with E. P. Doherty, which is a solitary contract for Fredericksburgh for slabs and blocks of granite, (all the rest are of marble;) and the fifth contract, for the blocks for the unknown, with D. C. Sage, of Cornwall, Connecticut.

Q. Do the contracts require the placing of the stones?—A. Yes, sir; my report goes into full detail of that.

Q. Have any of those contracts been annulled since they were made?—A. The one for the Fredericksburgh cemetery has not been annulled, but it has been declared forfeited, and the work is now being done by the United States through an agent, who was the subcontractor for the original contractor.

Q. Was it forfeited because of the failure to perform?—A. Because of failure to perform and after repeated extensions, and because there was no possibility of the work being completed in time.

Q. What will those stones cost under the contract? Are the contracts all at the same price?—A. No, sir. They average about $3.50 for head-stones, and $2.50 for blocks for the unknown soldiers; that is the average. I will correct that by the actual figures.

Q. Will the contracts, as made, require the entire appropriation?—A. No, sir. A careful estimate which I have stated officially to the Secretary of War will result in finishing the contracts for $200,000 less than the appropriation.

Q. When will those contracts be carried out?—A. Under the existing agreement they should be finished on the 1st of July, 1876. My impression, however, is that they will not be finished at that time, and that an extension of time will be required. The work is a very gigantic one and is being prosecuted now, and has been for a year past, with all the energy and rapidity which could be reasonably expected, in my judgment.

Q. Is the money paid upon them as the work progresses?—A. Sixty per cent. of the money is paid whenever the stones are delivered, and evidence of the fact that the freight has been paid and the stones delivered; when the entire lot is delivered and there is evidence of the freight being paid. Then when the stones are set, and all the terms of the contract are complied with, the rubbish cleared away, and all that, 30 cent. is paid, and 10 per cent. is ordered retained until the completion of the contract.

Q. Were these contracts all let to the lowest bidder?—A. So far as I know, they were; but I had nothing to do with them. Colonel Mack, of the War Department, who had charge of all the details, could give you precise and accurate information in regard to it.

Q. What is the whole number of graves in all the cemeteries?—A. My report shows, I think, 306,000.

By Mr. REILLY:

Q. Was that 40 per cent. retained from that man who did not complete his contract?—A. We had never paid him a cent, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are there any reductions that can be made in the labor and assistants employed in your office, clerks or others?—A. I do not think there can be. The clerical force employed in my office is unusually large, for the reason that the execution of these head-stone contracts is an unusual incident in the work of the office, and a great majority of the employés are engaged upon that work. The money to pay their expense has already been appropriated. We do not need any additional appropriation. The force employed there is a temporary force, and when the work that is to be done is complete it can be very largely reduced. If it takes one man ten days to do a given piece of work, ten men will do it in one day. For those 306,000 head-stones, it is absolutely essential that the inscriptions should be accurate. The great bulk of the work is in preparing accurate inscriptions. To do that we have to search all the records of the Adjutant-General's Office, and we are in correspondence with the adjutant-generals of the various States. The work of preparing accurate lists of the dead is a very laborious, delicate, and intricate one. The men employed on that work are trained, and it is work that has to be done once and then it is done forever, and when done the services of this extra force will be no longer required. With the completion of the head-stone contracts these men will not be required, unless it should be decided by Congress to make a revised roll of honor of these dead soldiers, and then probably their services would be required for six months longer. That would be perhaps desirable.

Q. Does not the Adjutant-General's Office at Washington contain all the information upon these subjects that is contained in the adjutant-generals' offices of the different States?—A. It would seem not, sir. There are great discrepancies at various times, and we have to search in various places to get accurate information.

Q. Your information consists of the name, company, and regiment of the soldier, as taken from the company-rolls, does it not?—A. The law requires that the inscription upon the head-stones shall give the name, rank, and State of the soldier. We have to get that information. The company and regiment under the law is not required.

Q. That information is not contained in the Adjutant-General's Office here?—A. Not necessarily. The greater portion of it can be obtained there.

Q. What States, if any, have failed to supply the Adjutant-General's Office with these rolls?—A. This information is furnished us by the adjutant-generals of States direct. We are in direct communication with them.

Q. Is there anything in the way of your procuring it from the Adjutant-General's Office here direct?—A. We do get a great deal of information from that Office, but there are facts concerning the death or interment of soldiers that are not here in the Adjutant-General's Office. Of course the great amount of information that we get is from the Adjutant-General's Office here; but there are items of information concerning this or that individual that cannot be found in the Adjutant-General's Office. As a matter of fact, we get a great deal of corrected information from the adjutant-generals of the States.

Q. What information are you required to get in your office under the law providing for the inscriptions upon those tombstones other than that which you have named which should be in the Adjutant-General's Office?—A. I know of no other information than that which requires us to get the correct name of the soldier, his rank, and his State; and we get from any possible source that is available.

Q. Ought not less than half the number of clerks that you now have employed be able to procure this information as fast as the contracts can require it?—A. That is the question. These head-stone contractors are calling upon us for lists as fast as we can prepare them, and with a less force the work of the contractors would be retarded. We are working every man up to the closest mark possible to meet the requirements of the contractors. They are turning out their stones at the rate of five hundred slabs a day from their mills.

Q. What surplus, if any, will you have of the appropriation to your office for this fiscal year?—A. For national cemeteries; the $150,000?

Q. Yes.—A. It is my intention not to have a dollar. We make the appropriation available down to the last cent in this way: we allot it, as I stated before, to each cemetery.

By Mr. REILLY :

Q. You think there will be $200,000 saved from that appropriation for head-stones?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, if it is certain that that will be saved, why should not that be assigned to the cemeteries as your regular appropriation?—A. I see no objection to that, but under existing laws we cannot spend money out of one appropriation for another purpose.

Q. Suppose we fix that for you?—A. O, yes; if Congress were to say that any balance out of the $1,000,000 for head-stones should be used for the care and maintenance of cemeteries, it would be available for that purpose, but until Congress took such action we could not spend a dollar of it for any other purpose than the head-stones.

WASHINGTON, March 4, 1876.

OSCAR A. MACK sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. What corps of the Army do you belong to?—Answer. The Twenty first Infantry.

Q. In what are you at present engaged?—A. I am on duty in the War Department, and have been since 1869. My duties there are of a miscellaneous character. Since April, 1870, I have had the inspecting of national cemeteries in addition to my duties in the Office.

Q. What, if any, other Army officers have been engaged in the inspection of national cemeteries?—A. I am the only officer that has been employed properly as an inspector, under the law of February, 1867, by the Secretary of War; but various officers of the Quartermaster's Department have been employed in cemeterial duty. Every cemetery is under the charge of some quartermaster, the nearest one, or the acting assistant quartermaster at the nearest post. He is the immediate superior of the superintendent; but the cemeterial office here in Washington is under the charge of Captain Rockwell, (his predecessor was Captain McGonnigle,) both of the Quartermaster's Department.

Q. Are there any other officers of the Army whose business it is to inspect cemeteries?—A. Yes; every quartermaster that has charge of a cemetery is expected to personally visit it occasionally and inspect it to see that it is properly taken care of, but he does not make reports to the Secretary of War. He makes his report to the Quartermaster-General.

Q. How many citizen inspectors are there?—A. There are five engineers; we do not call them inspectors; they are civil engineers employed to inspect the work that is going on at these cemeteries, particularly now that the head-stones are being furnished.

Q. How long have they been employed?—A. One of them has been employed, I should think, five or six years, perhaps six years. He was employed to rebuild the Vicksburgh cemetery after it was washed down, and I think he has been continued ever since. The others have been employed since the commencement of the head-stone contracts, I think; possibly one of them was employed before. I know I recommended the employment of one to inspect work that was being done at cemeteries, on account of the inferior work that I had discovered.

Q. Are there five or six of them in all?—A. My impression is that there are but five. There are six.

Q. What is their pay?—A. I cannot tell.

Q. Where are their homes?—A. I do not know of but one; his home is in Washington.

Q. What is the name of the one who lives in Washington?—A. Chenowith.

Q. Is he a civil engineer?—A. Yes.

Q. Was he an officer of the Army, do you know?—A. No, sir, I think not; I never heard that he was.

Q. Do you know anything of the letting of the contract for headstones?—A. Yes.

Q. Does that come under your supervision?—A. Yes.

Q. Who was the contractor?—A. There were several. The work was divided up and the contracts were awarded to five parties. The act of March 3, 1873, appropriated $1,000,000 for the procuring and setting of head-stones in the national cemeteries, over the soldiers' graves, and it was ascertained that it would require about 253,000 head-stones. This made the price for each individual stone very small, considering the extent of transportation that would be required, which would be a great item. This law required the Secretary of War to designate the materials to be used, the form, size, color, and everything about the headstones, before advertising. He designated white marble and gray granite, and the specifications were prepared prescribing for the known soldiers a slab 4 inches thick, 10 inches wide, and 3 feet long, for the latitude of Washington and south, and 3½ feet for places north of Washington, to be inserted in the ground so that there would be 1 foot above the ground, and for the unknown a block 6 inches square and 3 feet long. The advertisements were made according to law by the Quartermaster-General, and I think about eighty bids were received. The law required that the contract should cover the whole of the work or none could be entered upon. It was found, upon opening these bids, that thirteen of them came within the $1,000,000. There were fourteen bids, but in one of them—the lowest—the material was not white marble or gray granite, and it was thrown out, so that it left thirteen bids to select from. The bids were for slabs and blocks, each bidder bidding for both, and covering the whole work. After the bids had been opened, two of the bidders—the lowest bidder for slabs and the lowest bidder for blocks—entered into some correspondence and informed the War Department that they would like to have their bids for the slabs and for the blocks separated. Previous to that it was supposed that each man considered that his bid for both slabs and blocks were to be taken together. The bidder for the blocks was a Mr. Sage, of Connecticut, and his bid was so much lower than any other for blocks, and his quality of marble was so good, that he had really no competitor. In the bids for the slabs there was not such a marked difference, and the Secretary decided that he would divide the contracts for the slabs for the known among the four lowest bidders. I ought to say, though, that there was a firm in New York, named Walsh Brothers, who bid for Italian marble. Their bid was lower than some of the others, but it was decided not to accept it, because they bid for foreign marble, and it was understood that the work was to be done abroad; and as it was known that we had good marble in this country it was thought desirable to have the work done here. So they were ruled out. It was also known that granite was the best material that could be used, but the bids were so high that it precluded its use, except at one cemetery, Fredericksburgh, Va. It was found that we could have granite used there and marble at the other cemeteries and still be inside of the appropriation. E. P. Doherty, of Washington, was the bidder for the granite head-stones at Fredericksburgh. It was decided to offer him the contract for that cemetery for granite, and Mr. Sage the contract for the balance of the head-stones for the unknown; and the balance to Mr. Jones and Mr. Morgan, of Washington, S. G. Bridges, of Keokuk, and the Brandon Marble Company, (represented here by Mr. Goodell;) to divide the cemeteries as equally as we could conveniently, and have the difficulties of transportation equalized among them. Mr. Jones and Mr. Morgan declined to accept this offer; they would take the whole work, but they declined to accept the portions offered them. Mr. Bridges accepted it. Mr. Goodell did not respond to the offer that was made. This was in the fall of 1873. It was desirable to have the contracts closed as soon as possible, but I think we waited about a month to hear from Mr. Goodell and did not hear anything, and the portion of the cemeteries that had been allotted to him was added to the other three lists that had been made, and another offer was made to the other three parties. Before this, Mr. Jones and Mr. Morgan changed their minds and notified the Department that they would accept the contract for those cemeteries or any others that were offered. So, after waiting this time for the Brandon Marble Company, the three lists were made up embracing all the cemeteries except Fredericksburgh, and they accepted those offers and entered into the contracts, filing the required bonds. Doherty and Sage made the contracts for the portions allotted to them; and it was under those five contracts that the work was commenced and is now in progress. These contracts were not executed until the 31st of December, 1873, so that nothing could be done that winter, and nothing was done until late in 1874.

Q. Were the contracts signed in 1873?—A. Yes, sir; I think they were dated December 31.

Q. And the work was not commenced until when?—A. There was no setting of head-stones done until late in 1874, but the work of preparing them commenced some time in the spring of 1874. Mr. Jones formally abandoned his contract, and wanted to have his sureties released, but he was notified that they could not be, and the Quartermaster's Department took charge of the work. Mr. Morgan signified his willingness to undertake Mr. Jones's work at Jones's bid, and he was allowed to undertake it as the agent of the Quartermaster's Department. These contracts were all executed, and provision made for the supervision of the carrying out of the contracts by the quartermaster in charge of the cemeterial office in this city; first Captain McGonnigle, and afterward Captain Rockwell.

Q. Were any of these contracts abandoned after they were commenced?—A. No, sir; not after they were commenced. Mr. Jones had not commenced his. He lived here in this city.

Q. Who was the contractor from Iowa?—A. S. C. Bridges, of Keokuk, Iowa.

Q. How much of a contractor was he?—A. Well, as I have stated, he had offered him the one-fourth part of the slabs for the known at first, and then when the Brandon man did not respond, that part was added on to the others, and I think Bridges had rather more than a third of the entire contract.

Q. Did he go on with the contract himself?—A. It went on in his name. He was the contractor, but his bondsmen furnished the capital and superintended the work.

One of them was Geo. Williams and the other was Mr. Connable, both of Keokuk—both men of ample means.

Q. Has that contract been fulfilled?—A. I do not think it has been completed yet. I do not think any of them have. Mr. Bridges and his bondsman, Mr. Williams, who was the working man, quarreled, and Mr. Bridges succeeded in settling with him in some way and securing the control of the other contracts under the firm of Sheldon & Slosson, marble-men, of Rutland, Vt., and they, I suppose, are the men who are really carrying out the contract to-day.

Q. Did Mr. Bridges sell out his contract?—A. No; I think not. I think it is the other way; that he has nominally bought out the others; but, under the law, they cannot sell a contract.

Q. But he was the contractor for one-third; is he still carrying out that contract for his one-third?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Whom do you say he bought up?—A. I think he has nominally bought up Morgan and Sage; and Mr. Morgan had Mr. Jones's work assigned to him; so that makes the whole of it. But that is a private arrangement, which we have nothing to do with, and their bondsmen are not released. We look to them for the fulfillment of the contract. There are certain powers of attorney that have been exchanged between these parties. They all go to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury to see whether they are legal and binding. I do not know the nature of them.

Q. Is there anything more you want to say on that subject?—A. No, sir; I don't recall anything.

Q. Do you inspect anything more than the stones themselves—the grave-yards also?—

A. Yes, sir; everything. My inspections are not for the acceptance of these stones, or anything of that kind; the engineers are men who examine and accept; but I go around to see that the engineers do right, and that the work under the Quartermaster's Department is properly done. The blocks for the unknown cost $2.42 apiece. The slabs vary in price. The lowest bid, Mr. Jones's bid, was $3.39, and the highest, from Mr. Bridges, was $3.56. The slabs run between those prices.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You, in the performance of your duty, have charge of the yards, and supervise the work that the inspectors pass?—A. Yes, I examine everything; criticise anything that I think is not right, and make suggestions as to what ought to be done. I have to examine into the conduct of the superintendents—into everything pertaining to the appropriate management and control of the cemeteries.

Q. All these parties make subcontracts for the supplying of these stones?—A. Under the law they cannot transfer a contract.

Q. I know they cannot, under the law, but do they do it?—A. No, sir; they have had to keep within the law, because everything has gone to the Comptroller for his ruling as to whether they were within the law.

Q. So far your statements have been with reference to the marble-contract. That was all in the hands of Bridges ultimately, was it not?—A. It is now.

Q. How is he paid—on your recommendation?—A. No, sir. The engineers make a certificate that the work is done, and it is sent to Colonel Rockwell, and he makes the payment. I have nothing to do with it. If there is anything that requires reference to the Secretary of War it goes up from his office to the Quartermaster-General; but all the details of the payment and the work is in the Quartermaster's Department.

Q. Now, in reference to granite, what do you say?—A. Mr. Doherty had the contract awarded to him for the "known" and for the "unknown" in the Fredericksburgh cemetery. The graves amounted to between six and seven thousand—I do not recollect the number. He had submitted as a sample a block of granite in a quarry near Fredericksburgh, but he made an arrangement with a granite company (of Andrew and Ordway, I think) at Richmond to supply Richmond granite. The first stones that he reported ready for inspection were rejected by the inspector, Mr. Chenowith, both for inferior quality and bad work. Mr. Doherty, I think, had him inspect them again, stating that he had thrown out the bad stones or had had them redressed, but they were again rejected. Mr. Chenowith was sustained by the Quartermaster-General, and Mr. Doherty appealed to the Secretary of War, complaining that the engineer was incompetent; that he did not know what good stones or good work was. General Meigs, who is an engineer himself, indorsed Mr. Chenowith and vouched for his competency and integrity, but Mr. Doherty was so persistent that the Secretary directed Captain McGonnigle (who was then in charge of the office) and myself to go down to Fredericksburgh and look at the stone that they reported as ready to be offered, and we confirmed the report of the engineer and went even further than he did. The granite was of very poor quality, from the top of the quarry apparently, disintegrated and discolored stone; some of it you could punch with a staff and it would flake off. Then Doherty abandoned that Richmond granite and stopped the work for a while. Stones that he had there at Fredericksburgh were levied on for his debts, for board, labor, &c. Some time after that I understood that he had made an arrangement with Riggles and some other man in Washington to work that Fredericksburgh quarry and get the stone there. After some months, these gentlemen, or one of them, came to the office and complained that Doherty would not pay them and wanted the Department to order payment to be made to them, but they had got no power of attorney from Doherty. I believe they had nothing in writing that they could show, and we told them that we could not do anything about it; that that was a private arrangement between themselves which the Department could not interfere with. About this time the limitation of the contract expired, and these parties wished to have the contract given to them, and Doherty wished to have the time extended. It was reported that his bondsmen were not good, but he offered to give new bonds that would be satisfactory, and upon that ground the time was extended until the fifteenth of last December, and new bonds were filed. After this extension of time, these parties, Riggles and another, instituted a suit against him, and they procured an injunction, which was served on the War Department, not to make any payment under this contract to Doherty or Andrews and the others named, and orders were given them not to make any payment until the suit was terminated or other orders were given in the case.

This work under the contract as extended was prosecuted by Mr. Andrews, and, I believe, with the Westham Marble Company, of Richmond. They had no stone accepted; they had some difficulty with the same engineer in regard to the acceptance of the stone again; and when the 15th of December arrived, although they claimed they had stone that ought to be accepted, no stone had been accepted up to that date, and there had been so much trouble with Mr. Doherty that it was considered advisable to terminate his connection with the contract, at the expiration of his time, as extended, and have the work executed as provided in the contract, as in the case of abandonment or failure. The work was directed to be put under the charge of and carried out by the Quartermaster's Department, but as the Westham Granite Company had already manufactured the head-stones, or a number of them, and had even brought a car-load up to Washington to have them looked at, (Colonel Rockwell and myself went to look at them,) the Quartermaster-General was authorized to allow that company to complete the work as agents, provided they would do it at a price not exceeding that stipulated in the contract. They acceded to the proposition, and I think they are now setting the stone. When Doherty learned that his connection with the contract had terminated, he endeavored to induce the Secretary of War to revoke that decision and allow him to have another trial; but the Secretary declined to do that, and then this Westham Granite Company made an agreement, I believe, (that Colonel Rockwell can testify to,) that they would pay Doherty the same amount that would have accrued to him if they had completed the contract at the time stipulated in the agreement. That satisfied him, and the matter is going on smoothly now; but that is all in the Quartermaster's Department, and the documents and everything in connection with the whole transaction are on file there.

Q. All these operations you had nothing to do with?—A. After the first award of the contract.

Q. All that you had to do was to supervise or inspect it?—A. My duties had nothing specific in regard to the head-stones more than anything else. I had to inspect everything.

Q. When these contracts were let for the head-stones were there any bids at that time known as straw-bids?—A. I do not know. The bids were all opened in the Quartermaster-General's Office, by him, and a tabulated statement of them made and sent up; but so far as I know they were all genuine bids. I looked in the Directory for the name of this man Jones that I have mentioned, but could not find his name. I thought perhaps he might be a straw-bidder. He was notified that he must produce some assurance that he could carry out the contract if it was awarded to him, and he presented a letter to the Department, signed by Geo. W. Riggs, Dr. Blake, and Dr. Kidwell, certifying—they did not say that he was really worth the money; but that he could command means to carry out any contract that was awarded to him. They were men well known, and I suppose knew what he was. Those papers are all on file with the contract. Everything of that kind was kept.

Q. Was there anything at that time, or has anything since come under your observation, in reference to those bids that would induce you to think that there was anything in them except what was perfectly straight, right, and honorable?—A. No, sir; I do not know of anything.

Q. How many cemeteries are there?—A. I think 81.

Q. At each one of these cemeteries you have what you call a superintendent, have you not?—A. There are 8 or 9 cemeteries where we have no superintendent. They are very small, and are at posts or near other cemeteries, so there is no need of superintendents at them. I think there are 73 or 74 superintendents.

Q. The pay of these superintendents does not come under your supervision?—A. No, sir; I have nothing to do with that. The pay is with the Pay Department.

Q. The buildings that are erected at these places, do they come under your charge?—A. No, sir; no more than to see that the work is properly done, and to see if they have been properly accepted. That is what these engineers are specially employed for, to see that the work is proper. I report whether the superintendents kept the buildings in proper order, and whether they take proper care of them.

Q. You have nothing to do with the employment of them?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know Mr. Bridges?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know in what way he is related to the late Secretary of War—Belknap?—

A. He is not related to Mr. Belknap. He is a townsman of his.

Q. It is charged that he is Mr. Belknap's brother-in-law.—A. I know it is; but I am very sure it is not true.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 6, 1876.

EDWARD P. DOHERTY sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. I reside at 1459 Pierce street, Washington

Q. Are you an Army officer?—A. No, sir; I am a citizen.

Q. Have you been an Army officer?—A. Yes.

Q. How long since you left the Army?—A. I left the Army on the 27th December, 1870.

Q. Were you in the Regular Army?—A. Yes; I was first lieutenant of the Fifth Cavalry.

Q. Were you an officer during the war?—A. Yes.

Q. In what capacity were you serving when the war closed?—A. I was captain of the Sixteenth New York Cavalry.

Q. Are you the officer who captured Booth?—A. I commanded the expedition that captured Booth and Harrold.

Q. Have you been a contractor to supply head-stones for soldiers' graves?—A. I have been for the Fredericksburgh National Cemetery only. The contract amounted to about 2,800, according to the number of graves of known soldiers.

Q. Were you an original or a subcontractor?—A. I was an original contractor.

Q. To whom did you submit your bid?—A. I wrote a letter to General Meigs, an informal letter, stating that I would supply granite blocks at $3.50 apiece, and granite slabs at $3.95, to the Fredericksburgh National Cemetery.

Q. Were there any bidders against you?—A. There were quite a number of bidders, but I was not present when the bids were opened. Subsequently I received a letter from Colonel Mack, of the War Department, asking me if I could furnish security providing the contract was given to me. I called upon him and asked him the amount of security, and he said that it would probably be double the amount of my contract, which would make it about $50,000. I told him that when he informed me of the amount of the security, and that I was going to get the contract, I would tell him whether I could furnish the security or not. He finally told me that he would give me the contract, and we made the contract, and I furnished the security to the amount of 20 per cent. of the amount of my contract, which made the security only $5,000.

Q. Who were your securities?—A. James M. Orme and Henry Himber.

Q. How far have you progressed with your contract?—A. I am out of it. My contract has run out. I had better explain. My contract ran out on the 15th May last, but I got a renewal of it for six months. I sublet it to the Westham Granite Company, of Richmond. The renewal ran out on the 15th November. I then applied for six months' extension, and I was given thirty days. In the mean time we commenced shipment of head-stones, slabs, and blocks from Richmond as fast as we could. There were 1,049 of them in the cemetery, and between three and four thousand on the way to or at Fredericksburgh. On the 17th November Mr. Chenowith, the civil engineer, came down and refused to set up more of them. He commenced setting them and then went away and would set no more. My contract ran out again on the 15th December last, when it was taken from me, in consequence of my not having finished the work.

Q. How much money have you received on it?—A. Not a cent from the United States.

Q. Has the work been finished since?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who has it now?—A. The Westham Granite Company, my subcontractors.

Q. Then the contract was given out to the party to whom you had sublet it at the time it was taken from you?—A. Yes.

Q. Was the party then going on with the work?—A. They were.

Q. What was the reason for taking the contract from you, and giving it to the party to whom you had sublet it?—A. That can be explained at the War Department; I do not know. Mr. Chenowith, the engineer, was continually harassing me and condemning the work; and my agent at Fredericksburgh, when a car-load arrived there which was condemned by Chenowith, sent it up to Washington, and we called upon the Government to make an inspection of it. We got a Government engineer and experts to go down to the railway depot and examine the car-load of stone, and they pronounced it better than the contract called for. Everything then seemed satisfactory, and I supposed that I would get a further extension to finish the work, but when I went to Colonel Mack he told me that they had had trouble enough; that the contract had run out, and that he declined to renew it. I then told him that I had been two years at work upon it, and that it was a hardship upon me as well as on my subcontractors. He said, "The law gives us the authority to buy the stone, and go on and finish the work ourselves."

Q. Was the contract made by the Government with your subcontractors for any less or greater amount than you had contracted with them to do the work for?—A. That I do not know. The Government was always insisting on more work on the stone. I had given more work than the contract called for.

Q. Your contract was in writing, and is on file in the War Department?—A. Yes; I have a copy of it, and also copies of both extensions.

Q. Colonel Mack is the inspecting-officer of cemeteries, is he not?—A. Yes.

Q. Was he the inspector of your work?—A. He was the inspector of cemeteries, but there was a subordinate inspector over my work, G. D. Chenowith. He resides in Washington City; his father is a preacher here.

Q. What is his business?—A. He calls himself an engineer. He is one of the civil engineers appointed for this cemeterial work by the War Department. When the Westham Granite Company took that work from me in May, 1875, myself and Mr. Andrews went to see Captain Rockwell and told him that if this man Chenowith had anything to do with the work we would not take $20 a stone to go on with it, because he did not know his business and was continually condemning the stone, and it was either capriciousness or ignorance on his part.

Q. Who composed the Westham Granite Company?—A. The Westham Granite Company is composed of J. C. Smith, of Buffalo, N. Y., as president; Snowden Andrews, of Baltimore, as treasurer. Albert Ordway was secretary a short time, but I don't know whether he is still in the company or not. Mr. Ordway lives in Washington now, and is clerk to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Q. Had that company any other contract to furnish stone for the Government but this one?—A. The company furnishes the granite for the new building for the State, War, and Navy Departments, and this was the same stone which was furnished to that building.

Q. Did that company furnish any other head-stones?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Did Mr. Bridges, of Keokuk, Iowa, have anything to do with this contract?—A. Not with mine. He furnishes marble.

Q. Was he interested with you in any way?—A. No, sir.

Q. Are you at present interested in any way in this or any other contract to furnish stone?—A. This was my last contract, and it ran out. I am not interested with the Government at all in any contract. I expect to get something out of the Westham Granite Company.

Q. Is there any agreement between you by which you are to get anything?—A. Yes.

Q. What is that agreement?—A. The agreement is that the company will pay me the same as if the contract had been in my name, providing I would not interfere with them but would let them go on with the work.

Q. When was that agreement made?—A. That agreement was made after the Secretary of War had refused to extend my contract. Then I threatened to enjoin the company. I took legal advice on the subject, and they then wrote a letter stating that they would pay me this percentage, and I accepted it. This letter was written to Captain Rockwell.

Q. Did they get any better terms for themselves under this agreement than they had as contractors under you for the same work?—A. I cannot say; I do not know what their agreement with the Government is. I know that the stone which was condemned on me was accepted from them.

Q. After you had been discharged and the contract was off as between you and the Government, and as between you and them as subcontractors, they came in and took the contract from the Government?—A. Yes; they came in and took the contract from the Government. They had expended all the money on this last contract.

Q. In making the new contract with them did the Government advertise for bids?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know who, on the part of the Government, contracted with them?—A. Captain Rockwell, under the direction of Colonel Mack.

Q. Did he contract with them knowing that they were subcontractors under you to finish the work?—A. Yes.

Q. You had given the Government officers that notice?—A. Yes; we drove down in the same carriage, Mr. Andrews, Colonel Mack, Captain Rockwell, and myself, and made an examination of the stone that had been condemned in Fredericksburgh, and had been sent up here, and which had been pronounced by experts in the new State Department building as better than the contract called for. I told Colonel Mack that it was a great hardship for these subcontractors and a great hardship for me at this last hour to take the contract from me. He said, "We cannot help it; we have had too much trouble about it."

Q. What did they give as a reason for taking the contract away from you and giving it to the same parties to do to whom you had sublet it?—A. I called Colonel Mack's attention to the fact that they were defaulters and not me. I remarked that I didn't have much to do with it lately. I said that I had spent a great deal of money, and had just returned from Fredericksburgh, after spending a good deal of time in Richmond, and I had opened a quarry at Fredericksburgh, Va., at my own expense.

Q. Had you any other contractors with you in this matter?—A. I had—Kelley and Riggles, as subcontractors.

Q. What were they furnishing?—A. It was for the same work. After I had opened a quarry at Fredericksburgh these other parties made a proposition to me to do the work and to furnish the head-stones. They proposed to furnish the blocks for $2 a piece, and the slabs for $3. My partner, Samuel Little, and I gave them the contract. I remained there some ten days afterward to see if the work was progressing. It was not going on very well. I had to return to Washington, and I waited here for a month or six weeks. I found that the work was not progressing satisfactorily, and I called upon the Government to send an engineer down there to examine the quarry and the progress of the work. Mr. Chenowith was sent down, and he reported that the stone was of a satisfactory kind. Mr. Kelley then returned from Fredericksburgh, and told me he would not go on with the work unless I paid him a larger amount. I told him that as Mr. Little was not in town I declined to have anything to say to him. I consulted Little, and after the consultation I went back and asked Kelley how much more they wanted. He said they wanted $2.50 apiece for the blocks and $3.50 for the slabs. I then told them that Mr. Little would not do that. Then Kelley said, "You can influence Mr. Little and we will divide with you." I said, "No; Mr. Little is my partner," and I immediately went and told Little the proposition. Immediately after that they said there was a clause in my contract which gave them to the 15th of April to finish the work, and they would not go on with it unless I paid them more money. They also showed me a piece of stone which Mr. Chenowith had given them, telling them to go to Richmond for the stone. A few days afterward they abandoned the quarry at Fredericksburgh. Their contract with me ran out on the 15th of April, and my contract with the Government ran out on the 15th of May, and there was no work done except what stone I had shipped from Richmond in the early part of the season—probably 1,500 slabs and blocks, and nearly 200 unfinished ones that Kelley and Riggles had got out of my quarry at Fredericksburgh.

Q. How much was the Government to pay you for furnishing these stones?—A. Three dollars and fifty cents apiece for the blocks and $3.95 for the slabs.

Q. At what price did you sublet the work?—A. I sublet it to Kelley & Riggles at $2 for the blocks and $3 for the slabs.

Q. At what price did you sublet it to the Westham Granite Company?—A. I first of all sublet it to that company (before I got hold of Kelley & Riggles) at $1.25 for the blocks and $1.40 for the slabs, delivered at the wharf at Fredericksburgh, but the Westham Granite Company failed to live up to their contract, and afterward re-organized the company. I then waited till September, 1874, before I got hold of the quarry in Fredericksburgh. These stones were examined in Richmond, and all condemned except one; but the engineer, Chenowith, said that if I would recut them he would accept them. So I had them recut at great expense and shipped to Fredericksburgh. Then Chenowith came down again and condemned all of them but four. I then went back to Richmond and got them to ship me some for cash. The stone was a peculiar kind of granite of a very fine grain. The stone was shipped in the rough, as I had the idea of having it cut myself. I therefore brought a lot of stone-cutters to Fredericksburgh and commenced cutting the stone there, but Mr. Chenowith came down and condemned them.

Q. What followed after that?—A. I complained, of course, continuously of Mr. Chenowith, but I could get no satisfaction, so I determined to wait and open this quarry at Fredericksburgh and work it myself. My means, by that time, were getting pretty low, and I sublet the work to Kelley & Riggles, after opening the quarry myself with my partner.

Q. What followed then?—A. Kelley & Riggles would not do the work. Everything was going on satisfactorily till Chenowith went down, and then Kelley & Riggles wanted more money, and I refused to give it to them.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Did they get out any blocks or stones?—A. They got out about 200 blocks in the rough. They may have cut some when they were moved down to the city.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. When was that?—A. That was about December, 1874. Kelley & Riggles then bought up all the stone that had been condemned on me, notwithstanding I had bound them in a contract not to do so. I called upon the Government for another inspection, and an inspector went down and passed 1,100 of these same stones.

Q. The same inspector?—A. I hardly think it was. I was absent from the country at the time, and my partner was attending to the business.

By Mr. WILLIAMS :

Q. From whom did Kelley & Riggles buy this stone? Did you not own it?—A. No, sir. Things were getting gloomy there. The wharfage was running very high against me, and when I was absent I was sued for the wharfage. I let the stones remain there, as they had been condemned. I believe that the hotel-keeper down there bought them on speculation, and afterward sold them to Kelley & Riggles on contingency.

By Mr. STRAIT :

Q. Had the stones been cut or altered in any way after the rejection?—A. I presume they must have been, but they were condemned in the first instance on account of their being yellowish granite of a coarse grain. That was the objection to the stones. I brought a portion of them with me to Washington, and showed it to various architects, and got certificates from each, which I laid before the Secretary of War, and after a time he accepted all the stone I had at the cemetery, but Chenoweth again went down and condemned it, notwithstanding the letter of the Secretary of War.

Q. Have you that letter of the Secretary of War?—A. I have, but not with me; I have no papers with me.

Q. What was that letter?—A. It was in answer to my request that the matter should be referred to a board of arbitration. The Secretary sent Colonel Mack down there, but Colonel Mack returned and wrote me this letter declining to submit to a board of arbitration, and stating that if I would make the bottoms flat and square of the stones in the cemetery he would accept them. The edges of some of these blocks were very large and irregular in the sides; and it was also an objection to them that they were too long.

Q. Do you mean the dressed portion of them or the portion in the ground?—A. I mean the portion in the ground. The dressed portion was proper.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. After this what followed?—A. Then Kelley & Riggles made a demand on me to pay them for the stones which they furnished, for an order on the quartermaster. My partner counseled with the Department, and was informed that the stones were not accepted till they were erected and the rubbish removed. That was specifically the contract between myself and Kelley & Riggles. They then complained to the Quartermaster-General, and wrote a good many letters. I got tired of the matter, and wrote to my partner to authorize the Quartermaster-General to pay Kelley & Riggles, and deduct the amount from us, so as to push the work on. Still, the work did not go on, and their contract with me ran out on the 15th of April.

By Mr. WILLIAMS :

Q. Were they paid?—A. No; for they did not go on with the work.

Q. Were the stones ever put up?—A. They never were put up.

Q. Where are the stones now?—A. They are at Fredericksburgh. There has never been a stone erected there yet, but forty-seven.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. To whom did you sublet your contract after that?—A. Then the 15th of May came around, and my contract with the Government ran out, and everybody was afraid to touch it, as we had had so much trouble, so I turned again to the Westham Granite Company, which had re-organized, and offered, if they would do the work, to pay them some $6,000 more than I had agreed to pay to Kelley & Riggles. Colonel Andrews and I visited the Quartermaster's Department, and Andrews said that if Chenoweth had anything to do with the work he would not touch the stones for $20 apiece. He said, "You have five other engineers, and we will accept any of the others." I went away, and about August I found that there were no stones being shipped by the Westham Granite Company, and so I wrote to the Government to send an inspector to Richmond to see how the work was going on. An inspector was sent there, and he found some faults, but these defects were remedied, and the stones were shipped to Fredericksburgh. As soon as they got to Fredericksburgh Chenoweth was inflicted on us again.

Q. Who is Chenoweth?—A. He is a civil engineer; a young man, about 22 years of age.

Q. Is he an officer of the Army?—A. He is not. He is a citizen. My agent at Fredericksburgh, being disgusted at the wholesale condemnation, shipped the whole car-load on here to Washington.

Q. What followed then?—A. Mr. Andrews and I called on Colonel Samo, who was the architect and engineer in charge of the new State Department building. I submitted to him the contract and specifications, and asked him to come down to the depot and make an examination of the stone there. He went reluctantly, and then sent for stone-cutters, who were at work on the new State Department building, and asked them to examine the quality of the stone. The block required to be what is known among stone-cutters as eight-cut work. These experts pronounced that most of the blocks were ten-cut work; that all of the tops of the blocks were ten-cut work, and the sides eight-cut work. We then made this statement, and sent in Colonel Samo's report, and called on Colonel Mack and Captain Rockwell, and showed them the report. They said first that they would not go down to examine the stone, but finally they went with us, and what the result was I do not know, except that the contract was taken away from me.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. You still have an interest in the contract?—A. The taking away of the contract would make a defaulter of me.

Q. The Department knows that you still have an interest in it?—A. They know, yes.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did not the Secretary of War know at that time, when the contract was made with the Westham Granite Company, that had been your subcontractors, that you were still to retain an interest in it?—A. I do not know whether the Secretary of War knew it or not.

Q. Did any Government officer know it?—A. Yes, I think that Captain Rockwell and Colonel Mack knew it. I am pretty certain that Colonel Mack did. I called frequently on Captain Rockwell since, and asked him when he was going to pay money on this contract.

Q. Did they contract with the Westham Granite Company knowing that you had a contract then running with the company for the performance of this work?—A. Yes. My contract with the Westham Granite Company ran out at the same time with my contract with the Government, although they were defaulters to me for not finishing the work.

Q. Did the Government contract with the Westham Granite Company to perform this work knowing that they were defaulters to you?—A. Yes.

Q. Who were the officers of the Government that made that contract knowing that fact?—A. Captain Rockwell, under the direction of Colonel Mack.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. How do you know that they knew it?—A. That is very true; I do not know it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. After you sublet this contract to the Westham Granite Company, did you inform these officers of the Government that you had done so?—A. Yes, I did.

Q. Did the inspectors of the Government inspect this work that was done by the Westham Granite Company knowing that they were your subcontractors?—A. They did.

Q. Did the Westham Granite Company file with the Government officers this subcontract with you, or notify them that they were entitled to so much of the money?—A. I demanded of Captain Rockwell that he should retain from the Western Granite Company the amount due me by them, but he refused to do so. I then drew up an agreement for their signature, and left it with Captain Rockwell, but he returned it to me, and said that that was an affair outside of his office.

Q. Was this before or after the Government made a contract with the Westham Granite Company?—A. This was in the interim between the time when my contract ran out and the time that they were making a contract with the Westham Granite Company.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. What was the date of the contract which the Government made with the Westham Granite Company after your contract expired?—A. It was about two or three weeks after my contract expired.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Did I understand you to say that the Westham Granite Company failed to perform their contract with you for delivering stone at $1.25 and $1.40?—A. Yes. Then I went at the work myself, and afterward made another subcontract with Kelley & Riggles, and afterward I made an arrangement with the Westham Granite Company.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. What price were you to pay under this second arrangement?—A. Under the second arrangement with the Westham Granite Company I was to pay $3.45 for the slabs and $2.75 for the blocks, and also to allow them nineteen cents a stone on the stone which they had shipped to me previous to that, which would make the prices $2.94 for the blocks and $3.64 for the slabs.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. What quarry at Fredericksburgh was that granite taken from?—A. From the Taylor quarry, which is located about quarter of a mile above the town, on the Rappahannock, and is accessible by water.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What prices were you to receive from the Government?—A. Three dollars and fifty cents and $3.95. My first contract with the Westham Granite Company was that I was to pay them for slabs cut and delivered at the wharf at Fredericksburgh $1.40 apiece, and for blocks cut and delivered and lettered $1.25.

Q. Is that contract in writing?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you it with you?—A. No, sir. I have it in my possession and will present it to the committee.

Q. Had you any conference with the Secretary of War in regard to this matter?—A. Yes. The stone was condemned, as I told you, on account of its being yellow granite, and I took three blocks of it and carried around the city and got certificates from the chemist at the Agricultural Department, Mr. McMurtrie, and from Mr. Fraser, an architect, and from a professor of mineralogy of this city, whose name I forget. They pronounced the granite first-class monumental granite. I then went to the Secretary of War and told him that I appealed to him; that I had lost a great deal of time and money, and that I came to appeal to him. Colonel Mack was out of town, and there was some delay for a month or two.

Q. What was the result of that conference?—A. The Secretary of War sent Colonel Mack to Fredericksburgh, and on his report six hundred odd of the stones were accepted, which I had hauled into the cemetery. But Mr. Chenowith went down again and condemned them. I complained of that by telegraph, and got a letter from Captain Rockwell, stating that that was in accordance with the letter of the Secretary of War.

Q. Had you any conference with Mr. Chenowith on the subject?—A. Frequently.

Q. What did he say?—A. He said he had his orders.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. What did you understand to be his orders—that he was to condemn the stones?—A. No, I do not think he had orders to condemn them.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you have any conference with Colonel Mack on the subject?—A. Frequently.

Q. Did you ever, at any time, pay any money to any officer of the Government in connection with this matter?—A. No, sir, I never paid a cent, and I never told anybody that I had done so.

Q. Did you ever offer any money to any officer of the Government?—A. No, sir; I never did.

Q. Did any inspector or officer of the Government ever ask you for any money?—A. No, sir.

Q. At any time?—A. At no time.

Q. Did you ever make any promise to any officer of the Government, inspector, or other, of any consideration whatever in the matter, that he was to be paid at any future time?—A. No, sir; I never did.

Q. Did you at any time tell Edward Kelley that you had paid Colonel Mack the sum of $1,500 for his influence in getting you an extension of your contract?—A. I never told him or anybody else that I did.

Q. Edward Kelley says in his affidavit, which I have before me, that, "on or about the 22d of May, 1875, I met Doherty at Wormley's Hotel. He was under the influence of liquor at the time. He told me he had paid Colonel Mack, United States Army, inspector of national cemeteries, the sum of $1,500 for his influence in getting him an extension of his contract."—A. I never told him anything of the kind; and at that date Kelley was a person with whom I would not associate or act with, from the fact that he and one of my bondsmen, prior to that, had combined to get the contract out of my hands. The bondsman had withdrawn, and I did not know it until the Secretary of War informed me on the Saturday previous, the day before my contract ran out. Of course I furnished another bondsman at once. Kelley induced this man Himber to withdraw from my bond so that he could get my contract. He said that Colonel Mack had promised him that he would be paid for his stone, or something of that kind. The contract was to expire the next day. When I went to the Secretary of War to ask the favor of a renewal, in consideration of Kelley and Riggles having so much harassed me, he said, "One of your bondsmen has withdrawn." I asked who it was, and he said it was Himber. I had seen Kelley and Himber very much together for a week or so previously. I said to the Secretary, "Suppose I furnish new bondsmen?" He said, "That changes the thing. I will see the Second Comptroller" (or somebody) "and see about it." This was on Saturday the 14th, and the contract ran out on the 15th.

Q. Are you acquainted with Samuel B. Bridges?—A. I am.

Q. Is he one of the contractors that furnished head-stones?—A. He is one of the original contractors, and the only one, as I understand it, for the slabs throughout the United States. There is another contractor for the blocks.

Q. Did you purchase from him any right of lettering?—A. No, sir; he offered to sell me the sand-blast right, but I declined to purchase it.

Q. Had you any correspondence with him?—A. I think I had; I think he wrote me a letter.

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. Explain what you mean by the sand-blast.—A. The sand-blast is a process of lettering done by incising or putting the letters on in relief by the blast. That is how the marble headstones are being lettered.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Have you at any time known of money being paid or offered to any officer of the Government in connection with this matter?—A. No, sir; I was told that Chenowith received a gold watch.

Q. Who told you so?—A. I was told so by John C. Comfort, who was then a contractor, and that his hotel bill was paid by Comfort at Richmond. Comfort showed me the receipt for it. I believe that that matter was investigated by the Department and that Chenowith returned the watch. I only know that from what Comfort told me. Comfort was a contractor for lodges and walls. Chenowith and he got quarreling afterward, and I believe he bursted up.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where does he live?—A. I think he lives in Shiremantown, Cumberland County, Pennsylvania.

Q. How do you know that Comfort paid his hotel bill in Richmond?—A. Comfort showed me a receipt purporting to be a receipt for Chenowith's hotel bill.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. What did it amount to?—A. It was a small amount; probably within $25.

Q. What hotel was that?—A. At the Ballard House.

Q. Did he tell you that he had paid that hotel bill in consideration for any services that Chenowith was to render him?—A. No, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Comfort was a contractor and Chenowith was an inspector of the work which he was doing?—A. Yes.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Were they personal friends up to that time?—A. It appears so.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What about the watch?—A. Comfort told me that he also bought Chenowith a watch, and that Chenowith got scared and returned the watch to the dealer on the avenue. He, Comfort, took me in one day to Goldstein's, on the avenue, and showed me a watch which he said he had given to Chenowith and which Chenowith had returned.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. How long did Chenowith have possession of the watch?—A. I don't know.

Q. Did he send it back as soon as he received it?—A. I do not know.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was this during the time that Comfort was doing work for the Government?—A. Yes; he was doing work at Poplar Grove Cemetery, near Richmond, and two or three other cemeteries.

Q. Is Chenowith now in the employ of the Department?—A. He was up to the 15th of last December. He was on my work then.

Q. When was it that this hotel bill was paid for him by Comfort?—A. Some time in 1874.

Q. When was it that the watch was given him?—A. At the same time, I understand.

Q. Do you know if the giving of the watch was brought to the notice of the Department?—A. I only know it from what Comfort told me.

Q. Did he tell you that it was?—A. He told me that it was, and I think I asked Colonel Mack about it, though I am not certain; but I was told by Colonel Mack that the matter had been investigated. I will not be positive about it, but my impression is that I wrote to Colonel Mack a letter asking him to take Chenowith off my work, and told him the facts or rumors that had come to me about him.

Q. Do you know of any other payment of money or giving of promises, or presents, to any other inspector or Government officer?—A. No, sir; I do not.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Chenowith was not an agreeable inspector to you, and you wanted him taken off your work?—A. Yes; I did not think he was justified in condemning my work.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. When Comfort told you about these presents to Chenowith, did he do it for the purpose of inducing you to do likewise?—A. No; it was to induce the Government to remove Chenowith, in order that Comfort might have an inspector who would not be continually condemning the work. That was my understanding of it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You say that you called the attention of the Government officers to this matter of the acceptance of Chenowith of the watch, and the payment of his hotel bill?—A. I think I did. I am not positive, but I believe I did. If I did not, there was an attorney employed by Comfort here, whom I understood did. That was Mr. Edwin L. Stanton. That is what Comfort told me.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Your own impression is that you wrote to Colonel Mack in regard to it?—A. I think I did. I think I wrote him a personal letter.

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. Was it after the payment of this hotel bill, and the presentation of this watch that this man Comfort complained that he wanted Chenowith removed because he would not do justice to his work?—A. Yes.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. After your contract had failed, and they had told you that they would have nothing to do with you, the contract was sublet to this Westham Granite Company at the same figures which the Government had been paying you?—A. I cannot say that the contract was between the Government and the Westham Granite Company.

Q. How much did the Westham Granite Company agree to pay you on that contract?—A. Seventy-five cents on the blocks and fifty cents on the slabs, deducting nine cents off each for the stones which they had already furnished, amounting to $1,250.

By Mr. HARDENBERGH:

Q. Do you know the contents of the affidavit made by Kelley?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Do I understand you that you have an interest in the present contract with the Westham Granite Company?—A. Yes; but not with the Government.

Q. On what terms have you an interest in the present contract, you not being a contractor?—A. Simply because the Westham Granite Company were defaulters to me, and I proposed to sue them and to restrain them from drawing any money from the Government unless they indemnified me for my trouble and loss.

Q. Then it is just an arrangement to secure you from loss?—A. It is an outside agreement between me and them to prevent a lawsuit.

Q. How do you secure your interest out of the profits of that contract?—A. I trust to the Westham Granite Company to pay me. It is an outside arrangement I made, not recognized at all by the Quartermaster's Department.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is there any relation between Mr. Bridges and the Secretary of War?—A. Not that I know of.

The affidavit of Mr. Kelley was read to the witness.

The WITNESS. The first portion of that affidavit is correct—that is, that he was a subcontractor under me; and the last portion of it is correct, that Samuel Little was a friend of the Secretary of War. But as to my telling him that I paid money to Colonel Mack or anybody, and that I was going to do so, is false. I had no communication with Kelley on this subject. I told him that if he had anything to say, he should do it in writing and I would consider it. Finally, when he found out that the contract was made with the Westham Granite Company, he came to me with the written proposition to sell the stones that he had, and I referred him to the Westham Granite Company.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is it true or not that Bridges offered to buy you off?—A. Bridges did at one time say that he would help me out. He frequently said he would help me out. I do not recollect his making any distinct proposition.

Q. Who is Samuel Little?—A. Samuel Little resides in New York now. He was my partner, and is from Newburgh, N. Y. He knows the Secretary of War.

Q. Did he have any contract with the Government?—A. No, sir. After I got into these difficulties, Little was doing nothing, and he insisted on coming in with me, so I let him in, but we did not get along any better.

Q. Did he pay you any money for letting him in?—A. No, sir. I gave him one-third interest, and he was to advance money to open the quarry at Fredericksburgh and to work the thing. But after consultation, and after Kelley & Riggles made us this proposition, we determined not to work the quarry ourselves, but to sublet the work, and we did so.

Q. Where did you meet him when you let him in?—A. I met him here in Washington. I knew him some time before, and he wrote me several times asking me to look up something. When they condemned the stone at Fredericksburgh, I wrote to him to come to Washington, and he came, and we went together to see General Meigs, and then we went to see the Secretary of War. But we did not get along any better. That was about the upshot of it.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Had you any other reason for letting him in than to get more means to conduct your business?—A. Yes; I thought he had some influence.

Q. Influence with whom?—A. With the Secretary of War.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. He was a friend of the Secretary of War?—A. Yes; though when he went to see the Secretary at West Point the Secretary would not listen to him at all, and when he reported to him that Chenoweth was still condemning the stone, the Secretary said that he could do nothing.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Who appointed Chenoweth?—A. I do not know; he was appointed by the Quartermaster-General's Department.

Q. Did you complain to General Meigs about Chenoweth?—A. I complained to General Meigs, and General Meigs said there was no use in complaining to him about the engineers.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State what was your reason for letting Mr. Little into your contract.—A. I wanted money and I wanted influence; that was the only reason.

Q. Did any one advise you to let him in?—A. Not exactly. I met him here frequently. He used to travel between here and New York a good deal. I had been on friendly terms with him. I thought at first that I would worry the thing out myself, but I found I had to take some one in to help me out. Samuel Little was as good a person as I could get, so I wrote to him and he came to Washington.

Q. Is he a man of means?—A. He was a man of means, but he is not now, I think.

Q. Was he at that time?—A. I think he was; I do not know; I cannot say exactly what his means were.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. Did any officer of the Government recommend you to take him in as partner?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did anybody connected with the Government?—A. No, sir.

EDWARD P. DOHERTY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 9, 1876.

JOHN M. WRIGHT sworn and examined.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Question. State your residence and occupation.—Answer. I reside in Logansport Ind. I have been superintending a marble quarry in Virginia.

Q. State whether you had anything to do with the bids for furnishing headstones for soldiers' cemeteries.—A. I had. I was associated with bids at both lettings. My father put in bids in his name. I assisted him in arranging them, and watched the progress of them.

Q. Did you receive any contract under those bids?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see the bids of other parties after they were made public?—A. Yes; I knew the bids after they were made public.

Q. Were your bids lower than the others?—A. No, sir; they were not.

Q. Have you any acquaintance with Mr. Samuel G. Bridges, of Keokuk, Iowa?—A. Yes, sir; I made his acquaintance on September 6, 1873.

Q. Go on and state what conversation occurred between you and him in reference to those bids.—A. After the bids had been opened there was some discussion about a bid which had come into the room after the majority of the bids were opened. A good many of us remained up stairs in the Quartermaster's Office; and some insisted on an immediate explanation. I remained up stairs for a few moments, and on going down I met, at the foot of the stairway, Mr. Bridges, who asked me what was going on up stairs, or something to that effect. I told him there was a row about a bid that was slipped in. He asked what bid it was. I told him that it was a bid put in by a man named Bridges. He said that it was his bid, and that it was all right, or words to that effect.

Q. Were you present when those bids were opened?—A. I was.

Q. And that bid of Bridges came in after the other bids were opened?—A. It is my impression that it did. I know that one bid came in, and I am under the impression that it was this one from the color of the envelope. Mr. Bridges and myself then walked toward the Ebbitt House. He said that they could not do anything against that bid; that it was all right; and he invited me to go up to his room in the Ebbitt House, which I did. He then showed me specimens of marble which he had obtained from quarries in Vermont, together with the prices with which the parties had agreed to furnish him with the stone; and then he showed me the amount of work he had done in preparing his bid, showing that he had made abbreviations of names, ranks, regiments, and States, and that he had made close calculations on the lettering. He also showed me a letter, which he claimed was sent by the Secretary of War, in which the Secretary consents that certain abbreviations of names and ranks shall be made. He showed me, also, other letters, which he claimed to have received from the same source on the same subject, or, rather, he showed me the envelopes that inclosed them. This occurred on September 6, 1873. Mr. Bridges professed to be an intimate acquaintance of the Secretary of War, and said that he had seen him frequently on the subject. He appeared to be a very well-posted man on the matter generally. His object in interviewing me, however, was, I believe, to see if he could not obtain from me stone from Virginia for certain cemeteries in that locality, and he asked me to furnish him the prices of slabs of the desired dimensions, delivered at different places, and that he would do his own lettering.

Q. Did the letting take place then?—A. No, sir; I did not give him any definite answer, and left him shortly afterward.

Q. Did he intimate to you, in any way, that he had knowledge of what the other bids were, or anything of that kind?—A. No, sir; he did not.

Q. Did he intimate to you that he knew that he was going to receive the contract?—A. He intimated to me that he thought he would—that he was certain of it.

Q. Give us his language, as nearly as you can.—A. He professed to be conversant with Government contracts. I do not know whether I gained as much from his language as I did from his manner. He evidently acted as if he thought he would obtain the contract, and it is not a matter of surprise that I should have inferred it.

Q. Have you seen Bridges subsequently to that date to talk to him about this matter?—A. No, sir; I have never seen him since.

Q. Do you recollect the date of that letter which Bridges had, purporting to have come from the Secretary of War in reference to the abbreviation of names?—A. No, sir, I do not, but it must have been at some date prior to that, so as to enable him to make all these tablets and charts which he had in a bureau drawer; it was partially filled with them.

Q. Do you recollect seeing published a notice in the Evening Star that there would be an alteration in the terms of the contract?—A. Yes, sir; that was a few days prior to the drawings; not more than two or three days, is my recollection.

Q. Do you think that that notice was sufficient to have informed all the bidders, scattered over the country as they were?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Was the notice sufficient after you discovered it, to have enabled you, as a bidder, to go through the entire schedule and make full estimates as to how much you could afford to alter your bids in view of that change?—A. No, sir; it was not. I could not have done it.

Q. What do you mean by the abbreviation of names?—A. The abbreviation of the first name, and the abbreviation of rank, regiment, company, and State.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. You saw schedules in Bridges's possession with all these abbreviations calculated on?—A. I saw schedules in which he claimed so many letters for certain cemeteries, with the general footings. He could make his estimates by dividing the footing by the number of stones, which would show the number of letters to each stone.

Q. Was there anything more in the published notice of the Secretary of War than the alteration of the lettering; was there anything in it as to the change of material or form which the stone should have when finished?—A. No, sir. I think there was an illustration published of an abbreviated name and rank; nothing further than that.

Q. Do you recollect whether, in that notice of the Secretary of War, there was anything on the subject of lessening the depth of the lettering?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was Mr. Bridges a relation of General Belknap?—A. I cannot say that he was. He claimed to be an intimate acquaintance.

Q. Have you any knowledge that this information was given to Bridges prior to the published notice; did he say anything about having had longer notice of these changes than that published in the papers?—A. It is only inferential knowledge on my part. He claimed to be very intimate with the Secretary of War, and said that he had called to see him several times on the subject, and had corresponded with him, and had received several communications on the subject. He produced letters and envelopes which he claimed to be from the Secretary, one of which he showed me, which was the one in regard to the abbreviation of names, ranks, and States. I did not notice the date of that letter.

Q. Did Bridges receive the contract?—A. I understood that Bridges received the contract.

Q. Do you know his present whereabouts?—A. No, sir; I have had no acquaintance with him since that time.

Q. Do you know of any other persons who have any knowledge of the same transaction?—A. Mr. Walsh, of Brooklyn, N. Y., had in a very low contract, and was present when the bids were opened. He seemed to be very indignant when this other bid was received and opened, and he demanded an immediate investigation.

Q. Do you know whether any investigation was made?—A. I was informed that General Meigs interrogated the clerk who conducted the opening of the bids, and that the explanation made was that the basket was so full of bids that it would not hold them all, and that this bid had fallen off in the safe and had not been discovered until nearly all the rest of the bids were opened, when it was brought in.

Q. Did General Meigs give any expression as to what would be the fate of that bid?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you recollect the names of any other bidders who complained of the same thing?—A. I recollect a gentleman named Patterson, of the firm of Bearden & Patterson, Knoxville, Tenn., who complained, and who claimed to have seen this bid brought in. There was another bidder or attorney present who was watching the bids, Mr. Robert Christy, of this city, who also saw that bid come in. He was sitting at my side at the time, and called my attention to it. This bid came in after nearly all the rest of the bids had been opened and read.

Q. Do you know what limit was fixed as the time for receiving bids?—A. I knew at the time, but I have forgotten. They were receivable up to a certain hour the day of the opening. They did not proceed to open any of the bids until that time had passed. We were assembled in the room. General Meigs opened the bids for a time until he became tired, and then he employed a clerk to do it. The bids were all read off open in public. I presume there must have been thirty or forty interested parties in the room, and I should judge that there were from one hundred and fifteen to one hundred and twenty bids filed.

Q. Was it a difficult contract to figure on?—A. It was a very difficult contract to figure on, because the cemeteries were so scattered over the country that the expense of transporting the stones to some cemeteries would be enormous in some instances and light in others; no average cost could be easily obtained.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Did Mr. Bridges receive the contract?—A. It was my understanding that he received a contract for the entire work.

Q. At the prices which he bid, was there a large margin for profit?—A. No; I do not see that there was any margin at all. I do not see how he could get his contract through but for the advantage of the abbreviations.

Q. Has he gone on and executed the contract?—A. I have not been advised.

Q. Do you recollect whether there were different kinds of stones recognized in the schedule for different localities, or whether a uniform quality of stone had to be bid on?—A. I do not recollect exactly; but my impression is that marble was preferred for the purpose.

Q. Of a certain color?—A. I think they were to be white-marble slabs. The impression prevailed that that would be preferred.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1876.

SAMUEL G. BRIDGES sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. Where do you reside ?—Answer. In Keokuk, Iowa.

Q. How long have you lived there ?—A. Since 1857.

Q. What is your business ?—A. I have no business of importance, except contracting and the head-stone business.

Q. In what business were you employed when you took the grave-stone contract ?—A. I had formerly been in the mercantile business, and had been contracting for about three or four years previous to that.

Q. What had you been contracting in ?—A. I had been furnishing grain, wood, hay, and had contracts of that kind.

Q. At Keokuk ?—A. No, sir ; through the West ; through the Department of the Missouri and at Saint Paul ; these contracts were awarded at Leavenworth and at Saint Paul.

Q. When did you commence contracting through the Department of Missouri ?—A. I don't remember the exact time, but about 1870, I think.

Q. Before or after Mr. Belknap became Secretary of War ?—A. I think not until after.

Q. What contract did you have in the Department of the Missouri ?—A. Furnishing grain, hay, and wood.

Q. Where at ?—A. At different posts.

Q. State them.—A. Fort Wallace, Fort Dodge, Fort Lyon, Fort Larned, and Fort Hays.

Q. Had you any partner or partners in that contracting ?—A. I had not ; except latterly, in one instance, I had a partner. I had no partner in business generally, but in one instance I had.

Q. In that contracting in the department prior to the grave-stone business ?—A. I had one at Fort Hays in executing one contract.

Q. Who was that ?—A. I. W. Armentrout.

Q. Who first suggested to you the grave-stone contract ?—A. The advertisement, I think, that I saw in the paper.

Q. Where were you when you read that advertisement ?—A. I think I was at home ; I am not positive, however. I may have been away from home on my business outside. My impression is that I was at home.

Q. In what newspaper did you read it ?—A. I am not able to state. I don't remember.

Q. Had any person whatever suggested this matter to you before you read it in the newspaper ?—A. I think not, but am not positive.

Q. Did you know before you read it in the newspaper that $1,000,000 had been appropriated for that purpose ?—A. I did not, that I recollect.

Q. Did you know that any amount of money had been appropriated for that purpose ?—A. I did not, that I recollect.

Q. Did you consult with any persons after that before you made your bid for the work ?—A. I consulted with persons touching rates of freight, with marble-dealers in Vermont, mechanics, and others, with regard to cost of executing the necessary details connected with such work.

Q. Did you come on to Washington before you prepared your bid, or did you prepare it at Keokuk ?—A. My costs and everything connected with it were nearly prepared, but not fully, at Keokuk, from information received, except for the marble.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL :

Q. Received from whom ?—A. At once when I decided to bid or to look the matter up, I commenced by writing in every direction to get rates of freight and about doing the work. I wrote to the marble-men for samples and prices.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. With whom, if any one, did you correspond on the subject at Washington prior to coming on, prior to making your bid ?—A. Not any person except the Quartermaster-General, that I now call to mind.

Q. Did you telegraph to any person upon the subject ?—A. No, sir ; not to the best of my recollection. Did you mean any one in Washington ?

Q. Yes, sir.—A. Not that I recollect.

Q. Did you telegraph to any one connected with the War Department at any point ?—A. No, sir ; I think not.

Q. Did you write to any one connected with the War Department at any point ?—A. I wrote through the proper channel for information touching the blanks and abbreviations.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Q. Or converse with any one connected with the War Department at any time ?—A. I think not. My bid was made from the information that I received, decisions of my own, and knowledge that I had in connection with such work. I do not think anybody knew that I was going to bid, except the parties that corresponded with me while figuring up the cost.

Q. Did you bring your bid to Washington yourself?—A. I came personally with my bid.

Q. Prepared before you got here?—A. Everything was prepared as stated before, except adding prices for marble, I think.

Q. Was your bid prepared upon the blank issued for that purpose?—A. It was.

Q. How did you get the blank if you prepared your bid before you came here, without any correspondence or communication with the War Department before you came here?—A. On the strength of the advertisement the blanks were written for. I did not understand that you meant that part of it when you spoke of correspondence. Of course I wrote to the proper authorities for blanks and specifications which they offered to furnish; that was all, except about the abbreviations. Reference to my copy-books will probably show if any other matters in connection with this were written about.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. To whom did you write?—A. To the Quartermaster-General, I think; I don't remember—wherever the advertisement directed persons to write. I wrote through the proper channel to get these papers, to the best of my recollection.

Q. When you came on with your bid, with whom did you deposit it?—A. With the other bids in the Quartermaster-General's Office.

Q. How long prior to the determination of who should have the contract did you deposit your bid?—A. I put my bid in about fifteen minutes before they commenced to open the bids. I deposited it personally with the samples.

Q. Was that the bid you had prepared in Keokuk before you came here?—A. Prepared, I think, as stated before, all except adding the cost for the marble. The cost of everything else I had down, or nearly so; but the cost of the marble I could not put in until I went to Vermont and got my samples and the lowest prices of the parties for said marble.

Q. At the time you left Keokuk, was it known that the lettering upon the stones might be made by the initials of the name of the deceased, or his rank by "Lt." or "Cp.," as it was put on, or was it at that time understood that they should be lettered in full?—A. In figuring up the matter, looking it over, and getting my cost, it occurred to me, according to the reading of the specification, "number of the grave, the rank and name of the soldier, the name of the State from which he came, to be on one face"—I say it occurred to me that, in bidding, I wanted to know, for instance, whether the abbreviation of Mass. would be received for Massachusetts; if it was William, whether it would be Wm. or written in full, and I wrote a letter, I think, to the Quartermaster-General, in July, 1873, asking for that information, as that would make a difference in my figuring; because in bidding I had learned that the letter of a contract is what a person bidding wants to look to. I think, in August, 1873, I received a printed circular or form, stating that the abbreviations would be allowed, and that made quite a difference in figuring. Others received the same information, for I was so informed by persons afterward.

Q. Did you have that information before you reached Washington?—A. O, yes; that information I received in August, 1873, I think.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. What date in August?—A. I cannot tell the date without referring to papers.

Q. You have not got it noted in your book?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. From what source did you receive that information about the abbreviations?—A. From the Quartermaster-General. I suppose I addressed my letter to General Meigs, I think, and received the answer from the same source, I presume.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. General Meigs sent you a printed circular at Keokuk that abbreviations in name and rank would be allowed?—A. Yes, sir. I think so. Or from his Department. I received it, as near as I can remember, in August, 1873, about thirty days after my letter.

Q. How long prior to the letting?—A. The bids were opened September 6, 1873.

Q. Did you say that was a printed notice?—A. That was a printed notice. I have a copy at home.

Q. Was that a change of the specifications that had been advertised?—A. It was not a change. They had not plainly stated. It left a person in doubt as to whether they would require it in full or whether the abbreviations would be allowed. It would make quite a difference in the work to be done, if done by hand. That was the reason why I inquired.

Q. Do you recollect your bid that you put in for the work?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Please give it.—A. Nine hundred thousand dollars. My bid was made in this way, and I had this blank, and I figured for every single cemetery in the country. I received information from nearly every source that I wrote to as regards freight. I wrote in every direction as regards freight, and did nothing else for about two months after the advertisement came out until I came on, and in that way I was enabled to bid on nearly every cemetery. There may have been some few exceptions where I did not get information, and in these instances, perhaps, I did not bid; but generally I bid on nearly every cemetery for slabs and blocks, prices for each, as near as I now remember. I have a copy of that at home; by reference, can advise you. I also bid for the whole, $900,000.

Q. Did you have more than one bid in?—A. I had this bid for each cemetery separately, and the one bid of $900,000. Considered it one and the same.

Q. What was the difference between the two bids?—A. I never footed the aggregate of the prices for all the cemeteries.

Q. Which bid did you get it on?—A. It was not awarded on either, entire. A letter was submitted to me, I don't remember the date, but some time after that, to know whether I would accept a certain number of stones, about 35,000, for the average price of my $900,000 bid, making $3.56 a stone.

Q. From whom was that letter?—A. Through the proper channel.

Q. Whom was it from?—A. It would be necessary for me to refer to papers to answer that properly. I suppose it was General Meigs, or from McGonnigle.

Q. Do you say it was from General Meigs?—A. I would not make that statement without referring to papers. It was through the proper channel.

Q. Did General Meigs decide that you were not entitled to that contract?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Have you that letter that you received asking you if you would take that much of the contract?—A. I have those papers at home. I can furnish them.

Q. Will you furnish those papers to the committee?—A. I will furnish everything that I have of that kind if you desire. There is nothing but what is straightforward that I know of. I am ready to furnish everything that I got and all the information that I have got. Three or four other parties received the same letter, so I was informed.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Was there any question about the validity of your bid?—A. None that I know of. There should be none. It was straightforward and complied with the terms of the advertisement in every respect. The bond that I gave was one that nobody would question.

Q. Was there any change at all in the specifications after the contract was let?—A. There were modifications. First I found, in commencing to execute the work, that the contract demanded two-inch letters for capitals and initials, and one-inch for the small letters, the stone being twelve inches above ground. It was impossible to get the whole inscription on the stone where the names were long. The contract required the number, name, rank, and State. I selected a long name, Corporal Lawrence O'Sullivan, which, with the number, rank, and the State, I could not get on the stone properly according to the specifications; it did not look well; there was not room for it all. I made drawings just the size of that part of stone above ground of this name, &c. I also made a drawing showing the capitals an inch and a quarter and the other letters one inch. Then I made a drawing with the letters of a uniform size, one inch, throughout, and I submitted to the Department whether the one-inch letter was not preferable, in better taste, and an improvement in the appearance of the work. It was decided that it did improve the work; that it did look better; and it was adopted. Reference to correspondence in Quartermaster's Office will state it as I wrote it, should this be incorrect.

Q. Without any reduction in the price?—A. Without any reduction in the price.

Q. It certainly was great diminution in the labor?—A. No, sir. The way that I proposed to do the work, and did do it, made very little, if any, difference. Before bidding, I had contemplated using the sand-blast, and on the strength of that I made my bid, and it would not matter to me what the size of the letters were; it would not take any longer to run the blast over that surface, whether large or small, and I think I stated that it was not done with a view of saving any money to me, but for the good of the work. I can show copies of those drawings and letters.

Q. Was there not a change in the depth of the letters?—A. It was necessary to make a modification in that respect to correspond with the reduction in size. A one-inch letter would not be required as deep; they had also provided that a letter should be one-fourth of an inch deep. The question was submitted that if the letter was cut as deep as called for in cases where the arms or bars came in figures or letters they would be easily broken. I went to different cemeteries, and, regardless of the size of the letter, I could not find a letter cut so deep as the contract called for. I submitted that, and it was decided that one-eighth of an inch was as deep as you find anywhere in any other cemetery; I submitted that matter, and when the reduction of the size of the letter was made, the depth was made to correspond, and very properly. The stone-cutters told me that if they were cut by hand it would take them no longer to cut a little deeper than to cut shallow, and with the blast it would make no difference. It would take a little longer, perhaps, to cut a little deeper; if it was any benefit to the work, the machinery in that case would have to run a little slower to cut deeper.

Q. Was there not some change in the specifications as to the color after the contract was let?—A. There was not a change made, but the matter came up in this way: In the large blocks from the quarry it is impossible to get all just exactly alike. I found that there might be, and there was, some question about what was expected in the contract, and what the wording of same required, or the meaning of the term nearly white. Thinking it best to know what would be received, what was meant by the reading of the contract, samples were submitted that I would have to go by to know exactly what would be received, and what would not come within the meaning of the contract. So, to avoid trouble after shipping the stones by having them rejected, those samples were submitted, and the samples that were selected I have lived up to.

Q. Have you been putting up this work?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you put up any work different from the specimens you furnished when you bid?—A. When the sample was decided upon?

Q. Yes.—A. No; I think I have complied with the samples all through; and I have finished 135,280 stones; that is, they are either completed and set in the ground as per contract, or in transit. There are yet remaining to be completed about 117,000.

Q. What length of time do you have to complete that contract?—A. The term of the contract expired, I think, in May, 1874. It has been renewed. The contractors did not, or I did not, receive the papers or contract for three, perhaps two, months after the proper time, and they were renewed for one year, I believe; I think the law did not allow them to be renewed for a longer time than that, but it was stated that the Government did not expect the work could be done within the time stated in the contract; I think a year was the time of extension, but I had always assurances that if the work progressed properly, proper time would be given.

Q. Who has been your inspector?—A. There have been several.

Q. Have you had any work rejected?—A. Yes, sir; some work has been rejected. We complete about 500 stones a day, and some would get finished that were not quite up to the specification, and in that case we would put in others.

Q. What is the specification as to the finish of the stone?—A. As marble head-stones are usually finished; we rub them with coarse sand and then fine sand.

Q. Have you had any accepted from the saw?—A. No, sir; we have never attempted to put one in from the saw. They have all been polished, or finished as contract contemplated. I would state, though, in that connection, that in executing the contract I have gotten stones that were not from the quarry where I have the machinery for finishing; in that case the work has been done by hand, and sometimes I have found when the stones arrived at the cemeteries that they needed finishing after they got there; but before the work would be accepted by the Department, it had all to be finished up in good shape.

Q. In a uniform way?—A. Yes, sir; and in cases where the work has not been finished properly—where it was not quite up to the standard, it has been called to my notice, when I have sent workmen and completed it.

Q. What were the terms and payment as the work progressed?—A. On the completion of each cemetery, it was to be paid for all but ten per cent.

Q. Have you completed any cemetery?—A. All the cemeteries west of the Mississippi are completed, except Jefferson Barracks, at Saint Louis, and many of those east of the Mississippi River, and east of the Alleghanies.

Q. Have any of your payments been anticipated?—A. When I purchased the contracts of Morgan and Jones, I found it required a very large amount of money to execute them. An arrangement was made, by application to the Department, to receive 60 per cent. of the amount due on the completion of large cemeteries when all the stone for the cemetery should be received within the grounds, consigned to the Government, freight paid; the 30 per cent. paid when the cemetery was completed.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you any partners in that business?—A. No, sir; I arranged with Sheldon & Slosson, of West Rutland, Vt., to furnish the marble and furnish the money, for which I pay them so much interest on the money and so much per stone, and take the work from the quarry and put it up.

Q. Had you any attorney in securing the contract?—A. No, sir.

Q. Any agent?—A. No, sir.

Q. Any one assisting you?—A. No, sir; it was my right to have it, as I was one of the lowest, and if I could give a bond I felt that I was entitled to it. There is no reason why I should not, according to the advertisement.

Q. This work is all inspected before it is accepted?—A. It is inspected at the quarry and also at the cemetery before they are set, and again after completed. Some engineer is also there to superintend the work during its progress, and it is also inspected before a certificate is given for the payment.

Q. What engineer has done your inspecting generally?—A. They have different engineers for different departments.

Q. Name them.—A. Capt. S. M. Robbins, Mr. G. D. Chenowith, William Gaw, Mr. Gall, whose first name I don't remember; Mr. Cox, whose initials I don't remember, and Mr. Clark. I think that is all the engineers there are.

Q. These are not Army officers, are they?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Where did Mr. Chenowith inspect for you?—A. He has inspected at Fort Leavenworth, Jefferson City, Keokuk, Rock Island, Camp Butler, Beverly, New Jersey, and the Soldiers' Home. The Soldiers' Home is not completed; the weather was so bad that it could not be completed, but will do so this spring.

Q. What engineer did the largest amount of inspecting for you?—A. Mr. Gall. Perhaps there is not very much difference between Gall and Robbins. They have done the principal part of the inspecting.

Q. Where were you when you received the letter asking you if you would accept a portion of the contract for which you had bid?—A. If I am not mistaken I was at Keokuk.

Q. How long was that after the bidding?—A. I should think within thirty days, as near as I can recollect; same date of the others, I learned.

Q. Were the bids opened before you left Washington, after they were put in?—A. After my bids were given to the Quartermaster-General, or the proper person, I never left the office until they were all opened.

Q. When they were opened at that time, whom did Quartermaster-General Meigs decide was entitled to the work?—A. There was no decision made at the time I left.

Q. Who appeared from the evidence as they were put in to be entitled to the contracts?—A. I left shortly after the bids were opened, knowing that a decision could not be made. I did not stay to exceed five minutes, and I heard no conversation in connection with it.

Q. Was there a New York firm of marble importers whose bid was less than yours?—A. No, sir; not that I know of. No, sir, there was not.

Q. Was there a New York firm of marble importers who were bidders?—A. There was a firm of the name of Walsh Brothers two bids above mine; one referred to Italian marble, just above mine, and the other still much above that.

Q. Did Walsh Brothers have a bid which was less than yours?—A. They did not, to the best of my knowledge. I took a memorandum at the time of all the bids.

Q. Did the Quartermaster-General decide that the Walsh Brothers were entitled to the work?—A. Not that I know of.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was yours the lowest bid?—A. I do not know just what all the bids were below mine without reference. There were two others for the same kind of marble below mine, as I understand.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Was there a gentleman named Patrick, from Tennessee, who put in a bid?—A. There was a bid of that name, I think.

Q. Do you know the amount of his bid?—A. I do, as per his own statement, which find attached. The price was above the awards, and his samples were not white marble. I exhibited a sample of Mr. Patrick's stone offered for this work, and he claims his lowest bid for all the work to have been $797,000.

The amount of bids as awarded, I think you will find correct and as follows:

Bridges's contract,	48,500 slabs, at $3.56	$172,160 00
Morgan's contract,	49,597 slabs, at $3.40	168,629 80
Jones's contract,	49,597 slabs, at $3.39	168,123 83
Sage's contract,	105,394 blocks, at $2.42	255,053 48

Number of stones,	253,078	Total.....	763,967 11

Showing Mr. Patrick's bid to have been higher than the contracts as awarded by $33,032.89.

The statements purported to have come from him in a Saint Louis paper, are greatly exaggerated in most cases. If he made these statements, I think I can prove very many of them false. I could answer these questions a great deal more correctly and distinctly if I had my papers. If it would be any benefit to you I can get all these documents and post myself most thoroughly. I will send home and get them and come before you again if it is not satisfactory to-day. I have the book in which I took down the bids, I am quite positive, though I have not seen it since about that time. His bid was not for white marble, though.

Q. Was there a bidder by the name of Jones?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where was he from?—A. From information since received he was from Washington. I was not acquainted with a single bidder at the time.

Q. Was there a change in the specifications as to the outlines of the tops of the stones?—A. It was required that they should be slightly curved convex, and they have been made that way.

Q. I think the specification required that they should be precisely square on the tops?—A. No, sir. The contracts read a little different from the specifications, I think, but they read "the part above ground to be polished neatly, and to have the top slightly curved." "Slightly curved convex" is the language of the contract.

Q. The length of the stones below ground depended somewhat upon the latitude?—A. It did. Those north of the latitude of Washington to be deeper in the ground. In the contract these are designated by a star, and in every case I have put them in according to the contract. In fact, I never could have done any other way, for the engineers have demanded and exacted a great deal more than they ought to have done under the circumstances. Not length, wholly, but other exactions.

Q. Payments were made through the Quartermaster's Department?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did you draw your money, from the Quartermaster, or by drafts upon the Treasurer?—A. Checks are sent, upon the Assistant Treasurer of New York.

Q. It is not paid from the Quartermaster's fund?—A. They send checks from the Quartermaster's Department as above stated.

Q. Are you certain that they are drawn on the Treasurer?—A. I see very few of the checks, because they are sent to West Rutland, Vt., my headquarters, and I am nearly all the time away. My book-keeper attends to my business there. They are sent from Colonel Rockwell's office, the cemeterial department; they always come from him.

Q. Had you any means of knowing the bids of the other parties before the bids were opened?—A. No, sir. I did not know the parties that bid. I arrived here at 12 o'clock at night; I had to go over my bids, adding the price of marble, and examining carefully my figures; I did not get the final price of marble until I arrived at Vermont. I left there at midnight, and arrived here next night at midnight, and sat up all night to get my papers completed; did not leave my hotel before 10 o'clock the day bids were opened.

Q. What was the form of your formal bid; was it an extended itemized statement, in accordance with the specifications, or just a round bid upon the whole thing?—A. Both, sir. Each cemetery, with few exceptions, was stated in the bid, and a round bid for the whole, twenty-six cemeteries in all, was awarded to me. The contract price $3.56, and the number of stones amounted to about 48,500.

Q. Did you submit a bid and offer to take the work for so many dollars?—A. My bid was $900,000 for the whole work. I put in a bid for each cemetery, or nearly so, separately; I either wrote in a separate letter, inclosed with other bid, or wrote it here on the bottom of this form, [showing form,] considering both one and the same, and in one inclosure.

Q. If it should turn out that you did put in a piece of paper stating that you would do the whole work for $900,000, what would you say?—A. It can turn out no such way, only as above, for I have stated correctly; I either wrote my proposition on a full sheet of foolscap to do all for $900,000, or on the bottom of the bid, as stated, my bond to cover either. Cemeteries being scattered all over the country, it was much more easy to reach some than others; and I put in a bid of this kind so that I should not get the worst ones at the lowest price. The most remote and difficult to reach were put at proper prices.

Q. If that bid was put on this piece of paper, making a sweeping bid for the whole, at what stage was it done?—A. It, the proposition, was filed in the same envelope with this, [showing one of the blank bids.] If it was on a written sheet, it was written properly or in form, (records of the Department will or ought to show;) but my impression is that I wrote it on this paper or blank form to put in the whole amount, according to the specifications for $900,000. I had added up the cost, and found that the whole amount would come to so many hundred thousand dollars; I added a proper profit to that, and it was very nearly $900,000.

Q. You say there was no question at the time as to whether your bid was made at an improper time, or too late?—A. There was never any question, that I know of. The first thing I ever knew of it, or remember of hearing of it, was a statement that I saw published, that Walsh Brothers made; it was a false statement certainly, as far as my knowledge extends, nearly all the way through. If there was any conversation of that kind I did not know it. There was none in my presence in the office. After the bids were opened, I knew that it could not be decided until the matters were examined, because there were so many bids, and I went down to the hotel. After that, somebody came down and said that my bid was the lowest, or among the lowest. I told them that I did not understand it so; I understood that others were lower. What their samples were I could not state. The first intimation that I recollect that my bid was put in too late was in the statement of Walsh Brothers, of New York. That is not the case. I was there fifteen minutes or more before the bids were opened, and when I have gone to any place to put in a bid personally, I never have put it in until a short time before they were to be opened.

Q. Is the stone you are furnishing all from one quarry?—A. Not quite all of it. About twelve months, perhaps, after the award was made, I had been negotiating, more or less, with the other parties to buy their contracts or to get their work; what I desired was their work, to combine with mine, in order to enable me to give an order for stone, to insure a low figure and arrange other matters, and to put up machinery that would justify me in doing the work. I finally bought them out. Morgan, of this city, received about one-third; Charles H. Jones received about one-third; and I received about one-third of the slabs. Mine was at $3.56; Morgan's, $3.40; and Jones's at $3.39. That was for the slabs. D. C. Sage, of Cromwell, Conn., bid $2.42 for the blocks—the whole of them.

Q. How came it to be that they were not all awarded, slabs and blocks, to the lowest bidder?—A. That was where we were unjustly dealt with; we felt the prices were so fearfully low any way. It was figured up that the Government could save $125,000 by giving Sage the blocks and giving us the slabs. I bid for the slabs and blocks together; and I thought I would write a letter, accepting only blocks and slabs for these cemeteries, at $3.56; but I was fearful that they might say, "You can go without," and therefore I accepted those offered, 35,000, all of them at $3.56. Here is my memorandum of the bids, in part, for white marble:

	Slabs.	Blocks.
C. S. Jones	$3 39	$3 39
Thomas P. Morgan	3 40	3 40
S. G. Bridges	3 56	3 56
Walsh Brothers, (Italian).....	3 65	3 65
James Parker	3 85	3 85
The Brandon Marble Company.....	3 89	3 89
W. J. F. Delta	4 25	4 25
D. V. Howell	4 65	2 90
D. C. Sage	5 00	2 42

Now, taking all the blocks at $2.42, and the slabs at the prices on that memorandum, they figured that the Government would save about $125,000.

The CHAIRMAN. According to this memorandum, Jones was the lowest bidder.

The WITNESS. Yes, for white marble he was the lowest bidder; but a letter was submitted to Mr. Jones, Mr. Morgan, myself, and the Brandon Marble Company, (I am so informed,) to know whether we would take one-fourth of the work each.

Q. Why wasn't the contract given to Jones, as he was the lowest bidder?—A. I was told—I do not now call to mind where the information came from—that the Secretary of War thought the contract was too much for one, and that he would not give it to any one person.

Q. Was there not one bid at that time which was more than one hundred thousand dollars less than your bid for the whole work?—A. No, sir; the difference between Mr. Jones's figures at $3.39 for all the stones, 253,078, and my bid at $3.56, is $43,023.26. The contracts were not so let; the blocks were awarded at $2.42, instead of $3.39, $3.40, and $3.56; the difference between Jones's price at $3.39, and my figures at $3.56, on 147,694 slabs, is $25,107.98.

Q. His bid for blocks was $3.39, and for slabs $3.39. Your bid for slabs was $3.56, and for blocks $3.56. What difference did that make in the bids?—A. Answered above, $43,023.26.

Q. For both slabs and blocks?—A. Yes, sir; answered above, if I mistake not.

Q. But suppose the work had been given just as the bids were made?—A. If we had taken the slabs and the blocks in the way the bids were made, the Government would not have saved this $125,000, but they were not so taken.

Q. But if you take the figures as they were made in those bids at the time for both the slabs and the blocks, would not the difference between your bid and Jones's have been greater than the amount you have stated, making the calculation for the whole work?—A. No, sir; answered above, if I mistake not.

Q. Did Jones get either the slabs or the blocks?—A. He got one-third of the slabs.

Q. Why did not he get them all?—A. I am not able to answer that question. I contended that whoever was the lowest bidder should have the whole contract. If my bid had been $3.39, I should have contended most earnestly that if I could bond satisfactorily, I would be entitled to have the whole. But there is a clause in the advertisement which provides that the work is to be let to some responsible person or persons, and I think it was held that that was inserted as a sort of reserve clause, on the ground that it would be, perhaps, too large a contract of this kind of work to let to any one man. I know I was told that the contract would not be let to any one man, because they did not think it could be executed within a reasonable time. At that time the Government expected that the work would be done by hand, I presume, and they knew, as I know now, for I have learned by experience, that it never could have been executed by hand within any reasonable time allowed; I do not think it could be done by hand within five years. We turn out about three hundred headstones and slabs a day, and two hundred blocks, making together five hundred a day, where one man, working by hand, could do about ten, and to raise the letters within a shield could not do over three per day, if he worked rapidly.

Q. Thomas Morgan seems to have bid $3.40 for the stones and $3.40 for the slabs, ten cents less on each than your bid. What portion of the contract, if any, did he get, and why did he not get it all?—A. He got one-third, also. There was the same reason why he did not get it all, as in the other case, I presume.

Q. What portion of the blocks did Jones get?—A. He did not get any.

Q. Who got the blocks?—A. D. C. Sage.

Q. Did he get all the blocks?—A. He got all the blocks.

Q. And you got one-third of the slabs, Morgan got one-third, and Jones one-third?—

A. Yes.

Q. At what price?—A. $3.56 was my price.

Q. What price did Morgan & Co. get?—A. $3.40.

Q. And Jones?—A. $3.39.

Q. Do you know any reason why that contract for the blocks was let in that way?—

A. Because Government would save about $125,000 by giving the blocks to Sage, is the only version I can give.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Do you know any reason why all three of these parties should not have done the work at the lowest bid? Could not you have done it at Jones's price?—A. I could have done it at Jones's price with the use of the blast, as the result has proven.

Q. But Jones had underbid you, and now, as you were not entitled to the contract under the terms of the letting, and yet were awarded a portion of it, I ask why you were not awarded it at Jones's price?—A. I do not know. If any person should get it all at that price I should suppose it would be Mr. Jones. I would not get it at his figures.

Q. You do not know the reason why you got it at higher figures than Jones?—A. No, I do not know anything about it, only as stated, and that is hearsay.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Did the advertisement state that the contract would be given to the lowest bidder?—A. I bid with that understanding—Government always reserving the right to reject any or all bids. Always in bidding on a contract that is the understanding.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are you doing any part of the work, except the one-third of the slabs, now?—A. I am doing all the work. I have arranged with the others to do the work at their figures. I take their place in the work, having a power of attorney to collect the money.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. So you are doing the entire work, notwithstanding the fact that the Government would not give it to any one individual?—A. Government could not prevent my arranging with other contractors to do this work. I could not do my own third for $3.56 and come out safe without the use of the blast; also, for the reason that in arranging my freights I found that when I could control the whole of the work I could make much better bargains; and so in arranging for doing the work, putting up machinery, the same principle applied. I could do it a great deal cheaper in proportion where I had a large amount than where I had a smaller amount. I had bought the sand-blast, and was paying for it at any rate, whether I got their work or not. I had bought the patent-right for the whole 253,000 stones. That is how I came to get the whole of the work to do, as far as the slabs are concerned.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Then the reasoning of the Department that one man could not do all the work was a mistake?—A. I do not think it was a mistake. I do not think any one person could have executed the whole contract by hand, within any reasonable time, for the prices paid.

Q. Are you not executing the whole of it?—A. I am, with the machinery that I happen to have—having the patent-right. If I had that patent-right, however, the Government or any other contractor would not have the benefit of it unless first arranging with me.

Q. You say you could not have done the one-third of the work at $3.56 at a profit?—A. I could not, from my experience thus far, without the blast.

Q. But you can do one-third at $3.56, one-third at $3.40, and one-third at $3.39 at a profit, can you?—A. I hope to. I make the money by having all, as before said, and on the blocks. I bought out Mr. Sage's contract for the blocks before I arranged with Morgan and Jones for their share of the slabs. There is more profit on the blocks because there is less lettering and work.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. There was some profit in the slabs, though, or else having bought out the contract for the blocks in advance you would not have had any inducement to buy out the contracts for the slabs?—A. I have explained that by having a larger amount of work to do I got lower freights, and the same principle applies to the machinery for doing the work—the same principle all the way through. I would not have been justified in putting up the machinery for one-third of the work, but I can do it unless misfortune overtakes me, for the whole, and not be the loser.

Q. All those arguments would have been potent in favor of letting the contract to one person originally, would they not?—A. If all could have been known that I have demonstrated by experience, I should say yes.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you take the contract understanding the rates of transportation paid by the Quartermaster's Department?—A. I did not; I do not know what the Government rate is.

Q. Did you meet a Mr. Wright about the time you were making your bid?—A. We stood side by side when the bids were being opened. He was a stranger to me at that time.

Q. Was he bidding?—A. I cannot say whether he bid or not. He stood there and said (afterward, I think) he had put in a bid. I don't know whether he had or not, but I presume he had, because he said so.

Q. Who was the person who divided up the work; the Quartermaster-General or the Secretary of War?—A. I do not know.

Q. You stated a short time ago that the Secretary of War said that one party could not perform the whole work?—A. I did not make that as a positive statement. I said that that was a current rumor, that I was told so; but who the authority for it was I could not state.

Q. How much will the entire contract which you now have under your hands amount to when complete?—A. Close figuring upon that will depend upon the number of stones required. At some of the cemeteries the number is increased beyond the numbers given in the specification; the specification gives approximate numbers. Taking number in specification will amount to $763,977.11.

Q. Taking the number that you have contracted and subcontracted for, which is to include all, what will the total be?—A. The contract reads that we were to furnish whatever number the Government requires, more or less; but I can figure it on any basis you desire, of course. The number is about 253,088; amount, $763,977.11.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. What bonus do you pay Jones for his contract?—A. I did not pay Mr. Jones personally anything.

Q. Have you not to pay him something?—A. My arrangement was made with Morgan. Nearly a year had expired, and Mr. Jones had not done any work and Mr. Morgan had put up only 1,288 in one cemetery, Brownsville, Tex., and there was no prospect of his going ahead.

Q. Did you get Jones's contract through Morgan?—A. Yes. My understanding of it from Morgan was that up to a certain time Mr. Jones had refused to conform to his contract or to do the work, or had made some statement to the Department—what, exactly, I cannot state, but Mr. Morgan had agreed to do it at Jones's price.

Q. So the Government took the contract from Jones?—A. They did not take it from him. I think he wished them to cancel his contract.

Q. What did you pay to Morgan in the way of bonus?—A. When I settled with him I gave him paper, contingent upon certain conditions, to the amount of $20,000; that is for his and Jones's work. At that time he controlled Jones's contract.

Q. Is that all that you are to pay in the final settlement for his interest?—A. Yes; I was ashamed to even say that I had conditionally given that much, or that I agreed to pay him that much.

Q. Then it turned out that there was a little profit in that work?—A. Excuse haste: I ought to state that afterward that matter was compromised. The paper was given to be paid on the completion of certain cemeteries, but it was afterward changed and made cash or its equivalent, and the amount was reduced to some $13,000, or about that, instead of $20,000.

Q. What did you pay Mr. Sage?—A. He was to have a portion of his pay on the completion of each cemetery, and the reserved 10 per cent.

Q. What do you think will be the aggregate bonus to Sage for his contract?—A. It will be a little rising of $40,000.

Q. Is it not your opinion now that the contract for the slabs alone was a pretty good thing?—A. I find I have miscalculated some, and there is no profit, so far as the work has gone, worth mentioning.

Q. Unless you have overpaid Morgan, the profit on the slabs alone would be $16,000.

or $17,000, according to what you allowed Morgan?—A. Yes; but the expense and incidentals are a great deal more than I anticipated, and the exactions of the Government have been a great deal more, also, than I anticipated.

Q. You have no partners in the work, you say?—A. No, sir; no one except as I have told you. My articles of agreement are that I pay so much interest on the money and so much for the stone; what is made over and above that is mine.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. At what time of the year did this letting take place?—A. In September, 1873. The contracts were dated, some December 15 and some December 31.

Q. Were you in this city several days before the letting?—A. No, sir; I arrived at midnight, as before stated, and the bids were opened at 11 o'clock following day.

Q. What hotel did you stop at?—A. The Ebbitt House.

Q. What time of the day were the bids opened?—A. Eleven o'clock.

Q. Where were they opened?—A. In the Quartermaster-General's Office, in the corner room.

Q. Did you have an interview with a man named Wright?

The WITNESS. Where?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. At your room at the Ebbitt House.

A. Yes, sir; after the letting was over. He came down after the bids were opened and made the remark to me that my bid was the lowest, or one of the lowest.

Q. What, if anything, occurred between you and him in relation to this bidding?—A. I remember nothing except that he was anxious to know how I figured up my bid. Says I, "If you will come to my room I will show you." He did come to my room, and I showed him. He then made the statement that he did not believe there was another man that bid that figured it in that way.

Q. Was your bid not handed into the Quartermaster-General after most of the bids had been opened?—A. No, sir; my bid was handed in fifteen minutes before the first bid was opened. My samples were deposited with the Quartermaster-General and my bids handed in fifteen minutes before they began opening them.

Q. Were you in that room at the opening of the bids?—A. I was; I did not leave the room till all the bids were opened.

Q. Do you say that you had no conversation with the Secretary of War about this letting at all?—A. I had no conversation that I call to mind. The Secretary of War did not know that I was going to bid, that I know of, until that day the bids were opened, and then everybody knew it. I do not think he did; he did not know it from me, any more than through the correspondence that I have spoken of—the preliminary correspondence.

Q. Did that correspondence occur with the Secretary of War?—A. No, sir; it was with the Quartermaster-General; I think, always to Quartermaster-General or his office.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 13, 1876.

SAMUEL G. BRIDGES recalled.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. I want to ask the shape of the head-stones that you made and delivered?—Answer. The slabs were 10 inches wide, 4 inches thick, and 3 feet long for cemeteries south of the latitude of Washington, and 3 feet 6 inches north of the latitude of Washington.

Q. What was the shape of the tops of them?—A. That has reference to the slabs. Do you wish the size of the blocks?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

A. The blocks were to be 6 inches square and 2 feet and a half long.

Q. Were the slabs round or square at the tops?—A. Slightly curved; convex.

Q. I want to ask, if in lettering the slabs any one proved incorrect, you turned the slab and put the rounded end down?—A. In some cases, for defects or breakage in transit, the slab has been turned, and was used with the same inscription cut on that other end.

Q. Where mistakes were made in the lettering on the slabs did you change any of the stones end for end?—A. The same answer as before; for defects or errors of any kind they were changed. It was necessary to do it, in order to comply with the contract.

Q. In putting the rounded ends of the stones in the ground, did you comply with the terms of the contract?—A. They were so slightly curved that it made no difference; but in some cases, if they were very much curved, they were coped square off. Generally, however, they were so slightly curved that they were used by reversing them; the greatest curve being one inch from a square surface, sometimes not more than a half inch.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Q. Were the slabs of the same thickness clear through, from end to end?—A. Yes, sir; all of uniform thickness.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Did the contract require that the end of the stones put in the ground should be square?—A. Just the wording of the contract in that respect I do not call to mind. I have not the paper with me that I had on Saturday; it was left at my room. They were to be substantially a square base, however.

Q. Do you state that you do not know, then, whether under the contract the end of the stone which was put in the ground should be square or not?—A. Yes, sir; it was to be square, or substantially so. The end was to be square, or nearly so. I have forgotten the exact wording of the contract.

Q. Would a stone, then, that had been prepared, lettered, and rounded in accordance with the contract, if turned and used, be a stone made in accordance with the contract?—A. Substantially so. In many cases, if the top of the stone was convex, the rounded part of the stone has been coped off to make the stone more square. Generally speaking, the top was so slightly curved and so nearly square that one would hardly notice the difference.

Q. Would a stone that had been rounded, lettered, and prepared under the contract, if turned, and the top made the base, be a stone in compliance with the terms of the contract?—A. I should so consider it, and have so considered it. The engineer requested them made square, as above described, in cases requiring it.

Q. Have the inspectors who inspected your work so considered them and passed them?—A. They have, as answered in my previous answer.

Q. Who are the inspectors who have done it?—A. All the inspectors that have been on the work, so far as I know. Those cases have been very few, however, at any place. Cases of that kind have not often occurred where they were required to be turned.

Q. Would not a stone so rounded, when turned and placed in the ground, be much more liable to fall over, than a stone that was made in accordance with the contract?—A. I think not. The contract did not provide that the base should be sawed, but the meaning of the contract was that it should be coped, and in the majority of cases where the stone was turned the base was as nearly square as the stones coped, generally, with the tool, and in my judgment would be just as serviceable and just as permanent in the ground as any other.

Q. Then are the tops of the stones as they have been put up as nearly square, generally, as the feet of the stones that are in the ground?—A. The contract reads "slightly curved;" the curve has been but slight. To explain that more fully, the slabs are sawed to size. The bases have been coped, leaving them nearly square—as nearly square as they can be left with the tool, generally. I could furnish the committee a sample, which would show what I mean better than I can explain by mere words.

Q. Are the stones that you have furnished square, or are they round at the top?—A. Not square, but slightly curved; convex. I have not erected one that was square on the top.

Q. What is the rule, as to the curve, which you observe in making them?—A. No rule, except slightly curved, convex. In some cases they have been more convex than in others, but none to exceed an inch curve, I think, from a square top.

Q. Are you not required to make them uniform in curvature?—A. The contract does not so state; it says slightly curved, convex.

Q. Do not the inspectors require them to be of uniform curvature?—A. I have never finished any one cemetery complete, except where the curvature has been nearly, if not quite, uniform throughout that cemetery.

Q. Did you have any interest in the sand-blast that you named in your testimony at the time you put in your bid for the contract?—A. I had not arranged for the use of it at that time. I had known of it, and contemplated its use in making my figures.

By Mr. TERRY :

Q. Did you not know upon what terms you could use it?—A. I did not, positively.

Q. Had you no negotiation with the owners of that principle?—A. I had not seen the principle, but had seen persons, and had conversations with persons who knew about the blast.

Q. Had you not pretty good assurance as to what the terms would be for its use?—A. Enough so to justify my figuring on a certain basis.

Q. What did you have to pay for the privilege of using the sand-blast?—A. Four cents a stone for the entire contract.

Q. You paid that as a royalty?—A. As a royalty.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL :

Q. How long before you had this interview with Mr. Wright, in your room at the Ebbitt House, was it when you received a communication from the late Secretary of War, that you exhibited to him there?—A. I did not exhibit any such communication there to him or any one else. I had none, except the letter from the Quartermaster-General which spoke of the abbreviations. May have shown that, but none from the Secretary of War. He, Wright, is mistaken if he says to the contrary.

Q. Did you not show him a letter from Mr. Belknap at that interview at your room?—

A. I do not call to mind what you or he have reference to. I had no letters from him, and none from anybody else, that I remember. I might have shown him the letter or printed form touching the abbreviations. That was from General Meigs or his office; I do not remember what the signature was. I have a copy of that at home. I had no correspondence to show this man Wright, that I know of.

Q. What, if anything, did you say to Wright about your knowing that you were going to receive that contract?—A. I had no conversation with Wright in connection with that. I did not know that I was going to have the contract; I did not know that my bid was the lowest. He made the remark to me when he came down to the hotel, if I remember right, that I was either the lowest bidder, or among the lowest bidders, though I did not know that. I had not looked at the memorandum in my book, and because there were so many bids under me that I did not so understand it. He said, "They are not for marble." I said, "If that is the case, I have not got the information all down." This is the conversation, as near as I remember it.

Q. Did not your first meeting with him occur at the foot of the stairs in the Quartermaster-General's Office?—A. No, sir; I never met the gentleman at all, or spoke to him, until when we stood side by side while the bids were being opened.

Q. You are quite positive about that, are you?—A. I never met him to know him, and never spoke to him. I never met him, to my knowledge, before I stood with him side by side in the room.

Q. The first conversation you had with him, then, was while the bids were being opened, and he happened to be standing by your side?—A. Yes. As we were standing side by side he annoyed me very much by asking about the figures as the bids were being opened.

Q. What Vermont firm is interested in furnishing these head-stones?—A. Sheldon & Slosson.

Q. How did they happen to become interested with you in the contract; what interest have they in that now?—A. My connection with Sheldon & Slosson came about in this way: their prices were the lowest for marble, and my samples were from them; promised if I should get the contract, to get marble from them; having received the award for a portion, carried out my agreement and contracted with them for my stone. After completing a portion of my contract with Mr. Williams, a former partner, an arrangement was made to purchase his, Williams's interest. When that was done, or about that time, I completed an arrangement with Sheldon & Slosson to furnish all the stone and necessary means to execute the contracts. Have answered before what interest they have now. Under this agreement the work is being executed. I wrote to them, with other marble-dealers, for samples of marble and prices of the same, with a view to bidding on this contract. On my way here from home to Washington to bid, I called on them at their quarries and got samples of marble, and prices of the same. They made the remark that they would give me prices that would enable me to bid low for the work, provided I would get the stone of them if the contract should be awarded to me. I replied I would, and took my samples and came to Washington to bid on the work.

Q. Have you seen Mr. Sheldon recently?—A. I have; he is in the city, or was; he has gone now.

Q. Have you seen him within a day or two?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him as to what your testimony was to be before this committee?—A. I did not, that I call to mind.

Q. What was said between you and him, if anything, about this investigation?—A. The conversation has been general with regard to the whole work.

Q. I am speaking about the investigation; I am not speaking about the work.—A. I do not remember any conversation in particular with regard to the investigation, except that he might be called before the committee.

Q. Did you see Mr. Sheldon yesterday?—A. I saw Mr. Sheldon yesterday.

Q. Do you pretend to tell me that you did not tell him anything about the testimony you have given here, or you might give by and by, in relation to it? Tell us all that occurred between you and Mr. Sheldon yesterday.—A. Nothing of importance touching investigation.

Q. Tell us what it was, and let us judge about the importance of it.—A. I not call to mind any conversation, in particular, touching the matter, that amounts to anything or is of importance.

Q. What was the occasion of your seeing him yesterday?—A. Mr. Sheldon came here with a view to a settlement with one of the parties whose contract I purchased. I came here for the same purpose, expecting to meet that man here. He has not been here. The conversation since I have been here has been generally in connection with the work at different points in North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, and not particularly on this matter of investigation.

Q. You avoid my question every time.—A. Not purposely, sir.

Q. I want to know what has been said, between you and Mr. Sheldon, about this investigation.—A. He has said that the evidence would show this contract all straight. I don't call to mind anything further in particular in regard to it.

Q. You started to say "he has said;" now, what has he said?—A. He has said if he was called upon to state before the committee in regard to the expenditures and the exactions required by the officials, that there would be no profit in the work, and that the amount of money required to carry it on was enormous.

Q. State what further occurred.—A. Said in conversation that the amount required to carry it on was too large, and expenses must be cut down or I would not make anything. The conversation has been so general about the work going on, and the investigation, and all other matters, that I cannot give all that has been said. There has been no direct line of conversation in connection with it. It has been with regard to other matters.

Q. It seems to me you have a very treacherous memory, when you are not able to remember this conversation, and can remember so many other things.—A. He thought his testimony would convince the committee that the expenditures were so large that, had I not made arrangements with them, it never would have been executed.

Q. State what further was said.—A. It is not my aim to keep anything back. It is my aim to tell what I know; but there is nothing to tell about it. That is all.

Q. Can you not refresh your memory a little about this letter which you had from the Secretary of War, which you exhibited to Mr. Wright at the opening of the bids? Can you tell where you received it?

The WITNESS. Do you mean a letter having reference to the abbreviations?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. No.

A. There is no other letter that I know anything about, or have any recollection of.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Have you seen the late Secretary of War since you came to town?—A. I have not.

Q. Have you had any conversation with him about this matter?—A. I have not.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Have you ever had any business transactions with Mr. Belknap?—A. Never.

Q. Were you ever interested with him in any business transactions?—A. No, sir.

Q. Are you related to or connected with him?—A. Not at all.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Are you clear in your recollection that there was no question about the validity of your bid at the time that the bids were opened?—A. Never, that I have heard. The first I ever heard was what I saw published in the papers by Walsh Brothers, of New York. I would not be likely to work two or three months to get up bids, spend thousands of dollars to get information, and come a thousand or fifteen hundred miles, and put them in the day after the fair; and I did not do it. My bids went in fifteen minutes before the opening, and I gave samples to General Meigs.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. You gave security for the performance of those contracts, did you not?—A. I did.

Q. Who were your sureties?—A. A. L. Connable and George Williams, both of Keokuk, Iowa, were bondsmen on my contract.

Q. What was the amount of the surety?—A. Thirty thousand dollars was the bond, I think.

Q. What was your pecuniary condition at the time you took this contract?—A. I made an arrangement with a party to furnish the money to carry on the contract, and the profits were to be divided. I was to execute the work, and he was to furnish the money.

Q. What was your condition as to pecuniary responsibility at that time?

The WITNESS. At the time the contract was awarded?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Yes.

A. Just about that time I had had trouble; but it was after the bids were opened. I was all right when the bids were opened.

Q. Who was this party who was your partner in the transaction?—A. George Williams, one of the bondsmen.

Q. Was he known to be interested with you in it at the time?—A. Yes, sir; when he signed the bonds it was known.

Q. Did his name appear as one of the bidders?—A. It did not. He did not know anything about it, and was not consulted when I bid. H. N. Bostwick and J. Renaud were my sureties on the bid.

Q. After the bid was awarded, you made the arrangement?—A. Before that it was arranged, provided I should succeed in getting the contract or award.

Q. How long after the opening of the bids until you were notified that your bid was accepted?—A. I cannot call to mind the date. I can tell by reference to papers and books at home.

Q. How long a time elapsed; can you not tell pretty nearly?—A. The contract was dated December 15; but I did not receive the papers, and did not know whether I ever would receive them, I think, until in the latter part of January or February following. That is my impression.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. You did not answer General MacDougall's question directly. He asked you your pecuniary circumstances. I will ask you now, were you worth anything at the time you put in that bid?—A. I considered that I was.

Q. How much?—A. I cannot state that exactly.

Q. Let us have an approximation to it.—A. I had a stock of goods, mining-stock, unincumbered real estate, bills receivable, &c. That is a question I cannot answer exactly. I do not know how much.

Q. Can you not come within a few thousand dollars of what you were worth?—A. I had property, &c., that represented and cost me about thirty-five to forty-five thousand dollars, perhaps.

Q. Had you paid for that property?—A. It was not wholly paid for; I was in debt more or less.

Q. What was the amount of your indebtedness at the time you had thirty-five or forty-five thousand dollars' worth of property?—A. I cannot state without reference to books and papers.

Q. Can you not come even within a few thousand dollars?—A. I could not without reference to books and papers.

Q. Were you worth $5,000, clear of all liabilities at that time?—A. I considered myself worth more.

Q. Were you worth $10,000, clear of all liabilities?—A. I could not state that I was not.

Q. You considered yourself, however, worth $5,000?—A. Yes, sir; I did.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Is Mr. Williams in any way related to the late Secretary of War?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was he connected with him in business?—A. Never to my knowledge, sir.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. You and General Belknap lived in the same town, did you not, before he was Secretary of War?—A. He originally came from there.

Q. How long had you and he been acquainted?—A. I became acquainted with him about the commencement of the war.

Q. Was he informed in general terms of your financial condition? Did he know it?—A. I do not think he did. I have no reason to think he did, until my trouble; he then sent an agent to investigate the matter. I was so informed. When he learned that Mr. Williams was my partner, and to furnish means, I think he became satisfied that the contract would be executed.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. General Williams, your partner, is very wealthy, is he not?—A. So considered.

Q. How many times has your contract been extended?—A. Once; all the contracts were extended at that time.

Q. When does the last limitation expire?—A. In June, if I remember right.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know of any presents of watches, money, or other article of value, of any kind, having been given at any time, by any one, to any inspector of stones?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know of any present of a watch, or any other article of value, having been given to Inspector Chenoweth at any time?—A. I do not.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Have you ever had any trouble with the inspection or acceptance of your stones in any way?—A. They have been rejected temporarily, but the work has been made good, as the inspectors required, before the certificates were given. In some cases the stones have been rejected at the quarry, and those have been thrown out and others put in their places.

Q. Because they were not up to specification, or what?—A. Not up to standard as to the quality of the stone—not coming up to the contract.

Q. Do you know anything about the quality of stone furnished by Mr. Doherty?—A. I do not. I saw some that were brought up here to Washington, on a car, for inspection. I was requested to go down and see them.

Q. They were rejected, were they?—A. I understood some of them were rejected. They were brought up here for inspection—some that were rejected and some that were not.

SAM. G. BRIDGES.

THURSDAY, March 16, 1876.

CHARLES S. JONES sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. Where is your residence?—Answer. I reside in this city.

Q. Please state what you know in reference to the letting of the contracts for supplying head-stones to the graves of soldiers in the different national cemeteries throughout the country, by whom the same was done, and all the facts you are in possession of in reference to it.—A. Before proceeding with my reply to your question, I would ask permission, being a stranger to the committee, to present the following letters of indorsement from parties in this city who have known me for many years, and whose letters may possibly give more weight to any statement I may make than under the circumstances it would otherwise possess. These letters were placed on file with my bid for the work on the day of their date :

“WASHINGTON, October 11, 1873.

“SIR: We are well acquainted with Mr. Charles S. Jones, of this city, and can confidently recommend him as reliable in every respect, and fully competent to carry out any obligation he may enter into with the Government.

“Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

“JNO. B. BLAKE.

“HON. SECRETARY WAR,
“Washington, D. C.”

Mr. Blake was then president of the National Metropolitan Bank of this city.

“WASHINGTON, October 11, 1873.

“DEAR SIR: I have known Charles S. Jones for the last twenty years, and have had the best opportunities for noting his business capacity and strict integrity. Any engagement he may enter into will be faithfully and promptly complied with. No citizen of Washington has a better record. He claims nothing but what his merits have earned for him.

“Respectfully,

“JNO. L. KIDWELL.”

“GEO. W. RIGGS.”

“Capt. and A. Q. M., U. S. A.

“A true copy.

“H. T. CROSBY,
“Chief Clerk.

“WAR DEPARTMENT, August 27, 1874.”

I will now proceed with my reply to your question.

On the 6th of September, 1873, I deposited with the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army a bid for the entire head-stone work in the national cemeteries, as advertised for by that officer in the public papers from the 27th of June preceding. The various bids for the work were opened by the Quartermaster-General, in his office, on the day first named, and although comparatively few in number and simple in detail, having reference to the published and printed advertisements, contracts under them were not finally awarded until the 17th of November following, a period of nearly two and a half months. The Washington Chronicle of September 9, 1873, published a schedule of the bids coming within the terms of the advertisement of June 27, 1873, which, though not critically accurate, will be found substantially so, as follows :

Number of slabs, 147,694. Number of blocks, 105,394.

	Slabs.	Blocks.	Total cost.
C. M. Howell			$999,998 00
D. C. Sage	$5 00	$2 42	994,146 54
Walsh Bros	3 93	3 93	994,146 54
D. V. Howell	4 65	2 90	983,079 39
Brandon Marble Company	3 89	3 89	973,861 35
J. Parker	3 85	3 85	970,154 75
J. W. Detta	4 25	3 25	960,000 00
Walsh Bros	3 65	3 65	923,271 15
Samuel G. Bridges			900,000 00
T. P. Morgan	3 40	3 40	860,033 40
Charles S. Jones	3 39	3 39	857,503 89
Knoxville Marble Company	3 50	2 65	796,154 75

The Chronicle, in publishing the schedule, stated that the awards had not then been made, but probably would be the next day. Such, however, was not the case. The bid of the Knoxville Marble Company was ruled out by the Secretary of War, because, as was stated, of an inferior quality of marble being offered by them, and then, as will be seen by the schedule, I became, in fact, the lowest bidder for the entire work.

Among the bidders were Samuel G. Bridges, of Keokuk, Iowa, and D. C. Sage, of Connecticut, both at high figures. After the proposals were opened by the Quartermaster-General they were not decided by him in the ordinary way, but were referred to the Secretary of War, as General Meigs informed me.

On the 27th of October, 1873, nearly two months after the opening of the bids, I received a communication from the Acting Quartermaster-General of the Army, (a copy of this letter is appended, marked "A,") desiring to know whether I would agree to furnish about one-fourth the total number of slabs required in the cemeteries at the same price each for which I had in my bid of September 6 offered to furnish both slabs and blocks for the entire work. Now, I had averaged both the slabs and blocks as to price, (as had most of the bidders,) knowing full well that while very little would be made at my price on the former, there was a considerable margin of profit on the latter.

Could I have anticipated any such division of my proposal it would have been stated at $4.39 for slabs and $2.39 for blocks; but supposing that, as in all such cases, the aggregate in dollars and cents would be the controlling element in a final award of the contract, I averaged the bid for the two descriptions of work as a mere matter of convenient calculation. Three days before the receipt of this letter from the Acting Quartermaster-General, namely, on the 25th of October, D. C. Sage, one of the bidders, who was then in the city, informed me that he was authorized to state that I would only be given a portion of the work, and if I did not accept what was offered I would not be allowed to have any of it.

Notwithstanding this, regarding the proposition contained in the letter just referred to as being grossly unjust and inequitable, as well as in violation of my legal rights as the then lowest bidder for the whole work, four days thereafter, viz, on the 31st of October, I addressed a letter to the Quartermaster-General's Office, (a copy of this letter is appended, marked "B,") in effect declining it. On Tuesday, November 4, 1873, about 11 a. m., I was standing on Seventeenth street, near the northwest corner of the War Department, awaiting a friend from the direction of Georgetown. Turning my eye in an opposite direction, I saw Mr. Sage and another person enter the War Department inclosure at the north gate, and upon reaching the main door under the portico they were met by Secretary Belknap, who received them very cordially, and the three walked together out of the inclosure to the avenue, and eastwardly until I lost sight of them.

About 1 o'clock p. m., same day, Mr. Sage, whom I did not at the moment see, hailed me as I was passing along the north side of F street, near Fifteenth street, opposite the Treasury Department. After the exchange of a few friendly salutations, he asked me how things were going on in regard to the head-stone contracts. I replied that it was impossible to tell, as everything in that line seemed very much mixed. "So I understand," said he, "since coming here this morning, and I hear that Secretary Belknap is very much embarrassed on the subject, hardly knowing what to do." He then proceeded to express his great regret that I had not accepted the offer contained in the letter of the Acting Quartermaster-General of October 27, evidently having a full knowledge of it before meeting me. He stated that if I did not ultimately accept it I would be altogether excluded from the work; but that if I would reconsider my determination, and accept the same, he would pay me as high as $15,000 in cash upon its being assigned to him, and the same amount to Mr. Morgan for his part. This I agreed to do, and on the same day addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, (a copy of this letter is appended, marked "C,") withdrawing my letter of October 31, preceding, and signifying my acceptance of the proposition of the Acting Quartermaster-General, dated October 27, 1873. I stated the conversation alluded to, within an hour after it occurred, to Mr. T. P. Morgan, of this city, who will verify what I say in respect to it.

On the 17th of November following, I received another communication from the Acting Quartermaster-General, allotting me one-third of the entire number of slabs required for the cemeteries; the increase from one-fourth to one-third arising from the fact that the Brandon (Vermont) Marble Company refused to take the one-fourth of the slabs offered to them at their original bid of $3.89 for both slabs and blocks, so that the entire number of slabs was finally divided between myself, T. P. Morgan, and S. G. Bridges; while the entire number of blocks, nearly half the work, and by far the most profitable part, was given by the Secretary of War to D. C. Sage.

I immediately entered into security for the performance of my part of the work in the sum of thirty-five thousand dollars, two of my personal friends here, George H. Plant and Thomas Lewis, going on my bond. Sage failed in his promise to me, and finding out, as I knew full well at the outset, that, in its diminished form, there was no real profit in it, or, rather, that the margin of profits was so small that it might by adverse rulings of the Secretary during the progress of the work result in loss, I transferred it to T. P. Morgan, the next highest bidder, who, as I before said, had been awarded one-third of the slabs at the same time with myself.

He struggled with the two-thirds for a while, but finding the whole action of the Department in connection with the contract averse to him, so that he could not get along at all, he finally made assignment of the two-thirds of the slabs held by him to Samuel G. Bridges, of Iowa, who thus became possessed of the contract for the entire number of slabs; D. C. Sage, as I have said, having secured the entire number of blocks.

Bridges and Sage, in combination with Sheldon & Slosson, capitalists and proprietors of marble quarries at Rutland, Vt., now perform the work, the material and capital, as I understand, being furnished by Sheldon & Slosson.

I submit a letter from D. C. Sage to me, dated Cromwell, Conn., November 21, 1873, together with a memorandum slip, written while he was here a few days before that date, serving to verify the contents of this statement.

I will now, with the permission of the committee, read the letters to which I have referred, in the order of their reference. The first is the letter of Captain McGonnigle, A. Q. M.:

Exhibit A.

“WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL’S OFFICE,
“Washington, October 27, 1873.

“SIR: You are respectfully requested to inform this office whether you will enter into contract, with satisfactory sureties, to furnish slabs, under your bid for head-stones, for the following cemeteries, viz:

“Captain and A. Q. M., U. S. A.

“Mr. C. S. JONES,
“Washington, D. C.”

Exhibit B.

“WASHINGTON, D. C., October 31, 1873.

“SIR: Yours of the 27th instant, in reference to slabs in certain national cemeteries therein named, is received, and I beg leave to reply as follows: I will enter into contract, with satisfactory securities, to furnish slabs for all the national cemeteries at the price stated in my bid of September 5, 1873, viz, three dollars and thirty-nine cents each. Should, however, consideration of public policy in the judgment of the Hon. Secretary of War require a more minute division of the work, then I agree to furnish the slabs for the cemeteries mentioned in your communication, with that at Vicksburgh added, provided I am also allowed to furnish the blocks for ‘unknown’ in the same cemeteries at the same price; a proposition so equitable, fair, and just, that it must commend itself to the favorable consideration of the Department. Or, I will furnish the slabs mentioned in your schedule at the rate of five dollars each, being the amount of the bid of Mr. D. C. Sage, of Connecticut, for the same work.

“In conclusion, and with great deference, I beg to suggest that I am the lowest and best bidder, all things considered, for white marble head-stones in all the national cemeteries, according to the spirit and intent of the law of Congress on the subject, believing as I do that my bid of September 5, 1873, combines in the greatest measure the elements of ‘durability, decency, and cheapness.’”

“I have the honor to be, with great respect, yours, &c.,

“C. S. JONES.

“Capt. A. J. MCGONNIGLE, U. S. A.,
“Quartermaster-General’s Office, War Department.”

Exhibit C.

"WASHINGTON, November 4, 1873.

"SIR: On the 31st ultimo I addressed an official communication to Capt. A. J. McGonnigle, U. S. A., Quartermaster-General's Office, in reply to one from that officer relative to slabs in various national cemeteries therein named, and which has doubtless been brought to your attention by this time. I now beg leave to withdraw the same, and hereby signify my acceptance of the proposition made by the officer alluded to, agreeing to supply all the cemeteries named by him with head-stones or slabs at the price stated, $3.39 each.

"Very respectfully, &c.,

"C. S. JONES.

"Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
"Secretary of War."

Before reading the letter referred to from Sage, of November 21, 1873, I will first read a slip I received from him on the 13th of November, while he was stopping at the Saint James Hotel, in this city. It is as follows:

"DEAR SIR: Colonel Mack called on me this evening, urging upon me the necessity of executing the contract at once, before Congress convenes. He said, on leaving, should any of the favored bidders fail to execute the same it would at once be offered to some other bidders. I think he intended this as confidential advice, but I offer it to you and Mr. Morgan, as I consider myself interested. I think I will start for home this eve to prepare for the expected contract. Please say nothing in regard to this matter. I think this is what Walsh is waiting for, so do not be behindhand. Give Mr. Morgan the hint.

"Yours,

"D. C. SAGE.

"CHARLES S. JONES, Esq."

"CROMWELL, CONN., November 21, 1873.

"DEAR SIR: Yours of the 16th and 19th is at hand. It was my intention as soon as the contract and bond arrived here, to execute the same and take them myself to Washington; I should then answer your letters in person. I do not at present like to write or talk about that matter. I know I shall be questioned when there. We cannot be too careful what we do. I hear from there often. Certain parties are there yet. The last clause in the award was placed there to please them. We have done well so far, yet the slightest mistake would spoil the whole; so let us guard against it in every way. I think we understand each other. You have said you would do so and so—I believe you will. I know I can depend upon it and am satisfied, so don't let us go so fast as to prejudice either of our chances in the Department. Do not place much dependence on what your friends say as to your getting the whole job, if you choose; I know better. I cannot explain by letter, but any more in that way would surely work against you, and be what others would like; they no doubt mean well, but are misinformed. You know by experience that information received through me has been reliable, so take my advice at this time and let well enough alone. Mr. Morgan and myself clearly understand each other in this matter; in fact, I cannot but think we all do, after the conversation we have had, so let us still have patience and confidence, and when the whole matter is completed, we will then be free to act in the matter as we best can for our mutual interest, which must be united under one head. Your letters are considered strictly private and confidential; I must ask the same in reference to my own, excepting Mr. Morgan. The contract and bond I am expecting every mail. I suppose you have yours ere this. Should you have anything of importance, please write me.

"Remember me to Mr. Morgan, and tell him you have heard from me.

Very truly, yours,

"D. C. SAGE.

"CHARLES S. JONES, Esq.,
"Washington."

To this letter was appended the following note:

"Without some change in the money-market it would be impossible for us to make the full payment at once. It will be necessary to make a division in two or more payments. Please consider this matter."

In addition now to the statement which I have already made, I would like to add that the subdivision of the head-stone work, as first indicated in the letter of the Acting Quartermaster-General to me, dated October 27, 1873, was in violation of my legal rights as the lowest bidder for the entire work, seems to be unquestionable. The division referred to as allowable in the law authorizing the work, was clearly intended to be made prior to the public advertisement for proposals under it, but not after the proposals had all been received and opened. No law ever contemplated a breach of equity on its face; and for an executive officer of the Government to possess himself of various bids for a great public work as a whole, and then apply the prices thus received to partial subdivisions of the same subsequently made according to his own personal predilections, is so utterly at variance with right and equity, as well as with every principle of law, that the proposition needs only to be stated to be unqualifiedly condemned.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Would there have been any difficulty in the way of your executing the entire contract, had it been awarded to you?—A. No, sir; because I should have been sustained by quarrymen, in the undertaking, with whom I had correspondence, and who would have protected my bids.

Q. Your bids were made with a view to securing the entire contract?—A. Yes, sir; but the work was divided into four parts among as many bidders—the slabs among three bidders, myself being one of the number; while the whole number of blocks, the really profitable part of the work, was given to another party.

Q. Could the work have been executed by one contractor as expeditiously as it has been done by subdividing it?—A. Yes, sir; an active, energetic man could have done it without difficulty.

Q. Did you have ample means to execute the contract?—A. No, sir; but I had character and credit.

Q. Could you have commanded ample means to perform the work?—A. The contract itself would have given any respectable man credit. The ease with which I procured the security required ($35,000) is some proof of that fact. I could have secured ample means had I obtained the contract. That very firm, Sheldon & Slosson, who furnish most of the material, and capital too, would have helped me had it been awarded to me, as my correspondence with them will prove.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The Department did not question your pecuniary ability to perform the work?—A. No, sir; the fact of having given me one-third of it would negative any such idea as that. That question was not raised at all.

Q. To whom did you assign your interest in the contract?—A. To Thomas P. Morgan, who was also a bidder, and to whom a portion of the work had been awarded.

Q. Did you get any consideration for your assignment?—A. Yes, sir. I disposed of it as I would have disposed of any other property in which I had an interest. It was as much my property as a house or lot for which I held a perfect title. I had given the requisite bond, and the award placed me in full possession of it; and when I found it proving unprofitable and undesirable, Mr. Morgan, who was my friend, proposed to take it off my hands, as I was going to throw it up in disgust. He proposed to give me one-fourth of the profits realized from it, and he paid me that.

Q. When you entered into the contract were you satisfied that, if the whole work had been awarded to you, you would have derived fair compensation from it?—A. Yes, sir. I would have made $176,000 on it, and have the figures to show it.

Q. Had you experience in contracting before that for such work?—A. I cannot say that I had. I had business experience, however; and had been paymaster in the Army for six years. The contract was open to any one who chose to take it. There was no restriction in favor of marblemen or anybody else. I happened to see it, and believing it would be profitable, determined to devote my attention to it.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. What did you realize on the transfer of your part of the contract to Mr. Morgan?—A. two thousand one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

Q. What did Morgan realize?—A. Thirteen thousand dollars. He received one-half of that; but my arrangement contemplated one-fourth only of this profit on my half of the work, ($6,500.) My portion was really only $1,625, but Mr. Morgan added $500 as a matter of courtesy and equity.

Q. To whom did Morgan dispose of the interest he had acquired?—A. To Mr. Bridges, but Sheldon & Slosson paid the money. Their notes, in fact, were payable to Morgan's order.

Q. To whom was the award for the blocks made?—A. They were all given to Sage.

Q. Have you any reason to believe that they were awarded to him simply because he was the lowest bidder for that particular part of the work?—A. I have not, sir.

Q. Do you know what relations existed between Sage and the Secretary of War?—A. Only so far as developed in my statement. He seemed to be a kind of agent or intermediary in these things.

Q. Do you know what Bridges gave Sage—what bonus?—A. I heard $20,000. I don't know that.

Q. Have you any reason to believe that the Secretary of War was interested at all in the subdivision or letting of this work?—A. No, sir; I don't think I have.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Do you know Samuel G. Bridges?—A. I have only known him since the commencement of this head-stone contract.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with him before the letting?—A. No, sir; I never saw him before the letting.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know to whom the quarry belongs from which the marble was taken to make these stones?—A. I understand to Sheldon & Slosson, of Rutland, Vt.

Q. Do you know who their partners are?—A. No, sir; I understand there are six or eight persons interested, but these two are before the public as the known men of the firm.

Q. Do you know anything about the inspection of the stones that were furnished?—A. Nothing, sir. Mr. Morgan had some difficulty with his. They rejected one cemetery entirely, either at Barrancas, Fla., or Chalmette, La.; but I understood that the same cemetery was passed after it was assigned to Bridges.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. How did you intend putting on the slabs the names, &c., of the soldiers—by hand-cutting, or by the use of the sand-blast?—A. I rather think I should have employed the sand-blast process of cutting.

Q. Did you know at the time of your bid that you would have been able to get the use of that invention?—A. I think there would have been no trouble about getting it. The owners of such inventions are generally willing to grant the right to use them for proper considerations.

Q. Were your calculations of profits based upon the idea of executing the work by hand or by the sand-blast process?—A. By hand, sir. There was, I think, originally some objection to sand-blast cutting, by reason of the fact that it is somewhat irregular in its operations—cutting deeper, for instance, in some places—and that the inscriptions would not be altogether legible in some cases. These objections, however, could probably be overcome by care.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. You considered your assignment of the work as unreasonably selected, being very much scattered over the country?—A. Yes, sir; and very disadvantageously selected.

Q. Would that leave the other cemeteries, to be assigned to the other bidders, equally scattered?—A. I think it would, sir. They seemed to be selected pell-mell, as it were, not grouped together, as they might have been.

Q. Do you know if there was any question as to the regularity and acceptability of Bridges's bid?—A. Nothing, sir, except that it was in round numbers. I entered the sums in my bids for each item of the work separately. There was a note at the bottom of the specifications requesting the bidder to strike off from them those places they did not intend to bid for; and knowing the particularity in the Quartermaster-General's Office about such matters, I was careful to put mine in proper form as to detail.

Q. Could that work have been executed within the twelve months originally allowed by the law?—A. It would have been utterly impossible, sir.

Q. The extension, then, was not an unreasonable thing?—A. No, sir; it was necessary.

Q. Are you able to state whether there were any modifications made in the specifications after the work was assigned to Mr. Bridges?—A. Yes, sir; there were several important modifications made after the work was divided. I received notice of two myself, which I have here with me; and after that there were several. There was one very considerable modification in regard to the mode of paying for the work. In fact, I hesitated a great while myself before bidding, as such a large amount of capital was required to carry on the work before any payments could be received on account of it. By the original specifications, it was provided that all the work in a cemetery must be completed before any money could be drawn on it. The modification provided for allowing the contractor to draw 60 per cent. when he had delivered $5,000 worth of material in the cemetery. That was a very material element in favor of the contractor.

Q. Did the modifications made after the contracts were awarded diminish the cost of the work?—A. Yes, sir; all the modifications had that tendency.

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1876.

SAMUEL G. BRIDGES recalled.

By Mr. TERRY :

Question. Will you state again at what time your bid for these head and foot stones was handed in ? How long was it before the bids were opened ?—Answer. About fifteen minutes. Of course, I could not state the exact time to a minute and a half ; but it was as near fifteen minutes before the bids were opened as I could possibly judge. When I say it was fifteen minutes, of course I did not time it to a half minute.

Q. Was there any announcement at any time that bids must be handed in within a given time ?

The WITNESS. By the person in charge, do you mean ?

Mr. TERRY. Anybody ; was there any announcement that the bids must be handed in by a given time ?—A. There was an hour stated in the advertisement. Eleven o'clock was the hour stated, I think.

Q. Was there any announcement different from that ?—A. Never, to my knowledge or recollection.

Q. Did you hand in your bid before or after 11 o'clock ?—A. As near as I can state, it was about fifteen minutes before 11 o'clock. I never left the room after I deposited my bid until the bids were all opened.

Q. Was your bid handed in in person, or by some other person ?—A. In person.

Q. To whom did you hand it ?—A. I was not acquainted with any officer there, and could not give his name ; but I handed it to a person at the desk or table who seemed to be in charge, and who stated that he was the proper person.

Q. Were any of the bids handed in after yours were handed in ?—A. None that I remember, except a dispatch, I think, came from somebody out West or Southwest, whose name I do not remember. I paid no particular attention to it. The dispatch referred, if I remember right, to somebody's bid, and the person opening bids, whoever it was, stated that that dispatch would go in with the bids, and be considered for what it was worth, or something of the kind. As I stated before, when I came up stairs and went in, I deposited my samples with General Meigs in person, and he told me to lay them on a shelf directly behind him, where some of the samples were deposited. I went in the next room, and after a few moments I deposited my bids, and staid there until the bids were all opened.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Q. Were the samples of all the bidders marked with their names, so as to distinguish the bids ?—A. I could not state ; mine were marked. My name was on the corner on a little label, I think. I had two or three samples marked respectively 1, 2, and 3, I think, referring to the quality of the marble.

Q. There were blanks, I believe, partly in print and the balance to be filled up by the bidders ; did you see such blanks ?—A. I did.

Q. And was that the form of your bid ?—A. That was the form of my bid.

Q. You put in no other ?—A. No other except a written letter, which I wrote, either on that paper or on a proper sheet of paper, that I would do all the work for $990,000.

Q. When did you put that in ?—A. That was put in in the same envelope with the other bid. They were put in the same inclosure at the same time. I am not positive whether there was a space at the bottom of the bid, and I wrote the other proposition on the bottom of the bid, or whether I put in a different sheet. If I had reference to my papers at home, I could tell.

By Mr. STRAIT :

Q. Do you recollect what kind of an envelope contained your bid ?—A. I do not recollect the color ; I paid but little attention to anything of that kind, and could not state.

Q. It was simply sealed up ; it was not put up with wax at all ?—A. It was just simply sealed ; I never did seal my bids with wax.

Q. You say you handed in the samples at that time, or before ?—A. I handed them in to General Meigs, and he told me to place them on a shelf directly behind him, and I deposited all my samples as directed.

Q. Do you recollect whether the samples generally were handed in with most of the bids ?—A. I saw no other sample brought in while I was there.

Q. You do not recollect whether there were other samples or not ?—A. Yes, sir ; there were plenty of samples, but I saw none brought there while I was there.

By Mr. TERRY :

Q. I observe among the specifications in the contract is the following :

"The portion below the ground to be rough-dressed, and at least one-half inch wider and thicker than the part above ground. The bottom to be straight, and of uniform thickness, and the corners square."

Were those the specifications under which you contracted ?

A. My bid was based upon the notes at the bottom of the specifications :

"These slabs may be of uniform width and thickness throughout, (viz, ten inches wide and four inches thick,) at the option of the bidder."

It is at the option of the bidder whether they should be larger below ground, or uniform size.

Q. Did you understand that, instead of having it one-half inch wider and thicker below the ground, you had the privilege of having it uniform clear through?—A. I did. By referring to the notes at the bottom of the page, I contemplated sawing them to size, the same width and thickness through.

Q. Did you execute the work in that way?—A. All the work has been executed in that manner.

Q. Was that foot-note to the specifications at the time you contracted?—A. It was; that is the printed form.

Q. Did not that make a very material difference in the cost of the work?—A. It certainly did; if they had to be a half-inch larger at the base than at the top they would have to be cut by hand, probably, instead of being sawed to size.

Q. What could have been the object of specifying that the slabs should be four inches thick, and ten inches wide, and then a half-inch thicker and wider below the ground, and then permit the contract to be executed differently?—A. The notes referred to on the bottom of the page were there when the specifications were received.

Q. What was the object of that change?—A. If they were granite, granite is blasted instead of being sawed out. It is too expensive to saw it out, and the slabs are blasted as near the proper thickness as they can be, and then necessarily have to be cut by hand to the proper depth; that is why that note is placed there, I presume. The marble, as everybody knows, is sawed to size. I would state that, in my judgment, one has reference to granite, and the other to marble.

Q. What would be the difference in cost of these head and foot stones, agreeably to the specification four inches thick and ten inches wide above ground, with a half-inch added below—what would be the difference between that cost and the cost of stones of uniform thickness and width?—A. Without consultation with granite stone-cutters I would not be able to answer that question.

Q. You can give us some approximation, can you not—say so many cents to the slab?

The WITNESS. Do you have reference to marble?

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. They all had to be that way, did they not?—A. The specification reading as it does, I am quite positive that when they say "white-marble or gray-granite slab," they know that granite is blasted, and they know marble is sawed to size.

Q. That would supersede the necessity of having the stone made in this form to go in the ground?—A. I judge probably the difference in expense would be in the vicinity of 50 cents a stone.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. At least 50 cents a stone?—A. I should think so.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Would it not be more?—A. It might be. I said I could not state without consultation with quarrymen and cutters what it would be. It would be necessary to get their views about it.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. According to the terms of your contract, was it in the power of the Government—was that the interpretation given it—to require you to make these marble slabs a half-inch thicker and broader below the ground?—A. The Government could not according to the specifications. The notes plainly say, "at the option of the bidder."

Q. Is the copy you produced here an original specification?—A. That is one of the originals.

Q. Upon which you contracted?—A. Upon which I contracted, and upon which I bid, and which all contractors had, I suppose; I received three or four copies at the time.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. You bid upon the same basis?—A. Yes, sir; upon that basis.

Q. You said that you might leave it a half-inch thicker and broader, because it was taken out of granite. I would like to have you explain that.—A. We blast granite out as near the size as possible, and then it is dressed down by hand to the size required; but the marble is sawed to size.

Q. You would have the privilege of leaving it a half-inch thicker, if you chose?—A. I would have had the privilege to leave the marble a half-inch thicker, if I had pleased.

Q. You had the right to make them of uniform size, under the specifications?—A. Yes, sir; under the specifications.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was your bid on a piece of writing-paper, or was it on paper prepared by the Department for bids?—A. My bid for the cemeteries, separately, was on one of the blanks furnished by the Department. As I have stated before in my testimony, the one for $900,000 was made on a sheet of foolscap paper, to furnish all the work for $900,000; or I wrote it on the bottom of the bid, there being plenty of room at the bottom. I am not positive which course I took; it was either the one or the other; but if I wrote it on a separate sheet of paper, it was inclosed in the same envelope at the same time, and, I think, attached.

Q. Had any of the bids been opened when you handed yours in?—A. No, sir.

Q. To whom was your bid handed?—A. Not being acquainted with any of the gentlemen, I could not state the person's name to whom I handed it. He was at his desk, and took my bid and laid it with the others.

Q. Who superintended the opening of the bids?—A. I could not state, because I was not acquainted with any of the officers.

Q. Are you acquainted with Captain McGonnigle?—A. I made his acquaintance after I received the award; I was not acquainted at the time I bid.

Q. Since you have made his acquaintance, do you know that he was the one who opened the bids?—A. I could not state.

Q. Was there any objection made by any party, while the bids were going on, to the receipt of a bid after the bidding had commenced?—A. As I stated before, this afternoon, my recollection is that a telegram came to General Meigs, or the proper officer, and was opened and read. Somebody objected to it. The remark was made that it would be put with the bids and considered for what it was worth, or some such remark as that.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. To whose biddid that refer?—A. I do not remember; to some person in the Southwest, I think.

Q. It had no reference to your bid?—A. Not at all.

Q. Was General Meigs in the room when the opening of the bids began?—A. My impression is that he was.

Q. And a short time after he turned it over to somebody else, and the opening of the bids went on?—A. That is my impression, but am not positive.

Q. You knew General Meigs personally, did you not?—A. I did not when I handed my samples. I said I handed them to General Meigs; at that time I did not know him, but I have since learned that it was him. He sat at his table, but I did not know him at the time.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is it not a fact that General Meigs was not in the room when the opening of the bids began; that Captain McGonnigle was there; and that upon a protest being made by the Walsh Brothers, General Meigs came in and took charge of the opening of the bids?—A. I have no recollection of anything of that kind. I think if anything unusual or unpleasant had occurred I would have remembered it. I am quite positive I could not have forgotten such an occurrence.

Q. Were your specimens of marble presented before your bid was put in?—A. They were.

Q. How long previous?—A. Not far from five minutes, perhaps. After depositing my samples I went in where the bids were to be deposited, and staid there probably five minutes or less before I deposited my bid, but cannot state positive to a minute.

Q. What marble was that?—A. It was from the quarry where I am now getting nearly all my stone.

Q. How many specimens of marble did you present?—A. Two or three small samples. I know it was as many as two, but I would not state positively that it was three.

Q. Have you had any intercourse with any officer of the Government who had charge of these matters, since you have been here giving your testimony?—A. I have had occasion to go in the Department on my regular business. I have been watching this work in Tennessee, and I wanted to know when the work at Mound City would be done, and to know when it was necessary for me to be at Chattanooga to meet the engineer. I have been in two or three times to know that, and to see how the work was progressing, from their knowledge of it.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. I see by this blank bid that you are required to give guarantees. Did you furnish the guarantees required at the time you put in the bid?—A. I did. There were two gentlemen on my bond.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. There were places in the blank form for the bondsmen to sign, and they were filled up?—A. Yes, sir; that was properly filled up and executed.

Q. Did you, in the printed blanks that you filled up, include all the cemeteries that were mentioned in the schedule?

The WITNESS. In my formal bid for $900,000?

Mr. GLOVER. You state that the Quartermaster-General sent out a printed blank in which there was room left to describe the marble you were to furnish, and a place for the bondsmen, the terms, &c.

The WITNESS. I put in one of those printed blanks.

Mr. GLOVER. In that formal bid did you bid for all the national cemeteries that were to be furnished with head-stones?—A. With very few exceptions. Reference to my papers will show. There were, perhaps, thirteen or fourteen exceptions, that I did not happen to get positive information about in regard to the freight, &c., and on those I did not bid.

Q. When and where did you complete that formal bid?—A. It was nearly completed, I think, at home, before I left. I could not put in the prices for marble, because I did not have the figures until I went by Vermont. I did not put in the figures in the bid, but I filled in the figures after I had seen the marble-men in Vermont. I completed it here at the Ebbitt House. I arrived between 11 and 12 o'clock at night, and the bids were to be opened the next day at 11 o'clock.

Q. You have stated that you did not bid on all, because you were not posted as to transportation, &c. What was said or done that caused you to make a round bid on another piece of paper at $900,000 for the whole work?—A. For the reason that I footed up the cost of those that I had positive information about, and I approximated the others as nearly as I thought was right, and arrived at their cost, and thus found out what all the work would cost me; and on that basis I bid for the whole work.

Q. Could you not have perfected your formal printed bid without introducing a separate paper?—A. Not very well, because there were no two cemeteries at which I could have delivered the stones at the same price. There would be hardly two cemeteries where the freight would be the same.

Q. What induced you to put in this bid different from the one you had put in?—A. On a large amount of work like that, I knew very well I could do all the work for a less price than I could a portion of it, having all the facts before me. There was a blank to bid on, and I filled in those figures, and I knew I could do the work for $900,000 if I could get it.

Q. That being the case, could you not have gone on and filled up the bid without information on those few cemeteries of which you say you did not have knowledge as to the cost of transportation?—A. I could have done so. I think I did leave out Fayetteville, Ark., but I am not positive about the cemeteries that I left out. I did not refer to it before I came here. I have copies of my bids at home, and could tell all about it if I had the papers. As I stated before, I could go home and get those papers; I do not know that I could send very well. But the reason is obvious why I would bid for a total amount for the whole—if I had all the work I could make better rates of freight.

Q. The trouble I see is that you did not do that in your formal bidding?—A. There was no place for such a bid as that on the formal bid.

Q. Then why did you not omit the formal bid and put in the other, and say, "I will do all the cemeteries for $900,000?"—A. In bidding it is difficult to tell which is going to be received. A few cemeteries might be awarded to me on the blank, and if I did not bid on the proper form they might throw my bid out for that cause. It takes a very little technicality to cause them to throw out a bid, if they see fit. I have bid several times, and understand that. I think I received a contract at Leavenworth on the same basis. I bid for every post to deliver grain, and bid to deliver the whole for so much money, and I got it. It is a customary thing for some to bid on the easiest posts, and let the others go. In that case the Government has to pay an exorbitant rate for the most remote posts, because some persons bid very high on those, thinking that others do not want them. I have known that to be the case.

Q. Did you hear any reason assigned by Mr. Belknap why the Walsh Brothers did not receive that contract, their bid being lower than any other?—A. I did not understand that their bid was lower than mine; there were three bids under them for white marble.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. If you had filled out your bid and included the balance of the cemeteries, might not your bids, at the rates you probably put them at, have overrun the $900,000?—A. Yes, sir; if I had done that I should not have made the figures in that way.

Ibid on each single cemetery that I thought best, and if I had been awarded one contract or one cemetery out of the seventy-three, I could have delivered the stone and not lost money. But if I bid a low price on all the cemeteries, calculating that the average would favor me, I would have been a loser.

Q. You think you left out thirteen or fourteen cemeteries?—A. That is my impression.

Q. If you had included those and put on the price, you would naturally have made your bid overrun the $900,000?—A. I am satisfied it would.

Q. So that you think your round bid of $900,000 was to the advantage of the Government?—A. Yes, sir; I have bid on different contracts in just that way, and have received contracts in that way because others have not so bid. They did not do it, at all events. It was certainly to the advantage of the Government.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. I ask you what, if anything, you heard as to the reason why Walsh Brothers did not receive the contract?—A. I heard that they were working very strongly for the contract, but it was rejected, or not considered as between my figures and those of the Brandon Marble Company, on account of its being for Italian marble, and they did not propose to put Italian marble over American soldiers.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Was there anything said in the specifications or the advertisement about requiring United States marble?—A. I did not see anything, but the law plainly gives domestic production the preference.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Let me ask you what you were paying per day for your best skilled workmen, stone-dressers, &c.?—A. My best skilled stone-cutters I pay $4 a day at the cemeteries. There is no necessity for them at the quarries; the work is done there by machinery. I find it necessary to employ the best workmen, as it is the cheapest in the end. In some instances I have paid more than that in the extreme South. They get up combinations when they find I am compelled to have certain work done.

Q. How much more have you paid?—A. In some instances $5.50 for, perhaps, two or three days' labor.

Q. What would it cost you per ton to furnish your material from the quarry to Cypress Hills cemetery?—A. The quarry is at West Rutland, and from there to New York the transportation is about $3 per ton.

Q. Where is the next nearest cemetery to your quarry?—A. Beverly, N. J., I think, is the next nearest.

Q. What does it cost to Beverly?—A. One of my agents superintended that work; I do not remember just what the freight is from New York to the cemetery.

Q. What is the cost of transportation per ton from the quarry to Fort Gibson, Indian Territory, one of your most remote cemeteries?—A. I think the freight is about $13.35 per ton; that is my recollection.

Q. Is that water or railroad transportation?—A. Water to Saint Louis, and rail from there to Fort Gibson station. Fayetteville, Ark., is the most difficult of access. There is a seventy-five miles haul over the Boston Mountain from the terminus of the railroad at Ozark, or from Fort Smith, on the Arkansas River. I know pretty nearly how much that western work has cost, as it is nearly all done.

Q. Can you say what the transportation is now from the quarry to New Orleans?—A. Five dollars and eighty-five cents, or in that vicinity, per ton.

Q. That is by water?—A. By rail to Troy, and thence by water.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Were there any other round bids put in besides yours and the Walsh Brothers'?—A. I think there were quite a number of round bids. My memorandum-book is at home, and I cannot state positively, but that is my recollection.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Did the Walsh Brothers put in a round bid?—A. That is my impression, but I would not say so positively.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Were there any other round bids lower than Walsh Brothers', besides yours?—A. I cannot state to you how Jones's and Morgan's figures did read; but the result proved that Jones and Morgan were both lower than myself for this Vermont white marble.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Does that include the customs dues?—A. No customs dues are required on Vermont marble. I do not think it would be right to consider that, unless every one would have the benefit of it; that is a dodge that not every one would think of but dealers in foreign marble. Walsh Brothers are not dealers in Italian marble, but are stevedores only.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. I will ask you whether there was any particular change, when you came to enter into the contract, from the bids—whether any alterations were made particularly. Did you enter into the contract substantially as you bid?—A. I entered into the contract substantially as the bid was made. All the modifications that were made were for the benefit of the work.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. You say everything that was done was for the benefit of the work; do you not think that sloping the part that goes in the ground is an improvement of the work?—

A. I do not think it is any improvement to the work; the law did not require it, and the specifications did not require it. As I stated before, the stone being larger under ground, has reference to a granite slab; if the bidder wanted to bid on that instead of a marble slab he had the opportunity. There were bids put in for granite slabs and blocks, as well as marble blocks and slabs.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1876.

MAURICE J. WALSH sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your residence and occupation.—Answer. I reside in New York City. I was one of the firm of Walsh Bros. up to November 11, 1875. Our firm was engaged in the storage business, loading and unloading ships, and as general contractors. I am now doing the business on my own account; any claim Walsh Bros. may have in the head-stone contract they assign to me.

Q. Were you one of the bidders for the contract to supply soldiers' graves with head-stones?—A. I was.

Q. Can you state the amount of your bid?—A. Our bid for the first quality of marble in the world was, for the entire contract, $994,146.54; for the second best quality of marble in the world, $960,000; and for the third quality of best marble in the world, $923,271.15. Out of this about $200,000 was to come back to the Government in the shape of duty on the marble, because we were to supply Italian marble. There were about eighty bids sent in, and eight out of the eighty were entertained, and sent by General Meigs to the Secretary of War. My three were among the eight, but mine were disregarded, and the contract was given to the other five.

Q. Where were the lettings conducted?—A. The bids were opened in the Quartermaster-General's Office, and those of the bids that were entertained were sent to the Secretary of War. The Quartermaster-General recommended my specimens of marble as being the best inside of the appropriation, and I was given to understand that he sent a letter to the Secretary of War to that effect. The Secretary of War told me that General Meigs recommended my stone as being the best. Some time afterward I went to see General Belknap, and asked him how it was that I did not get the contract, and whether he found any fault with my ability to perform it, or my security. He said no. I told him that if he did, I would furnish him with real-estate security to the full amount of the contract. He said that that was not the trouble, but that the President had told him that he should not have foreign stone over the heads of American soldiers. I asked the Secretary whether the act of Congress barred foreign stones, and he said he did not care anything about the act of Congress; he would hold himself responsible.

Q. What was the manner of the letting, and how were the bids made?—A. I had three separate and distinct bids for the three qualities of marble, and I put sealing-wax on the envelopes so that they would hold, and sealed them up so that the bids could not be tampered with. I sat right alongside of General Meigs when he was opening the bids. All the bids were to be in at 11 o'clock, and at 11.13 General Meigs left the room. Then this bid of Samuel J. Bridges was dropped into the basket. They pulled my three bids out, although there were eighty bids in all in the basket, and read my three bids one after the other.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Who did this?—A. Captain McGonnigle. I objected to it at the time, and went in and informed General Meigs of it, and he could not believe it.

Q. Who brought in Bridges's bid?—A. I cannot say.

Q. How do you know it was his bid?—A. Because I watched it.

Q. Was there anything on the outside of it to indicate whose bid it was?—A. Yes; it was in a blue envelope.

Q. Was that the only blue envelope that there was in the basket?—A. It was the only envelope of that color that I saw. I watched very closely.

Q. How many bids had been opened before this bid was handed in?—A. Only my three, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Were your three opened before this one was handed in?—A. It was not handed in; it was dropped into the basket.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Go on with the letting part of the business after the point where you objected to General Meigs.—A. When I saw this bid dropped into the basket, I went out to see General Meigs and told him of it, and he would not believe it. The bid was read before I went out, and that is what made me go out. I got very mad at the time, and went right out and accused Captain McGonnigle of it. Then Meigs came into the room and opened all the rest of the bids himself.

Q. Go on and tell anything else that occurred at that letting.—A. I believe I have stated, about as it occurred, the whole of the letting. It seemed to me that all the bidders were afraid of my samples, because my samples beat all the rest.

Q. Did you examine the samples which were there before the biddings were opened?—A. Yes.

Q. Had Mr. Bridges any sample there?—A. No, sir; I could not find any.

Q. What was the shape of the paper on which your bid was written?—A. It was on a printed form, as required by the law.

Q. What was the shape of Mr. Bridges's bid?—A. So far as I recollect, it was a sheet of foolscap paper.

Q. Was it on a printed form?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Belknap after the letting?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State what it was.—A. I went to see Mr. Belknap to inquire why I did not get the contract, as my bid was about $200,000 lower than any other, as I offered to furnish the best stone in the world. I asked him why I did not get the contract. He said, if I come for fight, go ahead; he was ready. He told me that it was a matter of the President's; that the President would not have foreign stone over the heads of American soldiers. I said, "Mr. Secretary, why did not the act of Congress provide for that; it does not bar foreign stone?" He said that he did not care what the act of Congress called for; that he was responsible, and that he held himself responsible.

Q. Is that the only conversation you had with the Secretary?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Captain McGonnigle?—A. I accused him there at the letting. A day or two before the bids were let, I went to him for some information in regard to putting my samples in the Quartermaster-General's Office.

Q. You say that you accused him at the time of the lettings; of what did you accuse him?—A. Of reading this bid. I wanted it barred out, as it was thirteen minutes behind time.

Q. You mean the bid that was put in after the opening had commenced?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you have any conversation with General Meigs after the bids were opened?—A. Yes. I told General Meigs about this bid being dropped in the basket. This was during the opening of the bids, and then I had a conversation with him a day or two afterward. He told me that he wished that the Secretary of War would award me the contract, as mine was the only fit stone to put over the soldiers' graves, and stone that would last forever, and that was free from all oxidation. He did not see how I could furnish it for the money.

Q. Was this a part of the specifications required in the contract at the time of the bidding, that the portion below ground be rough-dressed, and at least an inch or an inch and a half wider and thicker than the part above ground, the bottoms to be fitted and of uniform thickness, and the corners square?—A. Yes, sir; that was embodied in the specification, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Did you make your bids with a view to the stone being in this shape?—A. Yes.

Q. What difference would it have made in the whole amount of your bid if, in place of that, the stone had not been an inch and a half wider and thicker at the bottom?—A. It would have made a difference of about $75,000 in the whole contract. We take a block of marble ten feet long, four feet wide, and two feet thick. We put something like sixty saws through that block of marble to get the stone of various sizes; and we have got to saw them straight; whereas if we are to have the stone of a different size at the bottom, we have to send each saw through what we call a rip, and break the stone off, so as to get it to right size. That costs in the neighborhood of thirty cents a stone. If the stone is uniform in size at the top and bottom, then the saw goes right through.

Q. Then you say that if the change had been made, making the stone straight in place of being an inch and a half wider and thicker in the bottom, it would have made a difference in your bid?—A. Yes. On the whole, we could have bid $75,000 less than we did bid.

Q. You mean by that that the work could be done for $75,000 less than in the manner required in the specifications?—A. That is what I mean.

Q. What amount of money, if any, did you spend in getting information to enable you to make your bids in the manner you made them?—A. It cost me between $7,000 and $8,000. My firm would not allow any part of this amount to me, so it is the chief cause of my retiring from the firm of Walsh Bros. and going into business on my own account. I had to send men all through the country to examine every cemetery, and I had to send a man to Italy, and to keep him in Carrara for about two months, making all the necessary arrangements there. The marble mountains are about three miles back of Carrara City, and everything that goes out of the city in the rough they charge a duty on; but anything that is worked there goes out free, because it gives the inhabitants employment. There was my stronghold; I would only have to pay the men there (skilled workmen) from 40 to 50 cents a day, while here I would have to pay them in the neighborhood of $4 per day. Then, again, I would save in the matter of transportation. About three-fourths of these stones would have to be landed in New Orleans, and distributed from that point. I could send them to New Orleans from Italy at $5 a ton in the cotton season, and the most of them I could send, as vessels going to New Orleans would take them for ballast in the cotton season; whereas, if I got the stone in Vermont, or in Lee, Mass., or in Canaan, Conn., it would cost me $5 a ton to get them to New York. Then, there would be the expense of rehandling them here and sending them to New Orleans. Stone is very peculiar freight to handle, and if I send it by the regular lines, the difference between the freight from Italy and the freight from New England would be about $15 a ton in my favor. The difference, therefore, in the cost of the marble and of the transportation was twice as much as the duty on the marble would amount to, so that I could afford to pay the duty and have a decent margin left.

Q. Did you have any information or opinion from any Government officer as to what bid would secure the work?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have any interview with any Government officer, before the lettings, as to what bid would secure the work?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or any one for you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have you any information as to what induced the throwing out of your bid and the giving the contract to other parties?—A. Only this, (and it is mere hearsay information;) that this man Bridges helped to lobby the appropriation through. The first appropriation in 1867 was about $250,000, and as that was not enough, they let it lie, and afterward they got the million-dollar appropriation through, and they did not think it could be done even for that. In fact, General Belknap told me that he was surprised to see the number of bids that were inside of the appropriation. He thought that the work would amount to three millions at least, and General Meigs thought it would go to two millions. I understand that Bridges did nothing else but stay here and attend to that appropriation getting through. On the 13th of October Colonel Mack wrote to the Quartermaster-General, as follows: "General: The Secretary of War desires you to request the following-named bidders for head-stones to submit to you samples of the stone which they propose to furnish should a contract be awarded to them: Charles S. Jones, K street, Washington, for white marble; Thos. P. Morgan, K street, Washington; D. C. Sage, Cromwell, Conn.; Dannel W. Axline, Knoxville, Tenn., for granite. By order of the Secretary of War. O. A. Mack. P. S.—Oct. 14. The Secretary of War desires you to telegraph to Swann and Brown, Knoxville Tenn., to send you a specimen of the stone they propose to use for head-stones, provided he awards the contracts to them under their bid." This was addressed to General Meigs about five weeks after the lettings. The lettings were on the 6th of September.

By Mr. GLOVER:]

Q. Did not the specifications require that specimens should be presented before the bids were opened?—A. That is the way I understood it. I should like to have my samples examined by this committee, and tested. I supplied samples for bids 1, 2, and 3

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with General Babcock on the subject of the lettings?—A. No, sir. I should like to add that in my interview with the Secretary of War I asked him where Mr. Sage was going to get his marble? He told me he was going to get it from Cromwell, Conn. I emphatically stated that there was no marble in Cromwell, Conn., and the Secretary almost ordered me out of the room because I contradicted him so flatly on the subject. I told him that I would make an affidavit that there was no marble there, as I knew all the formation of that part of the country, and there was nothing in it but brown stone and isinglass or mica. The nearest marble-ledge is Canaan, Conn., and that runs right on to Lee, Mass. He insisted that this man Sage had a magnificent marble-quarry there.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. What did Sage furnish as a specimen?—A. He did not furnish anything; no one of these men that was awarded the contract furnished samples before the opening of the bids.

Q. Did not Jones furnish samples?—A. No, sir; and Jones had no securities on his bid.

Q. Was it required to submit securities on the bids?—A. Certainly.

Q. Did Bridges submit securities?—A. There were none read on his bid, but whether there was any in the bid or not I cannot say.

Q. You say that none of the parties who received the contract complied with the specifications as to securities?—A. Not as I am aware of; nor as to samples. I am not certain whether Bridges's bid contained the securities or not. I know that I got very mad at the time, and was going to have a row right there when his bid was read.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL :

Q. You say that you saw this bid handed in ?—A. I saw it dropped into the basket.

Q. By whom ?—A. By a man.

Q. Do you know who he was ?—A. No ; he was an entire stranger to me. I do not know whether it was Bridges or not. He was a man of about forty years of age, with a smooth face and no whiskers ; a man about 5 feet 10 or 11.

Q. He came along and dropped this bid into the basket ?—A. Yes.

Q. He did not hand it to any officer who was in charge ?—A. He handed it to nobody.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Q. Could you identify that bid as Bridges's bid when it was opened ?—A. Certainly. I took particular care to notice it.

Q. And it was picked up and read immediately ?—A. Yes ; after my three bids were read.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL :

Q. What did Captain McGonnigle say in reply to your remonstrance ?—A. Not a word. He reddened up and went right along with the business, until General Meigs came in and read the rest of the bids.

Q. Did Captain McGonnigle open any other than this one bid ?—A. He opened my three and this one of Bridges.

By Mr. STRAIT :

Q. They were the first that were opened ?—A. Yes.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL :

Q. What did General Meigs say when you reported the fact to him ?—A. He did not believe it.

Q. Were there any indications that there was a collusion in any way between Captain McGonnigle and this man who dropped in the bid ?—A. Captain McGonnigle sat at one end of the room with the basket at his right-hand side, and I sat farther to his right. This fellow came right along and dropped the bid in the basket. McGonnigle did not say a word, but simply read the bid.

Q. How much time elapsed between the time that your bids were read off and the dropping in of this bid ?—A. It was on the reading of my last bid that this bid was dropped in. I looked at my watch and put down the time, 11.13. I put it on this memorandum, [showing it to the committee.]

Q. Did you notice whether this bid was filled out in pencil or in ink ?—A. In ink.

Q. Was the room so situated that a man could have had access to pen and ink after hearing yours read off ?—A. Yes ; there were some desks in the room, and there was a passage-way outside to the Quartermaster-General's room, where there was also some desks.

Q. In what manner was this bid sealed ?—A. It was in a common blue envelope.

Q. How large was it ?—A. It was a log-sized envelope.

Q. In what manner did Captain McGonnigle open the envelopes ?—A. A man near him had scissors with which he cut the ends of the envelopes off and handed them to Captain McGonnigle.

By Mr. STRAIT :

Q. You say that this bid was dropped in when your third one was being read ?—A. Yes, on the reading of my third bid.

Q. So that, if it were made out there, the person could only have heard your first bid read ?—A. It took from four to five minutes to read each bid, and they were reading my third bid when this was dropped into the basket.

Q. Did you immediately remonstrate, the moment that it was dropped in ?—A. Certainly. I spoke to Captain McGonnigle, and said that that bid came in at 11.13. He did not say one word, but he got as mad as the mischief.

Q. Are you sure about the color of the envelope ?—A. Yes, sir ; it was one of these common envelopes. It just looked as if he took it out of his pocket.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Would this stone be as permanent if the inch or inch and a half at the foot were sawed off as they would if they had been in accordance with the original specifications under which the lettings were made ?—A. No, sir ; they would be more permanent and secure if the inch or inch and a half was left on at the bottom.

By Mr. STRAIT :

Q. Was there any other bid for foreign marble opened or read that day ?—A. No, sir. In fact, when my samples went there they were all surprised when they saw the samples, compared with anything else that was there.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Are you a practical workman in marble?—A. I have been handling marble for the last 9 or 10 years.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Were there any other bids opened that day that were lower than Mr. Bridges's?—A. Yes, sir; but the samples of marble, cement, brick, &c., for any bids that were lower did not come up to the requirements of the specification. The specification called for white marble or gray granite.

Q. What were the lowest bids offered?—A. My bids were the lowest bids offered.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Did you consider this third-class foreign marble in your bid better than any of the marble to be furnished from this country?—A. Certainly.

Q. Did you make known to the Secretary of War that if your bids were accepted about $200,000 would go to the Treasury for duty on the marble, which would reduce your bid to about $700,000?—A. Certainly. I made it known not only to him but to General Meigs.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Does anything appear on the face of your bid showing that your bid was the lowest?—A. Yes.

Q. What was it?—A. Simply because my bid was for Italian marble.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Is there anything on the face of your bid, other than the fact that you stated Italian marble, to indicate that you were the lowest bidder?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is it?—A. According to the plans and specifications furnished to me by the Secretary of War, through General Meigs, I was the only bidder that was sent to the Secretary of War by General Meigs, who put in a bid following the plans and specifications. They called for white marble or gray granite slabs. General Meigs, on seeing my samples, ordered them to be sent up to his own room. The heaviest piece of my samples weighs nearly 175 pounds.

Q. That is no answer to my question. Was there anything on your bid to indicate that you were not going to make those slabs and blocks out of marble already imported into this country, on which duty had been already paid?—A. No, sir. I could not put anything on the printed form but the amount of my bid.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Who were the other lowest bidders that day; lower than you or Mr. Bridges?—A. There were no other bids lower than my bids. Some people put in a bid for cement, stone, &c.; but I am only talking about the bids that were up to the specifications and to the act of Congress.

Q. How many bids were in there that day?—A. To the best of my recollection, about 80.

Q. Are you able to say that none of the rest of the bids were up to the specifications?—A. Yes.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. What is the duty on marble?—A. On rough marble 70 cents—50 cents specific and 20 cents ad valorem.

Q. What is it on dressed marble, such as monumental work?—A. The appraisers of the various ports appraise it according to the amount of work on it. These would be considered slabs, and the slabs would average about $1 apiece, and the 6-inch blocks would average 75 cents. I figure out the whole to average about 80 cents, taking the small with the large, as they were three sizes.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Did you examine any of these bids, except to hear them read that day?—A. I could not examine them. I had no power.

Q. Were not some of the bids on printed forms the same as yours?—A. To the best of my recollection none of the bids that were entertained by the Secretary of War by General Meigs were on printed forms.

WASHINGTON, March 18, 1876.

SAMUEL G. BRIDGES recalled.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Do you know Charles Sheldon?—Answer. Yes, sir; Charles Sheldon.

Q. Is he engaged with you in business?—A. He furnishes the marble for these contracts for slabs and blocks; or the firm of Sheldon & Slosson furnish it.

Q. At what date was this contract let?—A. The awards were under dates December 15 and 31, 1873, I think.

Q. I refer now particularly to the letting; the opening of the bids.—A. That was September the 6th, 1873.

Q. And the contract was closed when?—A. December 15, 1873, was the date of my contract.

Q. Was that the date of all the contracts that were awarded?—A. No, sir; some were dated December 31.

Q. Whose contracts bore date December 31?—A. I cannot now recollect. It would be necessary to refer to papers before answering positively.

Q. Was yours the first contract made?—A. I don't know. Mine bears date December 15.

Q. When did you make the acquaintance of Mr. Sheldon?—A. There are three members in the firm.

Q. Well, of Charles Sheldon?—A. I do not just now recall the exact date. It was about the time of the bidding.

Q. Which member of the firm did you make the acquaintance of first?—A. Charles Sheldon, one of the junior members; the one I got the samples and price from.

Q. He was one of the firm?—A. Yes, sir; from statements made to me to that effect.

Q. About how long, previous to the letting, did you make his acquaintance?—A. [After a pause.] About thirty-six hours.

Q. Did you make the acquaintance of all the firm previous to the closing of the contract?—A. No, sir; I did not meet them all. I made my arrangements with Charles Sheldon, whom I got my samples from. My object in calling on him was to get samples and final prices. The samples I brought with me, and I promised, in case the contract was awarded to me, to purchase the marble from him. For that reason they gave me lower rates than they would otherwise have done, and lower than they had stated in the correspondence had previously on the same subject.

Q. Then it was arranged that Sheldon was to supply you the marble?—A. It was arranged, in case I got the contract.

Q. I hold in my hand a letter, which I will read.

“178 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
“October 7, 1873.

Col. O. A. MACK,
War Department, Washington, D. C.:

“DEAR SIR: After diligent inquiry among all prominent marble dealers in this city and Brooklyn, I can find none by the name of Walsh Brothers, whose name appears on samples in the Quartermaster-General's Office.

“I would respectfully call attention to the fact that the samples are of Italian marble, (unsound at that,) and that the name of Walsh Brothers is undoubtedly a cover for some firm dealing wholly in Italian marble, and who, under existing revenue laws, are able to have the entire work finished in Italy and imported (nearly free of duty) as ‘works of art by American artists residing abroad.’

“As labor is so cheap in Italy, is it just to American laborers to have this work taken from their hands?

“In haste, very respectfully, yours,

“CHAS. H. SHELDON,
“West Rutland, Vt.

“Firm of SHELDON & SLOSSON,
“West Rutland, Vt.”

And the following indorsement appears also on it:

“A true copy.

“THOS. H. FISHER,
“First Lieutenant, Twenty-second Infantry.”

Do you know anything about this letter?—A. I do not. This is the first I ever heard of it that I remember now.

Q. At the date of this letter, (October 7, 1873,) had it been agreed between you and Sheldon & Slosson that they would furnish you the marble?—A. That agreement was made on the 4th of September. I agreed, if I was awarded the contract, to purchase the marble from them.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Did you sign a written agreement?—A. No, sir; it was a verbal agreement.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How soon after you purchased the interest of the other parties, to whom portions of this work had been awarded, did you notify the Department of your ownership of the whole contract?—A. Just how long before I would not be able to state. The first intimation was probably when the powers of attorney were deposited.

Q. Did you deposit the power of attorney?—A. Before any work was commenced on these contracts the powers of attorney were filed, I think. Certainly before any work was completed.

Q. Who did you deposit the powers of attorney with?—A. With Colonel Rockwell, at his office.

Q. Was there any objection made to this purchase by you, at the time, by the Department?—A. Never to my knowledge, sir.

Q. You stated, in your former examination, that the Secretary of War gave, as a reason for the division of this contract to more persons than one, that one person would not be able to perform it within the time required by the law, or as well as it would be performed by three.—A. I do not remember of making such a statement. It was not made in that way.

Q. You will please state, now, the reason for dividing this contract, and giving one-third of it to a party who had bid seventeen cents less than you; one-third to a party who had bid sixteen cents less than you, and one-third to yourself, whose bid was seventeen cents higher than the lowest bidder.—A. I do not know, except the reasons I have given before, and those only hearsay.

Q. Will you please repeat those reasons here?—A. I stated that I had been told that the Secretary of War was opposed to awarding the contract to one person. I don't think I stated that the Secretary of War said so, but that I had heard so. I cannot now call to mind the name of the party that told me. It seemed, though, to be current rumor. This is about the substance of what I said before about it.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Cannot you call to mind who did tell you?—A. No, sir. I don't remember positively who told me or where I heard it; but it was common conversation.

Q. Would you, as a business man, go to work and let a contract of that magnitude and importance to yourself, upon a mere rumor, without knowing something farther about it?—A. I would not let a contract without knowing what that contract was.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How did it come that one-third of this contract was given to you under the circumstances?—A. I know nothing about it. I know no reason, except as given before, and except that the letter was submitted to me by the proper authorities, asking me if I would accept about thirty-five thousand stones at my price.

Q. Were you entitled to any portion of this contract under the terms of the letting, and your bid, which I hold in my hand?—A. I will have to refer you to the Department as the proper authority on that point.

Q. I hold in my hand your bid, signed by yourself and your sureties, which shows that the average amount for furnishing slabs at fifty-six cemeteries, under your bid, was \$4.91 $\frac{14}{100}$, and for blocks \$3.34 $\frac{1}{100}$. Were you, under this bid, entitled to any portion of that contract?—A. The contract, or part of it, was awarded me under my bid for \$900,000 for all the work; that is, I received a proportionate rate, viz, \$3.56, for the part allotted to me under that bid.

Q. Will you please answer my question—were you, under your bid, entitled to any portion of that contract?—A. I cannot state whether I was entitled to any portion of it (not having all the bids before me) or not. Not bidding for each and every cemetery separately, or for all the cemeteries named in the blank form, I could not average the whole work so as to determine that point; but was entitled to those awarded under my $900,000 bid.

Q. Had you more than one bid?—A. I had two bids, or propositions; one on certain specified cemeteries, and one for all the work at $900,000.

Q. Did you put these two bids in at the same time?—A. I did.

Q. Were each of those bids signed by yourself?—A. Each signed by myself.

Q. Were they both in the same envelope?—A. Both in the same envelope.

Q. Were they both in compliance with the terms of the letting?—A. I so considered them. They were to the best of my knowledge of what was required. It never has been questioned that I know of.

Q. Did each of those bids furnish security for the performance of the work?—A. I executed my papers according to the requirements.

Q. I hold in my hand a bid of yours made at that time as furnished by the Quartermaster-General's Department, which reads:

"Will furnish all the slabs and all the blocks advertised for, for the sum of nine hundred thousand ($900,000) dollars.

(Signed)

"SAMUEL G. BRIDGES."

And indorsed:

"A true copy.

"A. J. MCGONNIGLE,
"Captain, Acting Quartermaster."

Was that the bid that you made at that time?—A. I would be obliged to refer to copies of my papers at home to answer positively as to the wording of that proposition. My bid and propositions were signed by myself.

Q. Where did you prepare that bid at?—A. In my room.

Q. Where?—A. In this city.

Q. Is that bid written in pencil or in ink?—A. In ink, sir. I would not have written such important matters in pencil. In reading it you gave no date, I notice?

Q. Was there any security named in that bid?—A. It was contained in the envelope with the bid.

Q. Had any securities signed on that bid?—A. I would be obliged to refer to papers to answer.

Q. What is your best recollection?—A. It is so long since, that I would have to refer to the papers again. I cannot answer understandingly without reference.

Q. You have stated that you considered this bid in with the other, on which there was security. Now, can you not state whether there was security on this special bid or not?—A. Probably not. I probably included it under the same security as the other, for the faithful execution of the work if it should be awarded to me.

Q. I hold in my hand your bid dated Keokuk, Iowa, September 2, 1873, for fifty-six cemeteries out of seventy-two, naming for what you will do the work in each. Will you look at this paper and say if this is your signature or not? [The paper was shown to witness, who examined it.]—A. Yes, sir; that is my signature.

Q. Was that paper made out at Keokuk, or in the city of Washington?—A. It was made out at Keokuk, Iowa; that is, it was filled out, I think, and the bond executed, leaving only the figures blank, to be afterward filled in.

Q. The bondsmen signed in Keokuk, Iowa?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When was your second bid for nine hundred thousand dollars made out?—A. That I wrote on a separate sheet of paper, and inclosed with the other in Washington when I deposited the bid. It was a proposition to do all the work for a certain price.

Q. Then you never gave any security for the performance of the nine hundred thousand dollar bid at all?—A. I did. It was understood that I should put in the figures as I saw proper after reaching here.

Q. That was an understanding with the securities?—A. Yes, sir; I was to put the figures in when I decided what my bids should be.

Q. The bid for nine hundred thousand dollars, however, proved to be a separate and distinct one; did your bondsmen ever see that paper before you put it in as a bid?—A. They did not. It was understood, though, that I was to arrange the figures of the bid according to my own ideas, after I ascertained the cost of the material and other expenses.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Did they execute to you any power of attorney authorizing you to do that?—A. No, sir; I did not consider it necessary. Their word was as good as their bond to me.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I present you a paper offering to do the work for nine hundred thousand dollars signed Samuel G. Bridges; is that your signature?—A. [The witness examined the paper presented.] That is not my signature.

Q. Have you seen those papers since you have been in Washington?—A. I have not.

Q. Or any other papers appertaining to this matter?—A. I have seen no papers appertaining to this matter.

Q. Was the contract given to you under either one of the bids that I have named to you?—A. I received a letter from Captain McGonnigle, or from the Department, submitting a proposition to know if I would take or execute some 35,000 head-stone slabs at $3.56 each. The exact wording of the letter I cannot give without reference to the original paper.

Q. Did you receive any contract under your bid, as you made it, for the work?—A. I did; about 48,500, at the rate of $900,000 for the whole work.

Q. How did you estimate that you did, at the rate of $900,000?—A. By dividing the total amount, $900,000, by the total number of stones to be furnished, viz, 253,088.

Q. Have you not stated in your previous testimony that it was not known how many stones would have to be furnished?—A. The exact number was not stated, but an approximate number was given as a basis for estimates. There is a statement attached to the specification showing the total number of stones required is about 253,088.

Q. I hold in my hand your bid. Will you show me where it states that number?

[The witness indicated a printed slip at the head of the bid, and read from it the number.]

A. The total number, as shown here, is 253,088—being 147,694 for the known, and 105,394 for the unknown, graves.

Q. Does your bid show that you were to furnish for one-third of that number?—A.

There was a provision specifying that "contracts may be made for separate quantities of such head-stones."

Q. Does your bid show that?—A. The law at the heading of my bid states it. I should have said the act approved February 22, 1867, shows that, and it is prescribed by the law of March 3, 1873, from which what I have stated is an extract.

Q. Did you get your contract under your bid for separate cemeteries, or under your bid for the entire work?—A. I received my contract on the basis of the acceptance of this proposition submitted to me, whether I would take thirty-five thousand of the stone at a certain price.

Q. Then you did not get your contract under either of your bids?—A. Most certainly; and I would not have got it at all if I had not made a bid.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Have you, in your former testimony, stated anything about two bids having been put in by you?—A. I made a proposition to perform the work in certain cemeteries, and a proposition to do the whole work for $900,000.

Q. Have you not heretofore stated that your bids were all completed and the bonds executed in Keokuk, Iowa, before you came here at all?—A. Yes, sir. I have stated that the bid was completed all but the filling in of the figures, &c.

Q. Which of the papers shown you do you call the proposition and which the bid?—A. The one executed by my bondsmen I call my bid, and the other the one to do the whole work for $900,000 is a bid, also. You may call them bids or propositions.

Q. Answer my question: Which is your proposition and which the bid?—A. I call it all one and the same. It is a bid to do the work, or a "proposition" to do the work. It is all a bid. All bids I consider propositions, however.

Q. Do you consider all propositions bids?—A. In this connection I would. The Department advertised for proposals to do certain work for the Government, and I call my proposals bids in that connection.

Q. What do you call a paper slip—a paper without any date or place, which reads in this way: "I will furnish all the slabs and all the blocks advertised for for the sum of $900,000;" do you call that a proposition or a bid?—A. I would call it a bid or proposition in that connection.

Q. When you handed this proposition or bid in, was it attached to the original bid?—A. I could not state, sir, whether I had pinned it to the bid or not; it was contained, however, in the same envelope.

Q. In what kind of an envelope was it contained?—A. It was in a large envelope. I cannot remember the color.

Q. Do you remember the seal?—A. It was an ordinary seal like a common envelope; not a wax seal.

Q. Have you ever been a bidder before?—A. Yes, sir; four or five years before.

Q. Is it not customary to seal all such bids with sealing-wax?—A. I never sealed one with wax in my life, and do not know that I have ever seen one that was sealed with wax.

Q. Where were you when you sealed this envelope?—A. In my room.

Q. Where was that room?—A. In the Ebbitt House.

Q. Consider that now a little carefully; where was that done?—A. In the Ebbitt House.

Q. It was not in the room where the letting was to take place?—A. No, sir. I answer this to the best of my knowledge and belief. I has been so long ago that I cannot remember all of these small matters exactly, but to the best of my knowledge I sealed that envelope in my room at the hotel.

Q. Do you consider a bid on a contract involving nearly a million dollars as a small matter?—A. I do not so consider it, sir. No, sir, I realized fully what I was doing, and I do not know that I have said anything that shows that I consider the bidding on this contract a small matter.

Q. Where did you purchase this envelope?—A. It was near the Quartermaster-General's Office, in the stationery store under that block, to the best of my recollection.

Q. How far is that from the Ebbitt House?—A. It is about one block.

Q. Was that the nearest stationery store?—A. That is where I was sent, sir, I believe.

Q. Who sent you there?—A. Some person at the Ebbitt House, to the best of my recollection; I may be mistaken.

Q. If you remember so distinctly where you purchased that envelope, cannot you tell the color of it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you buy more than one?—A. I bought a package, if I remember. I will state further that I may be mistaken in regard to that. I was sent there, I now recollect, more particularly to get blanks to make out some powers of attorney.

Q. How far did you say this store was from the Quartermaster-General's Office?—A. Near that building; I don't know the exact distance.

Q. What were they for?—A. To execute the agreement with Morgan. It was a year afterward—after the bids were opened—that I went there.

Q. How far is this store from the Quartermaster-General's Office?—A. It is within a square of the Ebbitt House, under some granite steps, below some bank or office; I do not remember exactly the location.

Q. Under the Quartermaster-General's Office, you say?—A. I did not state that. I think it is in the middle of the block; the Quartermaster-General's Office was on the corner.

Q. You came down from the Quartermaster-General's Office and went there to get the envelopes?—A. I did not say that. I never was there (in that office) until I went to deposit my bid, if I remember correctly.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Who were your securities?—A. I gave on my bid H. N. Bostwick and Mr. Wyman.

Q. Are you certain of that?—A. I am not positive until I see the papers.

Q. Wyman's name does not appear on this bid.—A. It is Renaud, then.

Q. What were those gentlemen worth?—A. Both owned property and are considered responsible men. I cannot tell what they are worth.

Q. Have you any idea?—A. No, sir.

Q. Are they worth $100,000 apiece?—A. I judge not.

Q. What is your opinion?—A. I considered them amply good for the bond.

Q. Good for $900,000?—A. No bond was required for that amount; the amount is not stated in the specification.

Q. What was the idea in giving this bond on this blank, (this now is the one in which your bid is for $900,000?) Did you consider Renaud and Bostwick good for $900,000 if you had gotten the contract?—A. They were good for the amount the bond required.

Q. You have bid here for fifty-six cemeteries; it must run up to some seven or eight hundred thousand dollars. Did you consider these two securities as sufficient on such a bond as would be required for that?—A. They were amply sufficient for what they obligated themselves for.

Q. That is not the question.—A. I did consider them good for what they were responsible under that bond.

Q. Cannot you state what they were worth?—A. No, sir.

Q. How, then, do you arrive at the conclusion that they were good for such an amount?—A. They were so considered, and their names were submitted to the Government official, and he certified that they were men of ample means.

Q. Was that expressed in view of your whole bid for this whole amount, for $900,000?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What Government officer was that?—A. J. C. Parrott, postmaster at Keokuk, Iowa.

Q. I would like to have you give your opinion about what each of these men was worth.—A. It would be only guess-work.

Q. Well, give us the guess-work.—A. I don't wish to injure a man by stating not enough, and do not want to state too much.

Q. I ask you to approximate the amount.—A. I think Bostwick was worth from $35,000 to $45,000, perhaps more, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. And then the other one?—A. I do not know as much about his property. He had property outside of the city, property in the city, and had some property in the vicinity of Saint Louis, I think, but what it was I know nothing about. He had a farm, too, but how much that was worth, I do not know.

Q. Were any questions asked you about the responsibility of the men after you came here?—A. No, sir; I put my bid in, and that was all about it. I was not asked anything. These gentlemen were securities simply on the bids.

Q. Were these gentlemen to be your final bondsmen in case you got the contract?—A. No, sir; I did not so consider them; Bostwick might have been; probably not.

Q. Whom did you hold in contemplation as your bondsmen when you filed this bid?—A. I could not state, except Bostwick might have been one; the other one was not decided upon.

Q. What amount of bonds were you required to give on the one-third of the contract awarded to you?—A. Thrity thousand dollars.

Q. Who were your bondsmen?—A. Mr. Williams and A. L. Connable; that has been answered in the testimony given before.

Q. Have they any interest in the proceeds of this work?—A. None whatever now, sir.

Q. Is that the only amount of bonds that you have executed for this work?—A. No, sir; I executed a bond to Mr. Sage for the performance of his work when I bought him out. He gave a bond for $50,000, and I gave him an indemnifying bond for the same amount.

Q. Who is on that bond?—A. Sheldon & Slosson one, and a New York firm the other.

Q. Did you execute a bond to indemnify Mr. Jones?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Did you in regard to Mr. Morgan?—A. No, sir.

Q. How did it happen; did they execute bonds?—A. They did, sir; but I think they would not have executed the work.

Q. To whom is that bond executed? Who signed the bond for the Government—the Secretary of War, the Quartermaster-General, or who?—A. Captain McGonnigle, I think, sir. I think all the business was transacted through his office.

Q. Now what time did you leave Keokuk and come to Washington and file your bid?—A. I left Keokuk on the 2d of September, arrived at Rutland, Vt., on the 4th, and reached here on the night of the 5th.

Q. You went to Rutland to get your samples?—A. Yes, sir; and to make the final arrangement with them as to prices.

Q. Did you say that Sheldon & Slosson are partners of yours in this contract?—A. They are not partners. I arranged with them to furnish the marble and necessary means to execute all these contracts.

Q. Well, what interest do they get?—A. They get interest on balances, and so much for the stone—interest after sixty days on stone.

Q. They furnish all the means?—A. Yes, sir; and all the stone; that covers it.

Q. Did you state in your former testimony that you put these figures down at Keokuk?—A. The figures were not put down. Do you mean the prices?

Q. No, sir; the figures for each of these cemeteries.—A. No, sir; the bid was made out, I think, and the bond executed, all excepting the figures. The prices for marble had to be put in. I got the prices on the 4th, at Rutland, when on my way to Washington, and I then put them in after reaching here.

Q. You arrived here on the night of the 5th?—A. Yes, sir; at midnight, to the best of my recollection, and was figuring all night on the bids.

Q. Now, you state that you worked all night in figuring up, and filling in, and making entries of the figures for the various cemeteries in the printed form; having done this with so much care and labor, what induced you to put in a different bid, one that you call either a "bid," "statement," or a "proposition"?—A. The same reason that has induced me to bid in the same way on different occasions. I have stated in my testimony before that the work could be done a great deal better and cheaper at each cemetery if I got the contract for all of them than if I had only a portion, and I did not desire to get a few in remote places. I would rather have taken the whole contract at a much lower rate than to have done so.

Q. Now, why did you, if you wanted all the cemeteries, rub out a few in the printed list and exclude them from your original bid?—A. For this reason: I expect that I had no positive information as to the freights.

Q. Did you get information as to these freights from daylight until 11 o'clock on the day that you put in your bid?—A. I received three or four letters from different parties with regard to freights which I had ordered to be sent here. I expected more information than I received about it. I did not get all that I expected.

Q. From whom did you get that information?—A. I received three or four letters from different freight-agents. I had directed them to write me here, as I knew I would not have time to get them if sent to Iowa and follow me here.

Q. When did you get those letters?—A. I don't remember at what hour I received them.

Q. I mean where did you receive them on your arrival in Washington?—A. At the hotel.

Q. What time did you get those letters; I mean what time that morning?—A. I think there were two on my arrival at the hotel, and I received one or two about 9 o'clock the next morning, although I don't remember exactly the time.

Q. Did those four letters give you the price of transportation for the sixteen cemeteries left out of the printed form?—A. It was general information as regards certain localities. I do not know that it concerned the sixteen. I could not tell now just what influence it had upon the sixteen cemeteries.

Q. How long was it before 11 o'clock that you put your bid in?—A. Fifteen minutes before 11, about.

Q. Was this the last bid put in?—A. I do not remember. It was the last and only one by me.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Would you have known it if it was the last?—A. I paid no attention to the bids that were being put in. I do not know. I was not acquainted in the room, and took no notice of what was going on specially.

Q. To whom did you give that bid?—A. To the person at the table or desk.

Q. Who was that person?—A. I cannot say, sir. I only asked the question if he was the proper person, and was told that he was.

Q. Was he sitting or standing up?—A. I don't call to mind.

Q. Do you remember whether he was at a table or a desk?—A. I think at a table.

Q. Was any other person in the room?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you willing to swear positively—and I want you to consider before you do—whether you are positive you put in what you called your “proposition” before or after the opening of the bids commenced?—A. I will most solemnly swear, on a pile of Bibles as large as this Capitol, that it was put in about 15 minutes before the bids were opened, or opening commenced. If you have such testimony, I denounce the author as a malicious falsifier.

Q. Did you receive any information from any person previous to the opening of the bids on the 6th of September, 1873, which induced you to abandon your original bid and make another?—A. I did not; neither did I abandon the original bid. I always intended to bid in that way, (a bid covering the whole.) That was why I sat up all night to figure up as near as possible the whole cost.

Q. Do you tell me that you sat up all night to make your calculations, and entered the result in this printed form, only to throw it away the next morning and write in three or four lines that you would take the whole thing for $900,000?—A. I did not throw it away. I only based my information as to the total amount or total cost of the work upon the work that I had done that night, and it is no small job to do it.

Q. Was there any necessity for turning over the pages of this paper and entering all the respective lists and prices in regular order if you intended to accomplish the whole by a slip of paper containing the words I have quoted?—A. Compliance with that form was required by the Department, and I only followed, in making out my bid, the specifications. The requirements provided a special blank on which the bids were to be made.

Q. Then you did attach that paper to the other blanks?—A. I am not positive whether I pinned it on or not, but think so; but I certainly inclosed it as a part and parcel of the same bid. I could do the work for the whole number, in proportion, cheaper than for a few. There were other reasons, also, for the difference between the bids. For instance, the contract contemplated marble and granite, but I did not bid for the granite-work at all.

Q. Have you the letters which you received in Washington giving you the information at that time about the transportation?—A. I think I have all of them at home. I think I kept every one; at all events I have the memorandums upon which I made the calculations at that time. I may not have kept all the letters, but I think I did.

Q. What did you add in commendation of your claims for a portion of this bid, (which was pending nearly two months;) what did you add to secure a portion of that contract?—A. I talked more or less with my friends at home. However, I knew nothing in particular of the reason. I may have written to Sheldon about the bid, but I have no recollection now.

Q. How long did you remain in Washington after the date of the bidding?—A. I could tell by reference to the hotel-register, but I think only one day.

Q. Did you return to Washington again before the contracts were awarded?—A. Yes, sir; after receiving this letter I came here; the letter referring to whether I would take a portion of the work at a certain rate.

Q. Whom did you see then?—A. The gentleman who occupied the most of my time on that occasion was trying to get me into a combination with Jones's and Morgan's bids. He wanted me to decline to accept the propositions of the Department, and if I declined they would also. They, as he stated, wanted me to combine in a letter with them, demanding that we receive the slabs and blocks at our own figures, and not the slabs without the blocks.

Q. What gentleman was that?—A. I cannot tell his name. I do not remember it.

Q. Was he one of the bidders?—A. No, sir; not to my knowledge. He claimed to acting for Morgan and Jones. I was figuring over carefully to see if I could take them at $3.56, the price offered by the Department, when I was approached by him; but I refused to enter into any ring or combination with them.

Q. Do you know any reason why you were addressed on the subject and asked if you would take one-fourth of the slabs at a higher price than the lowest bidder?—A. No reason except those that I have stated already.

Q. Whom did you see after this strange gentleman on that occasion?—A. Only my family and friends that I remember, who were here with me at that time.

Q. About what time was that, what month and what day of the month?—A. I think it was during the month of October, but I am not positive with reference to that.

Q. Did you see the Secretary of War during that visit?—A. Yes, sir; he called at the hotel. He was acquainted with us, and came to call on my friends and family.

Q. What took place then?—A. Nothing of importance. He called socially on the ladies, my friends, and myself; it was merely a friendly visit.

Q. Did you talk business at all?—A. No, sir; I think not, except the matter was spoken of only, and he said that the subject was not yet decided by the Department.

Q. Did you have any business talk with him on that subject?—A. His reply to the only question that I asked him on that occasion was that he did not know anything about it; that the Department had not decided the matter, and he didn't know what they would do.

Q. Did you see him after that, before the contracts were awarded, at any time?—A. I don't think I did, sir.

Q. Did you see any other official here in relation to this matter?—A. I don't think I did.

Q. Who was it that was so kind as to give you one-third of the work?—A. I was told by Mr. Sage that letters were written to four different parties—the Brandon Marble Company, myself, Jones, and Morgan, and a proposition was submitted to the four, as I understood. I had, I think, called upon Colonel Mack, finding he had something to do with it, though I was not acquainted with him previously, and asked him what would be the result, and understood from him that the matter had not yet been decided. The proposition had not been accepted when I asked him the question.

Q. When was the contract awarded?—A. Dated the 15th December.

Q. Can you give any reason why three months and over were allowed to pass before the awards were made?—A. No, sir; I cannot.

Q. What did Colonel Mack say to you?—A. That is all that I remember. I had no conversation in particular, except what I have named.

Q. Are you certain that you have told us all the interested parties in this contract, viz, the Marble Company, Sheldon & Slosson, and yourself?—A. I have stated in my previous testimony that Mr. Williams, one of the bondsmen, commenced to execute the work; but that after a time it was arranged to purchase his interest. No other person or persons are interested.

Q. I understood you to say that Williams had no interest?—A. My testimony shows that I said he had a share in the profits at first.

Q. Did you buy out Mr. Williams?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see Charles Sheldon in New York City about October 7, 1873?—A. I did not, to the best of my knowledge. I had not seen him up to that time.

Q. At what time did you make the final arrangement with Mr. Sheldon?—A. It was made September the 4th, for the marble, when I called for the samples. They gave me prices of the samples and figures, provided that if I received the award I would give them the contract for the marble, and I promised them that I would do so. The final arrangement was in October, 1874, I think is about the time.

Q. Then I understand you to say that he was interested at the time Williams was?—A. The only interest that he had in it was my promise to purchase the marble from them, provided I got the contract.

Q. You have no knowledge of Mr. Sheldon's writing a letter to Colonel Mack about October 7, 1873?—A. I have stated before that the reading of that letter was the first I had ever heard of it, to the best of my recollection.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Have you ever seen the man who sat at the table when you handed in your bid?—A. I came into the room an entire stranger, and don't remember positively who it was, or whether it was McGonigle or some other official.

Q. Have you ever seen the party that sat at the table when you handed in your bid?—A. I cannot state positively.

Q. Are you willing to swear it was not McGonigle?—A. I am not.

Q. Was Williams in the city at the time of the letting, or from the time of the letting until the contract was made?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Do you know of his having left Keokuk to come to Washington?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have conversation about his coming here?—A. No, sir; I had not.

Q. Did Williams ever say to you that he had been here and had seen parties connected with the War Department?—A. No, sir, that I call to mind.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What was your business before you went into the contract business?—A. I had formerly been in the mercantile business.

Q. What was your mercantile business?—A. Jewelry business; a manufacturing jeweler and dealer.

Q. A dealer in jewelry?—A. Yes, sir; and manufacturer.

Q. What kind of jewelry did you manufacture?—A. I was manufacturing a great variety of goods in that line.

Q. Is that the business you were in immediately before you went into the contract business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You said that you went into the contract business after Mr. Belknap became Secretary of War.—A. I said as nearly as possible 1870, and I think after he became Secretary of War.

Q. Where were you contracting previous to making this contract?—A. At Fort Leavenworth, in the Department of the Missouri, and also in the Department of Dakota.

Q. What were your contracts for?—A. Grain, wood, hay, and supplies generally.

Q. Had you any large contracts previous to this one?—A. None as large as this.

Q. How large a contract had you previously to this one; the largest?—A. They averaged from ten to twenty-five and thirty-five thousand dollars. There was one contract which Mr. Williams and I arranged that amounted to about $100,000.

Q. What was that for?—A. For grain.

Q. Where at?—A. The grain was to be furnished to posts up the Missouri River. It was arranged to deliver it at Sioux City and Saint Paul.

Q. Where did you procure that contract?—A. The contract was procured from parties in Minnesota; a subcontract. I bid on the contract, and was one of the lowest bidders. I wrote to the department at the time that if the contract was awarded to me I desired to deliver the grain at once, and that unless they would take it immediately, I did not wish to take the contract, and would withdraw my bid. I could not afford to hold the grain on an uncertainty, as the price was declining. I received a reply from the department, I think, that the contract could not be awarded until they had appropriations, or something of that kind.

Q. What department advised you of that?—That was from Saint Paul, and I withdrew the bid. Williams owned the grain really, and could not afford to hold it under the circumstances.

Q. From whom was that letter received?—A. From General Card's office, I think.

Q. Where did Card get the authority to make a contract for $100,000, or had he any such authority?—A. The result proved that he had. The contract was awarded to other parties, who made an arrangement with Williams, and bought a portion of his grain to fill that contract; perhaps all.

Q. Who advised you to go into the contract business?—A. I went in voluntarily, and took nobody's advice.

Q. Who is Williams, and where does he reside?—A. He resides at Keokuk, Iowa, and is a contractor.

Q. What form of contractor?—A. I think he had two contracts on that Keokuk canal, and others in Pennsylvania and Michigan, and I think he has bought out other contractors in a good many different places.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Is Williams related or connected in any way with the late Secretary of War?—A. No, sir.

Q. To what extent or amount did he receive contracts on the canal?—A. I could not state. I do not remember the amount of the awards.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In making up your bid for the 56 cemeteries which has been exhibited here, that you set up all night to make out, did you bid on the 56 in which you considered the most profit to be?—A. I did not; cost of material was the same; made an average bid. I bid finally on those that I had positive information about. That is my recollection.

Q. You state as a business man that you did not bid on the cemeteries in which you considered there was the most profit.—A. It is important in bidding on a contract of that kind to bid for undesirable work as well as desirable points, to have it considered favorably.

Q. The ones that you left out of your bids are as follows: Ball's Bluff, where there are 1 head-stone and 24 blocks to be furnished. The next is Barrancas cemetery, where there are 580 head-stones and 375 blocks to be furnished; one at Battle Ground cemetery, where there are 40 head-stones and no blocks to be furnished; one at Beverly cemetery, where there are 138 head-stones and 7 blocks to be furnished; one at Crown Hill cemetery, where there are 672 head-stones and 36 blocks to be furnished; one at Cyprus Hill cemetery, where there are 3,038 head-stones and 75 blocks to be furnished; one at Danville cemetery, where there are 1,159 head-stones and 134 blocks to be furnished; one at Fort Harrison cemetery, where there are 240 head-stones and 286 blocks to be furnished; one at Glendale cemetery, where there are 237 head-stones to be furnished and 399 blocks; one at Grafton cemetery, where there are 618 head-stones and 608 blocks to be furnished; one at Laurel cemetery, where there are 236 head-stones and 2 blocks to be furnished; one at Loudon Park cemetery, where there are 1,478 head-stones and 161 blocks to be furnished; one at Philadelphia cemetery, where there are 1,789 head-stones and 30 blocks to be furnished; one at Salisbury cemetery, where there are 88 head-stones and no blocks to be furnished; one at Staunton cemetery, where there are 231 head-stones and 406 blocks to be furnished; one at White Hall cemetery, where there are 59 head-stones and one block to be furnished. I want to ask you now if these are not the sixteen, taken together, which are the most inconvenient and least profitable cemeteries in the whole list?—A. They are the best ones in some cases in the list, in nearly every instance, perhaps, or they are among the best, because they have proven to be nearer home.

Q. State, then, your reason for leaving out the best ones.—A. I had no information, perhaps, as to freight. I had not thought that I had left out the best ones. The reason was that I expected to have a day in Washington before the bids were put in, and I would have time to examine into the matter, and get the rates of freight; but I did not have time to do so, and did not make the bids until I was able to inform myself about it.

Q. You left Keokuk on the 2d?—A. To the best of my recollection.

Q. Where did you go from Keokuk?—A. Direct to Vermont.

Q. And from there?—A. Straight to Washington.

Q. Now, do you say you sat up all night to make out this bid, and that you struck out of your bid the sixteen most profitable cemeteries?—A. Not because they were the most profitable, but, probably, because I did not get the information to justify me in bidding on them separately.

Q. Who was with you that night helping you to make out that bid?—A. I was entirely alone.

Q. With whom did you consult before putting in your bid the next day?—A. I consulted with no person as to cost of these cemeteries. My figures were made from information received, and in my own possession.

Q. At what time that night, or the next day, did you conclude to put in the bid for $900,000?—A. It was decided upon just before I sealed my bid, I think.

Q. Where were you when you sealed that bid?—A. I sealed the bid in my room; am quite sure; put it in my pocket, and went direct to the Quartermaster-General's Office, to the best of my recollection.

Q. When you sealed and put it in, which did you consider your bid, the $900,000 one or the bid for the cemeteries separately, which, leaving out the sixteen, for which you did not bid, would amount to more than $900,000?—A. That was left for the decision of the Quartermaster-General's Office.

Q. You say you filled in your bid at the Ebbitt House?—A. That was my statement, I think, sir.

Q. Did you sign the bid at Keokuk the same time your sureties signed it there?—A. Yes, sir; I think so.

Q. That was signed by them at the same time that you signed it, you say?—A. I signed it, to the best of my recollection, before they did.

Q. Where did you get the ink that you used when you filled in your bid at the Ebbitt House?—A. I presume from the office of the house.

Q. Did you use the same ink, or not, when you filled in the bid at the Ebbitt House, that you used at Keokuk when you signed the contract?—A. I don't remember that I carried ink with me, though I might have done so. I cannot state positively.

Q. Did you use the same pen?—A. I cannot state. It had been my custom formerly to carry pen, ink, and paper with me—one of those close-topped inkstands. Don't recollect whether I had such with me then.

Q. Did you use the same ink, to make out your bid for $900,000, at the Ebbitt House that you used to fill in the contract with?—A. I could not state, sir. I have no recollection about it that is positive.

Q. You are quite sure, however, that you signed them both in the same room at the same time?—A. I don't call to mind that fact. To the best of my recollection, I wrote the bids, as I said, in that room.

Q. If you had signed the bid at any other place, would you now recollect it?—A. I am quite positive I would.

Q. Will you state now, positively, whether you did or did not sign both at the same time?—A. I would not state positively whether I signed that blank form and bid in Keokuk, Iowa, or not; certainly the bond was executed there.

Q. I ask if you signed the bid for $900,000 at the same time you filled in the bid for the different cemeteries at the Ebbitt House, as you have testified?—A. They were both written here; that is, the filling in. The letter written, accompanying the bid, was certainly written here.

Q. Were they both done at your room in the Ebbitt House?—A. To the best of my recollection, they were.

Q. Then they would both be written with the same ink, would they not?—A. Not necessarily so; but I presume they would. If I had the inkstand referred to, I might have replenished it with ink.

Q. Did you have two kinds of ink in that room?—A. Not to my knowledge; might have had.

Q. Will you examine this bid, please, and state whether the filling in of the amounts is done with the same ink that you signed the bid with yourself and your sureties, in Keokuk, Iowa, as you have stated?—A. I cannot state.

Q. Well, examine and give us your best opinion.—A. I have no recollection about it, sir.

Q. Will you give us your opinion; look at the signature of yourself and your sureties, and the filling in, which you say was done at the Ebbitt House, and tell us if the writing appears to be done with the same ink that the filling in was done with or not?—A. I think not. I don't think I brought ink with me, but I might have done so, as above stated. I only state that the bondsmen signed in Keokuk, the filling in I know I did do here myself, as far as figures are concerned.

Q. Will you state, on examination of the paper and ink used in signing at Keokuk and here, that the same ink appears to have been used on both occasions?—A. I am not able to state that. I have looked at it carefully, and I have no opinion about it. I do not think I have stated positively that I signed the bid in Iowa. I may have done so and may not, but I am not sure. At all events it was not necessary.

Q. I do not now ask you in reference to your own signature alone, but ask you now to examine this paper and give your opinion as to whether or not the signatures of your sureties attached appear to be made with the same ink as the filling in of the amount for the 56 cemeteries, which you say was done at the Ebbitt House in this city.—A. The two signatures on the bond are not with the same ink. I know from my own knowledge also that it is not the same ink. Bostwick signed in his place of business, and the other man signed in his place of business, and it is reasonable to suppose that they signed with different ink.

Q. That is not an answer to my question. I ask you now to state whether or not the signatures of your sureties attached to this bid appear to be made with the same ink as the filling in of the amounts, which you say was done here?—A. I do not think so. The ink is different. I can see that plainly.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Was H. M. Bostwick, Mr. T. Renaud, Mr. J. C. Parrott, or either of them, in the city of Washington about the time this proposal was signed?—A. Neither of them. They were in Keokuk.

Q. There seems to be an alteration made here in the date; somebody made a 3 here and attempted to alter it by scratching it out and putting in a 2. Can you explain that?—A. I presume that I made the 3 by mistake, and found out subsequently that it was wrong.

Q. Are you quite sure that you made that change before the signatures were added?—A. I know that it was done before.

Q. Now, you state that you were here with your family at that time?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you not testify that you were here with your family at the time this transaction took place?—A. No, sir; I came on after the proposition was submitted to me about taking the 35,000 stones at $3.56, and at that time I brought my family with me; but they were not here before.

Q. How did it happen that you put in a bid for $900,000 without the consent of your bondsmen?—A. I had a positive understanding with them that the prices were to be inserted after I found out what they would be.

Q. Are there not many other alterations in this?—A. I may have made some mistakes; I could not say that I did not. If I did I presume that I corrected them as I proceeded.

Q. Will you swear that the date was not changed after you reached here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you state the reason why the name of the party to whom the certificate was given was left blank?—A. I suppose it was only from want of information as to the proper name to insert there.

Q. What did you expect to be put there?—A. I did not know. I don't see that the name was important.

Q. Then I understand you to say that these figures were all filled in after this paper was executed, all having been left blank except your signature, the signature of the sureties, and the signature of the postmaster at Keokuk, Iowa?—A. I think the paper was executed and the filling in, all except the figures, to the best of my recollection; but I may be in error. The figures were placed there by myself after I ascertained the prices of the marble at Rutland.

Q. What figures?—A. The price at which I would be willing to take the work.

Q. In leaving this name blank, the idea was that you could transfer this contract?—A. No, sir; that was the place for the name of the proper officer here to whom it was directed. If Captain McGonnigle's name should have been put in, it would have made it what it was intended to be, and I suppose it was left blank for the reason that I did not know whose name was proper to insert.

Q. The blank, then, was to be filled with the name of the officer of the Government to whom the bids were sent, and who signed for the Government?—A. Yes, sir; that is my understanding. "The United States" would be proper.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1876.

MAURICE J. WALSH recalled.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How long prior to the opening of the bids for the head-stones of the soldiers' graves, in the Quartermaster-General's Office, on the 6th of September, 1873, was it that you deposited your bid—how long prior to the hour of opening?—A. The day before.

Q. Were you present on the morning of the opening of the bids?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many bids did you see go in that morning?—A. I only saw this bid of Bridges that morning.

Q. How long were you present in the room before the opening?—A. About a minute or two.

Q. You saw one bid put in?—A. Yes; dropped in the basket at 11.13.

Q. Do you know Bridges?—A. I have seen Bridges here. He was pointed out to me outside the door of this committee-room as I came in, but he is not the same man who dropped his bid into the basket after the opening commenced.

Q. How many people were present?—A. There were some eighty or a hundred; the room was crowded.

Q. Was there any person in the room at that time whom you can now name, who knew that you made complaint of this bid being put in?—A. The whole room must have heard me; but one person in particular sat right alongside of me. He got up just as quick as I did, and called my attention to it.

Q. Who was that man?—A. A man by the name of J. Irvin Burns.

Q. Where does he live?—A. In New York, at 478 Fifth avenue, I believe; it is right opposite the reservoir.

Q. Was there any other person present whose name you can now recall?—A. All the room were strangers to me except this man.

Q. How soon after that did you leave for New York?—A. I don't think I left for some two or three days.

Q. Did you receive any communication from the Department after that time about the letting?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you receive a copy of this communication:

“WAR DEPARTMENT,
“QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
“Washington, D. C., August 15, 1873.

“Mr. ————:

“SIR: In addition to the information contained in the specifications for head-stones for soldiers' graves, you are advised that abbreviations may be made in the Christian or first name of the deceased, also in his rank, and in the name of his State, thus: Wm. C. Jones, pvt., Mass.; Sam. H. Walker, lt. col., Pa. Where the name of the deceased is long, it must be put on the stone in a curve, with the rank and name of the State below.

“By order of the Secretary of War:

M. C. MEIGS,
“Quartermaster-General.”

A. No, sir. The only specifications I have received was one telling you the distances from the various points where the cemeteries were. For instance, in New York it would say, Cypress Hill is eight miles from the city.

Q. Well, look at that document and state if your bid would have been any less than it was, if you had received this additional information.—A. [After examining the paper.] Why, yes; my bid provided for the whole name and rank, and here they abbreviate it. Now, for instance, in the word private there would be three letters less than what my bid specified; in Massachusetts, by this abbreviation, there would be several letters less; in lieutenant-colonel there would be a gain of twelve letters. The difference would be considerable, and I could not say exactly what it would be unless I had a full list of the names. They did not furnish us a list of the names at all to go by.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. What is the cost per letter to cut those letters?—A. It costs about seven-eighths of a cent to do it by hand and one-eighth to do it by the sand-blast.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That would have made some reduction in your bid?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In a letter from Charles H. Sheldon, a copy of which has been furnished the committee from the Department, dated October 7, 1873, he says that after diligent inquiry he was unable to find in New York any such firm as Walsh Brothers. Will you state what your firm was at that time?—A. Walsh Brothers.

Q. What amount of business were you doing at that time?—A. Our pay-list at that time amounted to about $10,000 or $12,000 a week for labor.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Were you large importers of marble?—A. We handled principally on commission.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where was your place of business?—A. Our business office is at 333 West street, corner of King, but our marble-yard office is at 52 Corlears street. Our yard is bounded north by Front street; East River, south; west by Corlears street; and east by East River.

Q. This letter states that your bid was made "under cover of some firm dealing wholly in Italian marble."—A. No, sir. It was a square out-and-out bid. There was nobody interested but our concern in the whole thing. It was a legitimate bid.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. How long were you in the city before the bids were opened?—A. I arrived here, I believe, the same morning the bids were opened, or the morning previous, I am not positive.

Q. How were your bids handed in?—A. I went in person, and put them in myself. I was here about three or four days before that to get my samples in, and then went off to New York, and got back either the day before or on the morning of the opening. My bids were in, though, the day before the opening.

Q. How many trips did you make in all to Washington in connection with this matter?—A. About three.

Q. What time was the first trip?—A. About a week or so before the bids were opened, maybe four days. The next was the day before, or the day of the opening, and the next was after the business was done. I came on here to see Belknap about it.

Q. You say that you never saw this circular about reducing the number of bidders before—this change in the specifications?—A. I am positive that I never saw it.

Q. Can you give an approximation of how much less that would have made your bid?—A. [After making a calculation.] I think it would make a difference of about $22,000.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. In making up your bids upon all the cemeteries, did you have correspondence with the various transportation companies relative to the cost of delivering your material at the cemeteries?—A. We had a man on it for about six weeks. Certainly I could not have made up the bids without knowing the cost of transportation.

Q. Did you settle the question of transportation as regards each cemetery?—A. Yes, sir, I have all the papers here now relating to it, and I think I got every cemetery.

Q. How long before the bidding did you complete that investigation?—A. It was some eight or ten days.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. This bid [indicating a certain paper] is the bid of Samuel G. Bridges. You were present at the opening of the bids. State now whether or not that has any resemblance to the paper that you saw taken out of the envelope that was dropped in, in your presence, after the opening had commenced?—A. Positively, no, sir. That can be sworn to by all the other bidders, if they will tell the truth.

Q. Will you state again what the size and dimensions of the paper were that was taken from the envelope that you saw dropped in at 11.13; and whether or not the envelope contained more than one paper?—A. I should think it was a piece of paper ten inches long by seven inches wide.

Q. Was there any other paper attached to it?—A. No, sir.

Q. You remonstrated against the reception of that bid?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you subsequently hear that bid read off?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. By whom was it read?—A. I think by Mr. McGonnigle.

Q. What was the reading of that?—A. That bid furnished the whole cemeteries, as far as I recollect, something like this: "I hereby agree to furnish the seventy-two cemeteries complete for the sum of $900,000."

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Do you recollect the name signed to it?—A. Samuel G. Bridges.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Did not he then proceed to read off another bid taken from the same envelope?—A. No, sir.

Q. You are quite positive about that?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What bid was next opened after that?—A. I cannot say what was the next bid. There was considerable excitement about the one that was dropped in, as I said, and I kept my eye on that.

Q. Do you remember the size of the envelope containing that bid?—A. I should think it was rather larger than the one in your hand. [Referring to an ordinary official envelope.]

Q. Have you tried to refresh your memory about the color of the envelope?—A. Yes, sir; it was a blue envelope.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You recollect that it was a blue envelope?—A. Yes, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 20, 1876.

SAMUEL G. BRIDGES recalled.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. [Exhibiting paper to witness.] Please look at that and say if that is the bid as you made it?—Answer. That is my handwriting. I guess that is the way it was done. I think I testified that I could not say whether it was attached or not; it was on a full sheet.

Q. Is that your bid as you made it?—A. To the best of my recollection I should think it is. Seeing it now, I should say so, with the full sheet of paper.

Q. You made it in the shape it appears here, did you?—A. I retained copies of the bids, as I almost always do, and have those papers at home; and they may throw some light upon the subject, and refresh my memory some; but I should judge, from seeing that, that I must have attached them, and that that is as I made it, but I could not state positively. This was inclosed with the other and considered part and parcel of the same bid. Whether it was attached in that manner I could not state positively now.

Q. Was there more than one copy of the bid in the inclosure?—A. I am not positive whether they required bids in duplicate or triplicate. I conformed fully to the requirements in the advertisement, whatever they were.

Q. [Handing another paper to witness.] Is that your handwriting?—A. That is mine.

Q. That appears to be a bid, does it not?—A. That is my handwriting.

Q. Does that appear to be a bid of the same kind, and made at the same time?—A. Yes, sir; I should suppose so. I have forgotten whether I put it in in duplicate or triplicate. It is sometimes one and sometimes the other.

Q. That is your handwriting, also, is it not?—A. That is my signature.

Q. Will you state how many copies of the small paper containing the bid for the entire work at $900,000 were in that envelope?—A. I conformed to the terms of the advertisement; that is all I can state. The papers were in duplicate, or whatever they required; that is the best of my memory.

Q. Then, if the bids for the grave-stones to be furnished at the different cemeteries, stating the amount for each, were in duplicate or triplicate, do you mean to be understood that the bid to perform all the work for $900,000 was in duplicate or triplicate, also?—A. To the best of my knowledge and recollection.

Q. I hold in my hand two papers, marked A and B, to which your name is signed, and which you say is in your handwriting. Will you please to state if the small bid attached to each, offering to do the work for $900,000, and signed Sam. G. Bridges, is in your handwriting also?—A. I have not stated that they were both in my handwriting. One shows for itself that it is a true copy.

Q. Are the two bids marked A and B signed by yourself for the grave-stones at the different cemeteries the two original bids which you put in at the letting?—A. I suppose them to be. I have put in no bids since of that kind.

Q. The two papers for the work at the different cemeteries appear to be signed by you. Are the signatures genuine?—A. They are my signatures; they are genuine.

Q. Are they the bids that you make for the work, or are they not?—A. They are a part of the bids made for the work.

Q. What other part was there to the bid made for the work than that which appears in this paper?—A. None but what appears in this paper.

Q. Then what do you mean by saying they are a part of the bid made for the work?—A. That part of the bid to do the whole of the work for $900,000 was the basis upon which the work was awarded. The contract awarded to me was for about 48,500 head-stones. I have purchased the contracts of others, and to-day have erected or have in transit about 130,000 out of the 250,000. I think this ought to be sufficient on the subject of all those points in question, that I have executed that part for which I executed bond to the United States.

Q. I have not called your attention to the contracts at this time, but to the bids you made for the work. I ask you now if you put in as many separate bids to do the work for $900,000 as you did separate bids to do the work, naming for what you would perform the work, at fifty-six separate cemeteries?—A. My bid for $900,000 was to cover all the cemeteries, and do all the work, as per advertisement.

[Question was read to the witness.] A. To the best of my knowledge I put in as many, understanding that if the bids were in duplicate, the separate bids were in duplicate, and the proposal for $900,000 was in duplicate.

Q. Then, if the bids upon the paper prepared naming different cemeteries, and put in by you, were in triplicate, your bid to do the work for $900,000 was put in in triplicate also, was it?—A. To the best of my knowledge it was conforming to the terms of the advertisement.

Q. Do you recollect now where you wrote the bid for $900,000?—A. In Washington to the best of my recollection.

Q. Have you no recollection of writing more than one copy of it?—A. My recollection is that I conformed to the terms of the advertisement, whatever they were.

Q. Did the bid for $900,000, as it appears here, in which you say, "Will furnish all the slabs, and all the blocks advertised for, for the sum of nine hundred thousand dollars, ($900,000.) (Signed) Samuel G. Bridges," and without date, comply with the terms of the advertisement?—A. I so considered that I conformed to the terms of the advertisement.

Q. Was it so treated by the officers who opened the bids?—A. I never heard anything to the contrary.

Q. Which did you consider your bid—the one to do all the work for $900,000, or the other bid which was made upon the papers prepared, and in which you state that you will do the work for each of the cemeteries?—A. I executed a bond to comply with the terms of either, leaving the Quartermaster's Department to decide the question as to which proposition would be accepted.

Q. Did you say so in the bid, when you made it?—A. I considered that the papers would show for themselves.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Did the Quartermaster-General so decide? If not, who did?—A. I never knew anything about any decision until I received a letter submitting the proposition, or asking me if I would accept 35,000 or about 35,000 stones at my price, $3.56. Am not able to give the exact wording of that communication without reference.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Which bid was that?—A. On that proposition for $900,000 for the entire work.

Q. You have stated the amount of work you have done. Will you please state the amount of money you have drawn?—A. It would be impossible to state that without reference to the books.

Q. Can you state an approximation?—A. I cannot from any knowledge I have, without reference to the books.

Q. Have you received the pay for all the work you have done?—A. All the completed work, according to the terms of the contract.

Q. How much of the work is completed according to the terms of the contract?—A. In the vicinity of 110,000, the remainder being in transit, scattered all the way from Vermont to the cemeteries.

Q. Is any per cent. kept back on the stones furnished?—A. Ten per cent.

Q. Are you paid when the stones are delivered, or when they are shipped?—A. On delivery at the cemeteries, only.

Q. How many have been delivered and set up?—A. In the vicinity of 110,000.

Q. How many head-stones were to be supplied?—A. Two hundred and fifty-three thousand and eighty-eight is the approximate number.

Q. In determining the amount that you were to supply, how was the price fixed?—A. The blocks on Sage's contract were to be delivered and set in the ground for $2.42 apiece; slabs for my portion of the contract, at $3.56 each; for that part which Mr. Morgan had, $3.40 each; the portion of Mr. Jones, at $3.39 each. The cemeteries are named in each contract.

Q. Would that make the total amount to be paid $900,000?—A. It would make $763,767.11, as the awards were made.

Q. Had the amount of your bid anything to do with fixing the amount that you were to receive for this work?—A. It had, so far as the 48,500 awarded to me was concerned.

Q. Then, in fixing the contract for you, the Quartermaster-General first took out the amount for which the blocks were to be furnished, the one-third of the contract which was awarded for 16 cents less than you would perform it, and the one-third of the contract which was awarded for 17 cents less than you would perform it, and deducted this amount from your bid of $900,000, and gave you the balance for the work you contracted for, did he?—A. I was not aware of any fixing up for me, but Mr. Sage bid $2.42 for the blocks, giving him the blocks at $2.42, and dividing the slabs between the three parties that they were awarded to, made a saving to the Government of about $136,000 less than the $900,000 bid.

Q. If the contract for the head-stones had been let to the lowest responsible bidder, as the contract for the blocks were let, how much of a saving would that have been to the Government upon the contract?—A. $25,107.98, presuming Mr. Jones to have been the lowest responsible bidder.

Q. Who was the lowest responsible bidder for the entire contract?—A. According to my understanding, Charles S. Jones was the lowest bidder for white marble. That is what the specifications called for. Am not prepared to state about his responsibility.

Q. How much less than your bid was his in the whole amount?

The WITNESS. Slabs and blocks?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the whole bid.

A. $42,023.26.

Q. Whose was the next lowest bid?—A. There were none lower for white marble.

Q. How much was his less than yours for the whole amount, slabs and blocks?—A. Cannot answer.

Q. Was there a bid to furnish the stones of granite?—A. There were bids of that kind.

Q. Whose bids were those?—A. I could not state.

Q. Was B. B. Bowers, of Keokuk, a bidder?—A. His name was not called among the bids, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Was he a bidder, or in any way interested, in any bid that was made?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Are you acquainted with him?—A. I am.

Q. Do you know of his having a bid prepared?—A. I do not. He said to me that he was not a bidder; I was surprised to see him in the office; he was the only person present I knew.

Q. Did you have any talk with him at Keokuk upon the subject?—A. Not a word that I remember of.

Q. Was Mr. S. Belknap, of Louisville, a bidder?—A. I would not be able to state without reference to my memoranda, which I took at the time; I have no recollection of such a name.

Q. Do you know him?—A. I do not.

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. You made two propositions to the Quartermaster-General, one in detail at certain fixed prices for each cemetery, and one in gross for the entire amount, did you not?—A. I considered them one and the same. They were inclosed together, and I had one bond to cover them both.

Q. You made, then, did you not, two forms of propositions?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was either of those propositions accepted by the Department?—A. Those that were awarded to me were on my propositions.

Q. Just answer the question. Was either of those propositions, as you made them, accepted by the Department?—A. Not as a whole. I received a portion on the basis of $900,000 for the whole. I did not get the entire contract at $900,000, but only a portion at that rate.

Q. Did you ever make any other proposals except those two?—A. Have proposed since to do the work of other contractors at their prices, should they fail to do it.

Q. Then neither of your proposals, as you made them, was accepted by the Department, was it?—A. Not entire—only as above; they seldom are. In bidding on contracts, they are frequently divided; the best interest of the Government is generally consulted. It was certainly so in this case, in my judgment.

Q. Was there any reservation in the notice by the Department in which the Government reserved the right to accept part of any bid and exclude part of any bid?—A. I have bid on several contracts, and never bid on any, except with the understanding that the Government reserved the right to reject any or all bids.

Q. Then the fact of this case is, that none of the proposals made by any of the bidders were accepted to the extent the proposals covered?—A. Except in the case of blocks. Mr. Sage received the contract for all the blocks, at $2.42.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What, if anything, induced the giving to you of one-third of the slabs at a price of $25,000 more than the one-third that was given to Jones?—A. I would not be able to answer any more than I have heretofore. I know of none, except what I have given, and that is merely hearsay.

Q. They were required to perform the work in the same manner that you were, were they not?—A. The contracts were precisely alike.

Q. And you were given the same amount of work?—A. No, sir; I have stated one-third. It was substantially, that I received about 48,000, and they received about 49,000 each. It was impossible to divide it exactly.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. You bid upon fifty-six cemeteries at different prices per slab at these different cemeteries. By averaging the prices of all, I find the average prices was $4.91¹⁴/₁₀₀. The price at which you were awarded the contract was $3.56. What induced you to reduce your price per slab $1.35 each in your bid of $900,000?—A. I did not reduce that amount; it was reduced by the proposition. In bidding on the separate cemeteries in the manner in which I did, I was not aware but what a portion might be awarded to me. I might have been lower in some instances than other bidders, and I might have a few cemeteries awarded to me, and might get those that would be very expensive to reach, but in bidding for the whole work, I could average that, and do it for very much less by making one round bid for the whole amount. I had the same principle in my mind at the time as to the freights—that I could get better rates of freight if I had a large amount of freight to carry than if I had a small amount. That was my reason for bidding much less on the total amount than I would on a few of the cemeteries.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Why do you say that it was for the best interests of the Government to divide this work and give you a portion of it, and these other two gentlemen, Morgan and Jones, another portion of it, when the bids of either of these gentlemen were forty-odd thousand dollars less than yours?—A. In making that remark it was in reference to giving Mr. Sage the blocks at his price, viz, $2.42, and the slabs at another price instead of giving the slabs and blocks to Mr. Jones. The question was asked by the gentleman, "Why did not Mr. Jones get them all?" If the entire contract had been awarded to Jones at his price, viz, $3.39 each for slabs and blocks, the amount would have been about $860,000; but by giving Sage the blocks at $2.42 each, and awarding the slabs as it was done, the awards amounted to $763,967.11, saving to Government $96,000.

Q. You say that it was for the best interests of the Government to divide this work between you three?—A. You understand me. If the contract had been awarded to Jones at $3.39 for slabs and blocks, it would have been less than Sage's bid at $5 for slabs and $2.42 for blocks, but by giving Sage all the blocks at $2.42 and the slabs as awarded, it was a saving to the Government of about $94,000.

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. Please state in what way you arrived at the price of $3.56 for your head-stones.—

A. By dividing the $900,000 bid for the whole work by the total number of head-stones, slabs, and blocks, namely, 253,088. By reference to my copy-books, memorandums, and papers, could perhaps refresh my memory on some points. But have testified to the best of my recollection without such reference.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1876.

CHARLES F. BENJAMIN sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. I reside in Washington; I am chief clerk of the Southern Claims Commission, and was formerly a clerk in the office of the Secretary of War.

Q. What, if anything, do you know of the matter of the letting of the contract to furnish soldiers' gravestones?—A. I know that in 1872 an act of Congress was passed requiring the Secretary of War to do certain things in that direction, and at about the time the proposals that had been invited under that act were to be opened, a gentleman from New York, 429 West Fourteenth street, named John A. Eagleson, of the firm of Eagleson & DeVeau, called on me with a letter of introduction from Colonel Kilburn Knox, an ex-officer of the Army, who had been on duty in the War Department at the time I was there. He told me that he was a bidder or an intending bidder on this contract, and did not know anybody here, and had been told by Colonel Knox that I probably knew all the officers that were connected with this matter, and might be able to give him information. I told him I should be very happy to do so, and gave him simply information that I had heard, as for instance, the preferences for different kinds of stone, and so on. I did nothing of consequence for him at that time. The bids were opened, and on account of an insufficiency of appropriation, and also of certain imperfections in the law, nothing was done about it, and the matter ended for that time. The next year Congress passed another law, and proposals were again invited. Mr. Eagleson and his partner, Mr. DeVeau, had been here several times in the interim on their way to and from the South, where they had a large business with marble-dealers there, and generally stopped in to see me. They desired to go into the bids the second time. There seemed to have been a great deal of gossip in the mean time, and they were in doubt as to the sincerity of this thing. They told me that they had spent a great deal of money to get information on which to make their former bids; that they had to write to all the transportation companies in the country and spend money to get friends to go and get information about the location of the cemeteries, and so on, and they were not disposed to go into it a second time unless there was going to be a contract given, nor unless it was going to be given out fairly. I told them that, so far as General Meigs was concerned, I was satisfied that it would be fairly done, and that, as I was quite intimate with the Secretary of War, I would go and see him, and tell him frankly just how they felt about this thing, that they would like to go into it, but wanted to be assured that it was going to be a fair thing. I went up and saw General Belknap, and told him that these parties were friends of mine, (which they were, for I had got to be intimate with them in the mean time;) that they had control of a stone that had been very largely used for cemetery purposes; that it was not a mere experiment, as nine-tenths of the stones offered were, and that their facilities were such that they felt that if the contract was fairly given out they could get a part of it; and that they wanted me to find out about it, and I told him I knew it was rather a delicate question to answer, but that he and I were friends, and he probably knew whether the law was so framed that there would be a contract, and I felt satisfied, or least I supposed, so far as he was concerned, it would be altogether fair. He said, "Yes; you know what the law is, and I intend to comply with the law. If your friends put in the lowest bid and furnish good stone, they will get the contract; if anybody else does the same they will get it." I said, "That is all I want to know." Then I stepped into the adjoining room where Colonel Mack, who was then inspector of cemeteries, was. He was an old acquaintance of mine in the War Department, and I repeated about the same thing to him, and talked to him generally about the subject, and saw that his preference was for either marble or granite; that he did not consider any of the other stones desirable for cemeterial use. That was the general opinion among them all, and I either told my friends or wrote them (I cannot remember which, they were here so much) that I thought they might go ahead; told them what General Belknap had told me; that he was going to give out the contract, and that the lowest bidder who complied with the conditions of the law should have it. I also told them that the preference at Washington was decidedly for marble or granite, and that I did not think any other stone would be considered, and I also told them, what I had heard in talking about the thing with various people, that I did not believe any contract would be given out for Italian marble, because there seemed to be an idea that it would offend public sentiment, no matter how cheap it might be furnished; that the people wanted American marble put over their soldiers' graves; which was all in their interest, as they were handling American marble. I then suggested that, as the choice seemed to lie between granite and marble, they should get together all the reliable information they could as to the preference for marble over granite and send it to me, and I would make it into a sort of pamphlet for them, which they could address to the Secretary of War, and also use as a sort of advertisement. They liked the idea very much, and I drew up a letter of inquiry which they sent out to dealers, and from that I made up a pamphlet addressed to the Secretary of War. I have a copy of it here, and will leave it with the committee. I gave a copy to General Belknap, and he told me some time subsequent that he had read it, and Colonel Mack was also pleased, and said it contained a good deal of information. Then the time came near when the bids were to be opened. My two friends were both here and found that there was a great deal of gossip going on, I could not begin to repeat one-tenth of it—all sorts of things, and as they were not used to transacting business at Washington, they were more or less affected by the talk they heard about the Ebbitt House and other hotels of this or that combination and what this man said, and what that man said, and I tried to re-enforce their confidence. Said I, "If General Meigs has the disposition of this, and I don't see how they can take it out of his hands, it is all going to be done with fairness, and as for General Belknap, I believe he will be as fair as the other." Said I, "I don't expect that there is going to be any jobbery." What they feared was that there was to be jobbery and political influence, bribery, and all sorts of things of that kind. About a couple of days before the bids were opened one of them came to me and said that he had been over to Baltimore the night before on the New York train, and on the train he saw the Secretary of War and a man named Bridges, who, he was told, was from Keokuk, and he said some stone-men had said that Bridges was on here with reference to this contract. I said, "I don't think that can be. Why, Bridges is a jeweler at Keokuk; he has got nothing to do with the stone business. I remember seeing a store of his a year or two ago when I was out there, and I have seen his advertisement in the papers of Keokuk; he is probably a friend of the Secretary's; if he is the only person you are afraid of you need not mind him." So the thing dropped for a moment, but he came to me again about Bridges. I said, "I have been in the War Department a long time, and I never knew a contract to be given out except to a man in the business, and with all these stone-men, with their Senators and Congressmen to work for them, I do not think there is any fear of that." The bids were opened, and my friends took notes of all the bids as they were opened. They then went away. It took some time to make up the schedules in the Quartermaster-General's Office, and I used to drop in (I knew everybody there) to find out how they were getting along with making up the list to go to the War Department, and they would tell me how it was progressing. Finally, it went up, and my friends got alarmed; they told me that they were sure there was something going on that was wrong; and then they went on to tell me that, at the prices and with the kind of stone they wanted to put in, (the samples were there,) there was really no profit in the contract, but that they were anxious to get it or as much of it as they could, because it would help their standing as business men. I said to them, "If you are very anxious to get it, and you are afraid that some sinister influence is at work, I will tell you what I would do if I were you." Said I, "I don't want you to do it, but I will tell it to you, and you can do so if you please. There is a man here who is very intimate with the Secretary of War, and I think his business is really getting matters through the War Department. His name is General E. W. Rice. I know General Rice personally, and if you would like to employ him—I do not advise you to do it, I do not know that it will do any good, I don't like to give that kind of advice any way—but you want to get the contract, or at least to be on a footing with everybody else, and if you think well of it, after a talk with your partner, (I do not know which one was here at that time,) I will go and find out from General Rice whether he is interested in this matter in any way, and if he is not I will ask him to take charge of your case and advocate it before the War Department.” So they concluded that they would get me to do it. I went to Mr. Rice, and I asked him if he had any interest of any sort in this head-stone contract then pending. He said, “None in the world,” and I answered, “I am very glad to hear it, because some friends of mine in New York who are bidders on this thing, and who, I am satisfied in my own mind, have got the best bid, taking prices and materials together, are very anxious to get the contract, and they think some influence is wanted, and they would like to have you take charge of their business for them and do whatever you properly can.” He said he should be very happy to, and he asked me what their names were, what quarry the stone was from; I told him the West Rutland Quarries, and he mentioned that he had lately been up there on a visit when he was off summering, and that it was a very interesting place, and he showed me some photographs he had of it. I went over the matter very fully, telling him that this stone was known generally as the cemeterial stone, that it was quarried expressly for cemeterial purposes, and that it was not an untried thing. I think he took a memorandum, and he told me he would see what could be done about it. I saw him a few days afterward and he told me that he had made some inquiries—he gave me to understand that he had done something, and then he asked me what these parties were prepared to pay in the way of a fee for his services. I told him I did not know, but I would find out. I told them of this, I do not know whether verbally or by letter, and that led them into figuring what would be the maximum cost, supposing they got the contract, and if I recollect right, they found out that the maximum profit, supposing they met with no delays or disasters, would not be over $8,000 on the whole contract. So they said to me, “You see, Benjamin, we cannot give much, there is no margin here; if we get this contract all the profits that we get out of it will be the help to our standing as business men,” and they told me that they were willing to pay Mr. Rice $5,000 for his services if the contract was awarded to them. I went to Mr. Rice and I told him that, and he said that it was no kind of a consideration at all; that here was a contract involving a million dollars; that a great many people were after it, and it was a big thing financially and in a business point of view, and that it would require a great deal of influence and a great deal of hard work, and $5,000 was no kind of consideration and he would not listen to it. I asked him what he would listen to, and he did not say exactly, but he said that $5,000 was not worth beginning to talk about. Knowing that my friends had not any more margin than the $3,000, I told them of this and they dropped the thing. The next I heard was, I went over in the Quartermaster-General's Office and somebody told me that the contract had been given out to Bridges, the Keokuk man. Said I, “Who gave it to him, the Quartermaster-General?” He said, “No; it was done up at the War Department.” I said “Bridges is not a stoneman, he is a jeweler.” I thought at first it was a mistake; I did not believe it at the time; and then I went to a gentleman from Keokuk and asked him if Bridges was a quarry-man, or knew anything about quarries or stone, and he said “No.” Said I, “He has got the contract for those head-stones.” He smiled, and there the thing ended. Eagleson and DeVeau came along from time to time, on their way to visit their customers in the South. I had in the mean time heard that a man named Thomas P. Morgan, who had been some sort of a trader here and failed, had got part of that contract, and also a man named Jones, who had been an Indian trader. On one of their visits to Washington my friends told me that these parties had been to see them and various other marble-men, and that they were trying to find out the cheapest kind of stone they could get. Said I, “That sort of thing won't do. If they have got the contract they must have to furnish the particular kind of stone they bid on.” Said he, “Their contract calls for marble, and now they are trying to get the cheapest thing they can to put in under that name.” I said, “It looks to me very much like a job, and if I were you, after spending all this money in getting the matter up, I would get some of my friends to have this thing looked into.” They said they did not know how they were going to make it pay to do that, that it did look like a job, but they did not propose to fight the Government; so the thing dropped. From that time when they would come on, on their way to the South, they seemed to have kept well posted about it, and they would tell me that the contract had been modified, that they had reduced the size of the stones, reduced the depth of the lettering, and reduced the thickness of the stone; and by that time I came to the conclusion that somebody was being swindled. Really that is about all I know of it. When these gentlemen drew up their bid, I helped them to put it in proper shape, and I think I took my friend around to the Quartermaster-General and introduced him, and he left his bid there in a sealed envelope.

Q. Do you know of any samples being there from Bridges before the opening of the bids?—A. I don't think there were any samples there from Mr. Bridges. My recollection is that we went around to see, after my friends had told me that Mr. Bridges was with the Secretary of War, and that we saw none. I cannot say how long it was before the opening; it may have been one or two mornings, or it may have been the very same morning, because they did not come on until the bids were about ready to be opened. There was one young man, Mr. Meyers, who had charge of the samples. He has since been employed in the board of audit here. He used to show me every new sample that came in as a matter of curiosity, and some of them we had a good laugh at.

By Mr. STRAIT :

Q. Do you know the amount of these gentlemen's bids?—A. It was something within $1,000,000.

Q. You do not know just the amount?—A. No; my recollection is that it came somewhere about $800,000 or $900,000; it may have been over that or under it.

Q. Do you know in fact whether there were not bids lower than theirs?—A. That I do not remember. It has passed out of my memory. I have never had it recalled from that time to this. I was confident of their success, not so much on their being the lowest bidder, as on the ground that the stone they offered, and the price taken together, if within the $1,000,000, would carry the contract. The stone was a very handsome one.

Q. But you don't know whether they were the lowest bidder or not?—A. No, sir; I do not. I know there was a schedule of the bids drawn up in the Quartermaster-General's Office, which would show.

Q. They must have notified you, or you must have had some conversation with them, as to whether their bid was the lowest or not?—A. I remember that after the bids were opened they came and sat down at my table and looked over the list, and probably at that time I did know that they were not the lowest bidders. My impression is that they were not; but I know they were within the $1,000,000.

By Mr. TERRY :

Q. Have you ever seen the marble that is being used by Bridges?—A. No, sir; I never have. My friends, on one or two occasions when they have stopped to see me, have spoken disparagingly of it.

Q. You are not able to compare it with the marble that these gentlemen were to furnish?—A. No, sir; I have never seen it. I was told the other day that some of the stones were here in the city now being inscribed. As late as Monday morning last they were on a vacant lot on Rhode Island avenue, that a friend of mine owns, and he told me he was going to build there and that he had notified them to take them off. Said I, "They are investigating these things now, and you ought to tell somebody." They were cutting for some place in Texas, I understood. I am not positive that $8,000 was the margin of profit my friends figured out on the whole contract, nor that $5,000 was the fee tendered General Rice. The margin may have been more and the fee less, but those are the sums that suggested themselves to my memory in testifying on those points, and I think them right because they did so come into my mind. I now distinctly remember going to the lower room in the Quartermaster-General's Office, where the stones were on exhibition, and from the crowd gathering about the place, I feel confident it must have been the very morning the bids were opened, and before the opening. I remember some samples had just come in and were being opened by the laborers, and somebody was remarking about their being nearly too late. There were two or three boxes, I think, and I did not stay long enough to see them set up. If any of these were the samples of Mr. Bridges, that would account for my not seeing them. Again, I think a few of the samples were not so marked as to show the names of the bidders, but only marked to connect them with the samples. There were very few of these, however, if any.

WASHINGTON, March 24, 1876.

GEORGE A. MEYER sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. 820 Twentieth street Washington.

Q. What is your business?—A. I am a clerk in the auditor's office of the District of Columbia.

Q. What, if anything, do you know of the grave-stone contract, so called?—A. I do not know anything of the grave-stone contract whatever. I know the preparatory steps that led to the contract, but I was removed from the office that I held as clerk in charge of national cemeteries about ten days before the bids were opened.

Q. Why were you removed?—A. A new officer had been appointed over me, and he found some fault with the company I was seeking. I had been seen in a restaurant with a contractor for stone walls for cemeteries, and he positively forbade me having any acquaintance with any contractors whatever, which I resented, telling him I should choose my own company. He reported me to the Quartermaster-General for dismissal; but General Meigs preferred to transfer me to another branch, I having been in charge of the national cemeteries from 1866 to 1873.

Q. Do you know the parties to whom the contract or any part of it was let?—A. I only know one of the parties personally, Thomas P. Morgan. I have heard the names of others.

Q. Have you any personal acquaintance with any of the inspectors of grave-stones?—A. I know Mr. George D. Chenoweth. I came in contact with Mr. Robins and Mr. Clark while they were preparing themselves to go out as engineers.

Q. What, if anything, do you know of the bad conduct of these inspectors?—A. I know that Mr. Chenoweth received from Mr. John C. Comfort a gold watch.

Q. What Comfort—a contractor?—A. Yes, sir; he was a contractor for stone walls. That watch was received as a loan for ninety-nine years. I know that he, Chenoweth, attempted to borrow money from Mr. Comfort, and that Chenoweth had Comfort pay his hotel bill for him at Richmond, Va., and at Fort Monroe, Old Point Comfort.

Q. State the circumstances about the watch, as you remember them; where they occurred, and all you know about the matter.—A. I was present in a room at the Metropolitan Hotel, in this city, when Mr. Comfort came in with the watch. It was in Mr. Comfort's room. He went out of the room, came back some time after, and threw a box over to Mr. Chenoweth, telling him he would make him a loan of it for ninety-nine years. On opening the box it was found to contain a gold watch; Mr. Chenoweth accepted it. I afterward asked Comfort where he bought it. He told me at a jeweler's under the Metropolitan Hotel. Mr. Chenoweth carried the watch for quite a length of time afterward. And Mr. Comfort afterward called my attention to the fact that Chenoweth had brought it back to the jeweler's where it was bought, and that it was there then. Mr. Comfort and I called at the jewelry store, and I asked if the watch was there. It was there; and the jeweler said Chenoweth would probably not take it back because it had been smashed up, and the expense was some eighteen dollars. I do not think he has taken it out since, although I do not know.

Q. State what you know, if anything, about these circumstances having come to the knowledge of the officers in charge of cemeteries?—A. I saw a copy of a report made by Mr. Comfort in regard to the matter, but I do not know, of my own knowledge, that anything was done in regard to it.

Q. Is Mr. Chenoweth still an inspector?—A. I believe so. I understand that he has been transferred West within a few days.

Q. State what you know, if anything, of Mr. Chenoweth having inspected the work of Mr. Comfort, the man who presented him with the watch.—A. It was one of his duties to inspect Comfort's work.

Q. What were the circumstances under which Mr. Comfort paid Mr. Chenoweth's hotel bill?—A. Mr. Chenoweth had been sent over there to inspect certain work that had been done at the national cemeteries around Richmond, Va., and had prepared his reports. Mr. Comfort was anxious to leave Richmond and have him go to Fortress Monroe, where the officer paying the certificates was stationed; but Mr. Chenoweth was not in any hurry to go away, and said he had no money to get away with, but if he would pay the hotel bills he would go that night. Mr. Comfort then paid the bills.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Have you given a history of the head-stone business so far as you know it? If not, commence and give an outline of your knowledge of the business.—A. If you will allow me to refresh myself by referring to one of the first reports made on the subject I will do so. The first mention of head-stones was in the act of February 22, 1867, prescribing that an iron or stone head-stone should be placed over the graves of deceased Union soldiers. An appropriation was made in that act of $750,000, which, however, was expended without any head-stones being erected, any walls built, or any lodges built. In November, 1867, proposals were advertised for the erection of iron head-blocks according to a pattern adopted by the Quartermaster-General. Bids came in to the number, if I am not mistaken, of 115. The lowest bid was for $1.16 and a fraction over, from Messrs. Strong & Donohoe, of this city; but the contract was not awarded, and a suit was instituted in the Court of Claims against the United States, in which the contractors failed. In 1872 General Stoughton introduced a bill in the House of Representatives for the erection of soldiers' head-stones, and a provision was made appropriating $200,000 for that purpose. That was afterward changed by the appropriation act of June 10, or June 22, 1872. That was the Army appropriation bill. A clause was introduced appropriating $1,000,000 for marble or granite head-stones. Bids were then solicited for such stones, without any design or without any specification being prepared. A great number of bids were received, and a great number of samples also were received of various patterns; so many that the Secretary of War and Quartermaster-General could not decide upon which to adopt. No contract was therefore awarded. Preparations were then made for having bids according to a specified design and specification. Designs were prepared and forwarded to the Quartermaster-General with specifications. Proposals were advertised for bids, and within ten days before the opening of the bids I was removed from the office. I know nothing since that except from hearsay. I remained in the office until the 1st of July, 1874, when I was summarily discharged by the Secretary of War, who declined to various members of Congress to assign any reason except that he did not want me.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. What is your business now?—A. I am a clerk in the office of the auditor of the District of Columbia. I am not in the service of the Government at all.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Chenoweth ever returned the money, or was expected to return the money, that was paid for his board?—A. I do not.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Mr. Chenoweth in regard to this watch? Did he ever tell you that he had returned it?—A. I asked him on one occasion whether he was going to get his watch back, and he said yes, that it was only there for repairs.

Q. Do you know whether or not he has ever got it back?—A. I do not. The last time I was in the store it was there still. That was some two months ago.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. When was this watch given to him?—A. Some time in June or July, 1873.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. The watch has been there some two or three years?—A. It has been there now some eighteen months or two years.

Q. Do you know whether or not there was ever any money paid to Chenoweth, or any other consideration, beside the watch and this board-bill that you speak of as having been paid for him?—A. No, sir; I do not.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Have you any knowledge at all of any of the proceedings connected with the contracts, or the execution of the contracts, for the purpose of putting up these stones?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Do you know whether the attention of the Department officers—General Belknap, or any other officers—was ever called to the fact of this man's receiving the watch?—A. Nothing, except having seen a copy of the charges made by Mr. Comfort against Mr. Chenoweth.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. What do you mean by a copy of the charges?—A. He had prepared a letter and kept a press-copy. It was a very long letter, in which he stated all his grievances, and complained about the manner in which he had been treated by Mr. Chenoweth, and incidentally spoke about the watch.

Q. About having given him a watch?—A. About having given him a watch and having paid his board-bill.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Who was that letter addressed to?—A. It was directed to W. W. Belknap, Secretary of War.

Q. Is Chenoweth still in the service of the Government as an inspector?—A. So I believe.

Q. Do you know whether those charges were ever investigated or not?—A. I do not, except by hearsay.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. About what time was that letter preferring charges against Mr. Chenoweth written?—A. It was some time about the spring of 1874, or perhaps the summer of 1874. It was before I was finally discharged from the Quartermaster-General's Office.

Q. This watch was still at the jeweler's in the name of Chenoweth after that letter was written?—A. Yes, sir; the jeweler declined to deliver the watch to Mr. Comfort, because it was in the name of Mr. Chenoweth.

Q. It was still held as the property of Chenoweth?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. Do you know of any other inspector who received any gifts in any way?—A. No, sir; I wish the committee to understand that, while I am testifying against Mr. Chenoweth, I have always held very friendly relations with him, and do still.

Q. Have you ever had any conversation with him in regard to the matter of this watch and the payment of his board-bill?—A. None, except what I have detailed.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Q. Do you know anything about the origin of the pattern for these head-stones, their style, and so forth?—A. It is impressed upon my mind that the design was prepared upon a large sheet of brown paper by a certain firm of the name of Bridges & Richardson.

Q. How did you arrive at that information or impression?—A. It is simply memory on my part. The designs are still, or should still be, in the Office of the Quartermaster-General.

Q. About what time, according to your recollection, did the matter come to your knowledge?—A. That would have been in July, 1873.

Q. Did the pattern or patterns come directly to the Quartermaster-General's Office, or from the War Department to the Quartermaster-General's Office?—A. The designs, not the patterns, came from the Secretary of War to the Quartermaster-General's Office. I believe a pattern was made in this city; and, if I am not much mistaken, it was made by a man named Middleton.

Q. Do you know at whose expense these stones are now being set up, whether by the contractor, or at the expense of the Government—I mean as to their being set in the ground at the cemeteries?—A. The specifications call for the stones being set in the ground; but I was told this morning, by one of the examiners of money-accounts in the Quartermaster-General's Office, that a great deal of the money out of the appropriation for head-stones was being paid to clerks, and agents, and laborers setting the stones. I started at that, and asked him if he was certain that it was paid to laborers, knowing, as I did, that the specifications expressly called for the stones set in the ground. He said he was very sure that a great deal of money was eaten up in that way.

Q. State the name of the clerk who gave you that information.—A. J. S. Franklin.

By Mr. TERRY :

Q. Do you mean to say that whatever money was paid, as you have just been speaking of, is over and above the amount agreed to be paid upon the laying of these head-stones, in this contract of Bridges and others?—A. I mean to say that it is taken out of that $1,000,000—paid by the Government officers directly. That is my understanding of it. I do not know it of my own knowledge.

By Mr. STRAIT :

Q. Where can that clerk be found?—A. He is a clerk in the Quartermaster-General's Office.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Q. State whether the clerical labor of keeping the accounts of this head-stone business is performed by clerks of the Quartermaster's Department, or by clerks appointed for this purpose.—A. Not by clerks of the Quartermaster-General's Office, but by clerks in the Quartermaster's Department, appointed by the officers in charge. While the civil-service rules existed, they were not required to pass any examination, but were simply appointed and took their places.

Q. Could that labor, from your knowledge of the clerical force of the Quartermaster-General's Office, be performed by the regular corps of clerks there?—Q. It has been done before, and I think it could be done now.

Q. Do you know how many newly-appointed clerks there are for this head-stone business?—A. I am not positive. I have understood that there are three chief clerks, one chief clerk of correspondence, one financial chief clerk, and one chief clerk of records, and that there are six civil engineers and nine clerks. I have looked at the register for 1876, under the name of Captain Rockwell, and also looked through the whole Quartermaster's Department records, and I do not find any of the engineers reported in the register. I find these three chief clerks, and, I believe, six other clerks. I find the names of clerks employed by Captain A. F. Rockwell: Charles E. Fishers, $150 per month; Walter Woolcott, $150 per month; John G. Washburn, $150 per month; O. M. Rosser, $125 per month; C. E. Miller, $125 per month; W. E. Prescott, $100 per month; C. Hellyer, $100 per month; T. W. Hughes, $100 per month; J. C. Devantier, $85 per month. That makes nine clerks. Not one of the engineers' names appears upon the books.

Q. How many engineers did you say there were?—A. Six.

Q. They are all selected from civil life?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How do the salaries of the clerks in this service compare with those in the Quartermaster-General's Office?—A. They are naturally higher, because they are not governed by law.

By Mr. TERRY :

Q. Out of what fund are they paid?—A. A portion are paid out of the appropriation for head-stones; some are paid out of the fund for contingent or incidental expenses of the Quartermaster-General's Department, and part are paid out of the appropriation for national cemeteries.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. When you were in charge as the principal clerk of that service, what was your salary per month?—A. $116.66 per month, or $1,400 per annum. When I first came in there were several clerks, but during the last years, from 1869 to 1873, there was only one clerk and one messenger beside myself.

Q. What did the messenger get?—A. He received $60, and the clerk received $100, per month.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Did you perform all the duties there that are now performed by these clerks?—A. I cannot say what additional duties have been added to the office. The other clerk, myself, and the messenger performed all the duties pertaining to the cemeteries. It was part then of the Quartermaster-General's Office.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. What are the duties which are performed in that office in relation to this cemetery business?—A. I cannot say what the duties are now. I can tell you what they were. They were the general supervision and maintenance of cemeteries, looking over all the expenditures of money, directing all repairs, the erection of new buildings, walls, grading, sewers, drainage, planting, &c.

Q. That has all been completed, has it?—A. I think not.

Q. Do you know what the salary of these engineers was?—A. One receives $300 per month and his expenses, too. The others receive $150 per month and expenses paid.

Q. Who has charge of that work now?—A. Capt. A. F. Rockwell.

Q. Has Captain McGonnigle anything to do with it?—A. No, sir; he was there previous to the time Captain Rockwell was there. He is not there now; he is stationed at New Orleans.

Q. When was Captain McGonnigle relieved?—A. I have no recollection. It was since the contract for head-stones was let out a considerable time. I think he was relieved about the 1st of January, 1875. I am not positive of that, however.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Do you think there was any economy in turning out the clerks who had intimate acquaintance with this business, at a salary of $1,200 and $1,400 a year, and the appointment of new clerks without any experience at $1,800 a year?—A. It is very natural that I should not think so. My own interests were affected by the change.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Did you perform your duty faithfully as a clerk?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there any reason for discharging you?—A. None whatever, that I know of. I received a letter from General Meigs after I left saying that I was a very competent clerk.

By Mr. STRAIT:

Q. What is the name of this officer receiving $3,600 a year?—A. A Mr. Galt; I am not positive as to his first name.

Mr. TERRY. As I asked you in regard to the faithful performance of your duties, it might perhaps be proper for me to enter with the testimony the conclusion of the report of Charles William Folsom, brevet colonel and assistant quartermaster of volunteers, in charge of cemeteries. It is as follows, [reading from the Report of the Quartermaster-General of 1868:]

"In concluding this report I would respectfully bear cordial testimony to the value of the services of the gentlemen who have been connected with this branch as clerks, particularly those of Mr. George A. Meyer, whose methodical habits and clear and intelligent head have kept the work and files of the branch in excellent condition, and to whose industry this report owes much of its value."

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. Has the administration of this cemetery and head-stone business remained all the time under the control of the Quartermaster-General?—A. I believe it has, for the reason that the officer in charge is a captain and assistant quartermaster, and consequently always under the charge of the Quartermaster-General.

Q. Has it been in the Quartermaster's building all of the time?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know of any reason why it was removed from there?—A. In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act of 1874, a clause was inserted prohibiting the Secretary of War from employing in any part of his office in the city of Washington any clerks for whom no specific appropriation had been made by that act. It was changed in the Senate, allowing him to retain the general-service men. Under the provisions of that clause the so-called quartermaster's clerks could not be retained in the office of the Quartermaster-General. It was then suggested to remove the office of national cemeteries to Alexandria, or Arlington, or to consider it part of the post of Washington, and the latter proposition was finally adopted. On the 1st of July, 1874, at the commencement of the new fiscal year, the cemeterial branch, then so called, was removed from the building corner of Fifteenth and G streets to a building vacated by some of the clerks of the Adjutant-General's Office, at the corner of Seventeenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, where it remained until the removal of the Quartermaster-General's Office from the corner of Fifteenth and G streets to the corner of Fifteenth and Pennsylvania avenue. They are now in the same building with the Quartermaster-General's Office, and known as "Office National Cemeteries, War Department."

Q. That is the Randall building?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know what induced the removal of the Quartermaster-General's Office from the Riggs building to the Randall building?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. What is your knowledge of the capacity of the Riggs building for the accommodation of the Quartermaster-General's Office?—A. When the clerical force was larger than it is now there was plenty of accommodation, and there was one story that had never been used. When I left the office on the 1st of July, 1874, there were two entire floors unoccupied in the building, that is, unoccupied by clerks; they may have been used as lumber or store rooms.

Q. They all could have been adapted for office purposes?—A. One floor had been. The cemeterial branch itself was on one of those upper floors at one time, but was moved down.

Q. Which is the larger building of the two—the Riggs building or the Randall building?—A. I am not an expert, but I should judge the Riggs building was the larger; and the clerks tell me that they are very much cramped for room in the new building.

Q. Have you any means of knowing in how many of these cemeteries head-stones are being erected at any one time?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have you any means of knowing how many engineers are necessary to inspect these head-stones?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether all these head-stones and blocks are prepared in the same quarry?—A. I do not.

Q. Have you any knowledge as to whether there has been any change in the kind of marble or material, which is now used in the head-stones, from that which was at first used?—A. Nothing but what I have heard.

Q. What have you heard on that subject?—A. I have heard that the specifications were changed—that a change was made in the depth of the incision on the stones, and that different kinds of marble were being used. I had a conversation with one of the contractors, Mr. Morgan, who afterward sold out to Mr. Bridges. He told me that his first lot of head-stones were made at the Brandon quarry, in Vermont, of good white marble. The inspector or engineer who was sent up to inspect them pronounced them good, and they were accepted, and paid for. The next lot was from a quarry at Dover, New York; they were, as he described it, "as white as the marble slab of this mantel," and they were accepted. The third lot were from the same quarry, and of the same material, equally good with the first, as he stated. They were for the cemetery at Barrancas, Florida. They were rejected as a whole. He then turned around and sold out his contract to Mr. Bridges, and with his contract, as a part of the bargain, he sold the rejected stones. I said to him, "How did Mr. Bridges get those stones accepted?" He said, "That is his business and none of mine."

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Is it a fact that Mr. Bridges did get those stones accepted?—A. All I know is what Mr. Morgan told me about it.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 27, 1876.

WILLIAM PATRICK, sworn and examined, testified:

I reside in Saint Louis, Mo. My business has been, for the last thirty years, lumber-merchant. At present it is running a marble quarry. Stone-cutting was my first business. I served my time, and worked journey-work for a time in my early days.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State what connection you had with, and what you know, if anything, concerning the letting of the contract to furnish slabs and blocks for the soldiers' graves in national cemeteries by the Quartermaster's Department.—Answer. In 1873, along about July, I obtained blanks from the Quartermaster's Department, and I went to work to get up the freights to the different cemeteries and to get up estimates on the manufacturing of the stone, the lettering, &c., and on the 6th or 7th of September the letting was, and I was among others that bid. I put in three bids, all on blanks furnished me by the Department. I think the bids were in duplicate; I cannot say with certainty. My first bid was a bid for all the cemeteries of the United States at $2.65 for the "unknown" and $3.50 for the "known;" amounting in the aggregate to about $797,000, a few hundreds over that. My second bid was a bid for all the national cemeteries of the United States, at various prices for each cemetery, running from, probably, $2.50 for those close by Knoxville up to $10, perhaps, for the furthest off; which amounted to a little more money, probably $800,000. I did not rely much on that bid, and did not add it up. My third bid, and the one I wished to have accepted, was a bid for the cemeteries in the Southern and Middle States, surrounding my quarry. I think I bid for those $2.60 for the "unknown" and $3.40 for the "known." I furnished a specimen of my marble, specimens of the "unknown" and of the "known," and furnished the Secretary with a letter I had received from Mr. Mullett, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, as to the quality of marble, of which I furnish the committee a copy. It is as follows:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
"April 15, 1873.

"DEAR SIR: Yours of the 13th, asking my opinion of the white Tennessee marble used in the construction of the United States court-house and post-office at Knoxville, Tenn., is received.

In reply I have to say that it is, in my opinion, unsurpassed in beauty and durability by any marble now in use in this country.

"Very respectfully,

"A. B. MULLETT,
"Supervising Architect.

"Capt. W. PATRICK."

The bids were opened. First, General Meigs commenced to read them himself; he read a while, and after he got tired reading, after a half or three-quarters of an hour, (they were opened in the afternoon,) Captain McGonnigle took his place and read the bids. At the time of the reading of the bids there was something took place—a bid was handed in, by whom I do not know, and some gentleman that was sitting behind me got up and objected; said it was after the time; and he protested against any bids coming in. There were some few remarks about it, to the effect that it be admitted or not, just as they saw proper, afterward. Before we got through the bids Mr. Bridges' bid was read, and when it was read it was on a slip of paper, a letter. Some man, I think the same person, got up and objected again, and said it was not according to the due form. There was something said about that; that it should be referred to the general. It was the captain that was reading then. With those exceptions we got through very well. I was the lowest—admitted to be the lowest bidder by all the men that were there when my bid was read, and, indeed, when it was read a great many got up and left; said they had to take the train. It was getting late, and they left, nearly all those quarrymen. On Monday, I think it was, the committee was examining the samples. But few of us put in specimens; probably not over twenty; maybe not so many. I saw none from Mr. Bridges, and I looked particularly for it. Mr. Jones, of this city, wrote me a month before to know what I would furnish the rock for in a certain way—in the rough state, just sawed out. I wrote to him in reply, and Mr. Jones, before the bidding, said to me, "Here, I am bidding on your sample that you have put in. I want you to understand that. It will answer for mine, as I am bidding on your rock, and Mr. Morgan, who is bidding with me, will bid on your sample, too." That was before the bidding; and a couple of days afterward the committee went around among the samples, which were down-stairs, and they rejected all but three, as I was told. I was in the room there, but of course I did not follow them around nor hear what was said, but they ordered three of them up—namely, mine, an Italian one for Mr. Walsh, and a very handsome American marble from some other person. They ordered them put into the room, and they were carried immediately to the room, and the others were sent off.

I found out in conversation with Captain McGonnigle afterward that the white marble was above a million of dollars, and also that Mr. Walsh's was to be worked in Italy; and he gave it as his opinion that neither would be received, because one was above, and the other because it was to be worked in Italy.

I thought at the time of that conversation that my opportunity for supplying the marble was very good. A short time before the letting I called on Mr. Belknap for the first time, and presented a card of introduction from General Sherman; and we had some conversation about the work and the prices. I think it was the day before the letting. Mr. Belknap said that this work would all have to be done over again, because the appropriation, only a million of dollars, would not be sufficient, and the bidding would have to be done over after an additional appropriation was made. I told him that I would be glad to get the work, and would agree to do a good job and give satisfaction for less than the amount of the appropriation. He said that my proposition was too low entirely; but I told him I would agree to give satisfaction at my price, and that I hoped to get the contract. I showed him at the same time some letters that I had brought with me from Saint Louis, showing my standing and capacity to perform the work if it should be awarded to me; all of which he pronounced entirely satisfactory. I called on him again as soon as he returned from New York. I went to inquire the condition of the bidding as soon as I knew he was at home. I asked him if they had not yet come to any decision about the work? He replied, looking over at the table, "No, there are all the papers yet." We sat down and had a little talk over the matter, and he requested me when I was leaving to call again toward the end of the week. I called at the end of the week, and he again remarked that he thought I had bid too low to give a good job. I told him I was willing to do the work and would make my job equal to the sample, and give full and good security for the performance of the contract, if it was awarded to me. We then had some talk about the time it would require to complete the work in. I told him I thought it would take about three years. He objected to its taking so long, and said it would have to be done in less than that time; that it had been on his hands for a long time, and he wanted to get done with it as soon as possible. I then said that by putting in additional machinery I could do the work in two years. But he said he thought that a year and a half was enough, and that he was unwilling to allow any longer time than that. I accepted that time, and agreed if the contract was awarded to me to do the work in that time, as I knew that the only difference would be in getting more machinery. We then parted, he saying that he had a telegram which required him to go to a sick child out West, and that he would be absent for three weeks, but as soon as he returned he wished me to come again on this business. I asked how I was to know when he was here, and he said that the papers would show it. I then went home and waited until I found by the papers that he had got back, and I came on at once. I got here, I think, on the morning of the 18th of October, and at the depot met Mr. Sage, who was there waiting for me. He helped me to carry my satchel up to the hotel, and remarked as we went along, "You have lost your contract." I said "No, I suppose not." He replied "Yes, the contracts have all been awarded." He told me then that Bridges got a part, Morgan got a part, Jones got a part, and he himself got a part, and some other man had got one cemetery at Fredericksburgh, I forget what his name was, making five in all. I said I thought it very strange that such should be the case after my conversation with the Secretary of War upon the subject. I went immediately and called upon the Secretary of War and asked why it had been done in that way. He said he had to refuse my bid, though he admitted that it was all right, because as he said "it was off color." It was not pure white, he said was the reason.

By Mr. THORNBURGH:

Q. Have you a specimen of that stone here with you?—A. No, sir; not with me, but it is whiter than that building. [Pointing to center of the east front of the Capitol.]

Q. What kind of marble is yours?—A. It is about four pounds heavier to the foot than Italian marble, a little harder to work than the Italian; and every place where it has been introduced it is said to be much more solid and uniform in its texture than the Italian. This is the uniform opinion of marble-men who have tested it.

Q. How does it stand pressure?—A. Mr. Mullett told me once, in conversation about it, that it would bear a lateral pressure of six times as much as common sandstone; and to crush it required ten times the pressure that was required to crush sandstone. This marble is stronger than any marble that I know of—than any American marble.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Is your marble extensively used in private cemeteries?—A. No, sir; it has only been opened for about four years. But there is now in Knoxville a church, the First Presbyterian Church, in the yard of which there are head-stones put up in 1811, at that time, on which the chisel-marks are still plainly visible. In 1820, the Bank of East Tennessee was built, and the window-frames, cornices, &c., were put of this marble, and the chisel-marks have not yet been washed out. The custom-house at Knoxville is built of this marble, and I defy a man to find a crack or a flaw or a crevice in any part of the stone. I think it is the best piece of masonry I have ever seen. There is not a flaw in it, and it is a beautiful white color, without a stain on it. A few days after the bids were put in, but before the decision was announced, some two or three days before the announcement, a man met me on Pennsylvania avenue, and engaged me in conversation. I can only give the substance of it, however. He wanted to know if I expected to make some money out of my contract if I got it, and what I expected it would be worth to me. I told him that I hoped to make some money out of it, that such was my intention. He then asked if I was willing to give anything for the contract. I told him "No, I was not; that I had made a fair proposition, and expected to get the work on it." He said it was very evident that I did not understand the way such things were worked here, and when he bid me good bye he said, "In my opinion sir, you will not get it;" and walked off and left.

Q. Can you state who that person was?—A. No, sir.

Q. Can you describe the appearance of that man?—A. I should say he was a man of about your size—some 5 feet 8 or 9 inches in height; he had dark hair, and whiskers slightly grey. I took him to be one of the brokers in the street at that time.

Q. What kind of broker?—A. I mean one of those persons who want money to help you get contracts here.

Q. Have you seen that man since?—A. I am not positive; but I thought I saw him once afterward on the street here, and endeavored to get near him, but he escaped me in the crowd. I don't know that I have seen him since.

Q. Have you seen any person since that you took to be the same man?—A. I saw Bridges since, and he struck me as being about the same-sized man and looked like him; but I could not tell.

Q. Was there anything in his appearance that impressed you with the belief that he was the same man?—A. Yes, sir. When I saw Bridges in Keokuk I thought he looked familiar to me, and I believed that I had seen him before, but could not place him exactly.

Q. Did he impress you as being the same man you had the conversation with on Pennsylvania avenue?—A. Yes, sir, he did; but I could not say that he was the same person. I will state here that Mr. Jones came to me the evening of the letting, I think the same evening, and said, "You want to make some money out of this thing, don't you?" I said, yes, that I had so calculated, and expected if I got the contract to do so. He said, "Well, I am some sixty-odd thousand dollars above you, and I am next on the list. All I want is a few thousand dollars out of it, that will satisfy me, and I will turn it over to you." I said that I declined to do any such thing, and that I would hold to my original proposition. In reference to my negotiations with Bridges; I had been corresponding with him about furnishing some of the stones under his contract, and he wrote me to come to Keokuk. I went and called on him, and found some three or four thousand stones on hand. On looking over them I found that quite a number were defective, and I remarked that I thought fully 25 per cent. of them would be rejected. I noticed that the letters were cut irregularly and were not deep enough. He told me that there had been a modification in the contract in regard to the lettering. Some, I noticed, were off color, and he remarked that that was another modification of the contract. Some, I noticed, were chipped on the edges by freighting or by careless workmanship, and he said that another modification of the contract was the privilege of rounding the corners. Some were broken at the corners, sideways and edgeways, and he said that part went under ground and would not be seen, another modification of the contract. I noticed, also, the abbreviations allowed in the names and in the word "private" which was put on the stone "pvt." He said that he had convinced them that a soldier has no rank and that was left out, a modification largely in favor of the contractor.

Q. What do you calculate would be the difference in the contracts under these modifications?—A. I figured it up to be some $115,000 on the contract. Some made it more than that.

Q. Were these modifications known to you at the time of the letting?—A. I never knew anything of them until Bridges told me of them himself.

Q. That was after the letting?—A. Yes, sir; six months after. He was giving me the modifications as an inducement to come down in my bids to supply him with a part of the stones.

Q. No such terms were contained in the original specifications?—A. No, sir. There was one modification handed to us on the morning we made the bids. It was in reference to abbreviating the names and title. This permitted the abbreviation of the name in this way: take for instance the names "William C. Jones, private, Massachusetts," or "Samuel H. Walker, lieutenant-colonel, Pennsylvania." By this modification these names could be written: "Wm. C. Jones, pv't., Mass.;" "Sam. H. Walker, lt. col., Pa." The original specification required the whole name and rank to be cut on the stone; and this modification was made before we bid. But that was the only change that was made from the original specification until after the letting. Bridges and myself discussed the price of the stone for some time, and finally he said he would go to Washington and write me from there whether it was all right or not. I said I wanted to know where the money was to come from. And he said that none could be paid me for over sixty to ninety days, and that he would pay me himself. I replied that it was not satisfactory, and he said it could not be otherwise arranged. So I went on back home, and have never heard from him since.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. It was your marble that you were negotiating for with him, was it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long was this after the contract had been awarded to Bridges?—A. I presume it was nearly eight months. I went to Keokuk after he had written me to come.

By Mr. TERRY :

Q. Have you ever seen the marble that Bridges was using?—A. I have seen only that at Keokuk ; nothing more.

Q. How does that compare with your marble?—A. It was, as a rule, inferior. He had some good stone, but a great deal of it was very inferior.

Q. As a lot, you considered it rather inferior?—A. Yes, sir ; it was inferior as to quality and bad as to color. The letters, too, were being cut (raised letters) by the sand-blast instead of cutting. This process cuts the stone irregularly. Some places would be cut an eighth of an inch in depth while others would be a quarter of an inch. I asked if such lettering would be received, and he said yes, that the letters were sufficiently prominent. Sometimes the iron plate that protected the letter from the sand would blow off, and the letter entirely cut out. I asked one of the workmen how they would do then, as it would spoil the stone. He said no, that they would cut out another letter and put it on with shellac. I did not see that done, but one of the men told me that it was done ; and I saw myself where the hot bar that was used for the purpose of heating the shellac on the stone had completely burnt the letter into lime, so that I could have wiped it off in five minutes with my handkerchief.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. What, if anything, have you observed or do you know, of the manner of Mr. Bridges' lettering the stones that he has prepared?—A. As I have stated, it was done by the sand-blow. The parts of the stone to be cut away are exposed to the action of the current of sand, which cuts out the parts and leaves the letter raised above the surface. These are by no means as durable as the incised letters. Where the letter had been defaced by the sand-blast, another was stuck on with shellac, as I was informed, and the surrounding parts were so burned by the heating process necessary to do this, as to convert them into lime. I could easily have wiped the letter off with my handkerchief, that was put on in that way. In one case I tried it, and found no difficulty in wiping off the corners of a letter in a few moments.

By Mr. TERRY :

Q. The bid that you put in contemplated cutting out or incising the letters?—A. Yes, sir ; it was entirely by cutting them out. I never thought of using the sand-blast. I did not suppose it would be permitted. I should have had them cut by hand entirely. By these modifications, if I had known them, I could have put in my bid for from $50,000 to $100,000 less.

By Mr. THORNBURGH :

Q. This stone that you saw at Bridges's in Keokuk, had that been inspected or accepted?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether that has been received for use or rejected, or whether any considerable quantity of them have been rejected?—A. A couple of years ago I was through here and called on Morgan, who had a share in the contract. He said that of the first shipment of 500 stones to one cemetery they had rejected 59, or over 10 per cent. He said at that rate they would break him up, but that he hoped still to get them in. I was told by the officer in charge of the cemeteries that out of 15,000 sent to Vicksburgh 1,300 had been rejected.

Q. What officer was that?—A. I don't know his name. He said he was an engineer, and had charge of putting up the stones. He said he would be in Chattanooga in April to put up the stones in that cemetery. The stones are being delivered there at this time.

By Mr. THORNBURGH :

Q. Do you know whether, by anybody, about that time that you were negotiating with Bridges to furnish him with stone under his contract, application was made to the Secretary of War, the Quartermaster-General, or either of them, to know whether, if such arrangement was made, your stone would be allowed to go in?—A. I don't know. Bridges said he would go to Washington and see about it.

Q. What time was that?—A. June or July, 1874, I think.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Maynard or any one else applied to the Secretary of War or the Quartermaster-General, or both, to ascertain whether or not you would be allowed to furnish your stone to the contractor, and if it would be accepted, either before or after your letter from Bridges?—A. After the opening of the bids, about Tuesday or Wednesday, I think, Mr. Maynard came here, and called on the Secretary of War in reference to the interest of Tennessee in the matter. When he was leaving for home he said that, perhaps, I should remain here for a few days. I rather insisted upon his remaining, but he replied that there was no necessity for that, as Tennessee would get her share.

Q. Were there not other parties from Tennessee interested in this bidding who were engaged in the marble business, and who had made bids on the work?—A. Yes, sir ; there were two or three other bidders from Tennessee. Mr. Maynard stated to me that he had come in the interest of no particular person, but came solely in the interests of the State.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. When this work was parceled out and given to five contractors, to whom were the most eligible or convenient cemeteries given?—A. All those which I would have selected in the West and South, the most eligible, were given to Bridges. He got the most convenient, and those where the largest profit could be made. The next choice, I thought, were those that Morgan got, and the last to Mr. Jones, whose were not desirable at all.

Q. The cemeteries given to Bridges were, in every instance, convenient of access by railroad or other means of transportation?—A. Yes, sir; in every instance. They were decidedly the most desirable on that account.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1876.

THOMAS P. MORGAN sworn and examined.

By My TERRY:

Question. Please proceed, without specific questions, to give your knowledge of bidding for and the letting of contracts for the making of head-stones, &c., for the graves of Union soldiers.—Answer. I would state that, in response to the advertisement which I hold in my hand, dated June 27, 1873, inviting proposals for head-stones for the national cemeteries, I submitted a bid on a blank form furnished by the Department.

The following is the advertisement referred to by the witness:

PROPOSALS FOR HEAD-STONES FOR NATIONAL MILITARY CEMETERIES.

“WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL’S OFFICE,
“Washington, June 27, 1873.

“Proposals are invited for furnishing head-stones for the national military cemeteries, as prescribed by the law of 3d March, 1873, of which the following is an extract:

“Provided, that the head-stones required by an act entitled “An act to establish and protect national cemeteries,” approved February 22, 1867, and the act amendatory thereof, approved June 8, 1872, shall be of durable stone, and of such design and weight as shall keep them in place when set, and the contract for supplying the same shall be awarded by the Secretary of War, after sixty days’ advertisement in ten newspapers of general circulation, to some responsible person or persons whose samples and bids shall in the greatest measure combine the elements of durability, decency, and cheapness; and the sum of one million dollars is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the Secretary of War shall first determine for the various cemeteries the size and model for such head-stones, and the standards of quality and color of the stone to be used, and bids shall be made and decided with reference thereto; and contracts may be made for separate quantities of such head-stones; and the contracts made under this act shall provide for furnishing and setting all the said head-stones, and shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum hereby appropriated.

“The total number to be furnished is estimated at 253,088. For the known, 147,694; for the unknown, 105,394.

“Specifications describing in detail the standard fixed by the Secretary of War can be had on application by letter to this office, where, also, a specimen will be placed on exhibition within a few days.

“The proposals should be in sealed envelopes, marked “Proposals for head-stones for national military cemeteries,” and addressed to the Quartermaster-General of the Army, in whose office they will be opened, in the presence of bidders, on Saturday, September 6, 1873, commencing at 11 o’clock a. m.

“By order of the Secretary of War.

“M. C. MEIGS,
“Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General, United States Army.”

The WITNESS. I will state that I was a bidder under that advertisement, and bid separately and specifically for each cemetery contained in the schedule—bidding for head-stones for the known and for blocks for the unknown graves of soldiers at the same price, $3.40; and then made an aggregate of my bid, which I do not now remember. I would state further that in making that bid I conformed to all the requirements of the Department in furnishing the usual guarantee that if my bid was accepted I would enter into contract with the United States—the responsibility of parties who were on that guarantee being duly certified. The bid went in at the proper time, the day specified for opening the bids. I filed my bid, but was not present at the opening of the bids. I received a letter from the Quartermaster-General's Office dated on the 27th October, 1873. Between the time of the opening of the bids and the date of that letter nothing intervened, except what was merely conversation and rumor.

This letter is the first official recognition I had in regard to the matter.

The letter is as follows:

“WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
“Washington, D. C., October 27, 1873.

“SIR: You are respectfully requested to inform this office whether you will enter into contract, with satisfactory sureties, to furnish slabs under your bid for head-stones, for the following cemeteries, viz:

At $3.40 each.

“By order of the Acting Quartermaster-General.

“Very respectfully, your obedient servant, *

“A. J. MCGONNIGLE,

“Captain and Assistant Quartermaster-General, U. S. A.

“Mr. THOMAS P. MORGAN,

“Washington, D. C.

“3480.—Q. M. G. O.—1873.”

In answer to that letter I addressed the following communication to Captain McGonnigle:

“WASHINGTON, October 29, 1873.

“SIR: Your letter of the 27th instant, requesting me to inform you whether I would enter into contract, with satisfactory sureties, to furnish slabs under my bid for head-stones, &c. I have the honor to reply, that my bid was made for head-stones for known soldiers' graves, and blocks for unknown soldiers. I am prepared to enter into contract for all of the cemeteries, or any portion of them that may be awarded me, at the price named in my bid, viz, for head-stones, $3.40; for blocks, $3.40.

“Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

“THOS. P. MORGAN.

“Captain A. J. MCGONNIGLE,

“Assistant Quartermaster.”

After I filed that letter, I had reason to believe that there would be no portion of the work offered me, except that mentioned in the letter; and I concluded afterward to accept what they had awarded, for I regarded it as a very close matter, and not in accordance with my bid. I thought, as I had bid for the blocks and head-stones at the same price, and as there was to be a division of the contract made, that I ought to have a fair proportion of each. The slabs were a very close matter, and all the profit there was on the contract, it was presumed, would be in the blocks. About that time the panic struck us, and reduced prices somewhat, and I thought that I would try it on the slabs at the award they made. I would state further that I learned from other parties in interest in the contract that a proposition had been made for dividing the slabs into four parts, and awarding one part to myself, one part to Charles S. Jones, one to Samuel G. Bridges, and one part to the Brandon Marble Company of Brandon, Vt., and all the blocks to D. C. Sage, of Connecticut. The Brandon Marble Company having declined to respond, there was a further apportionment made of slabs, dividing that one-fourth that the Brandon Marble Company declined between the other three persons, viz, Jones and myself, making the total for each 48,693 instead of 35,000.

Q. Is that the second apportionment?—A. Yes, sir; that is the second that was given to us.

The following paper was put in evidence :

I would state to the committee, as I perhaps should have done in the first instance, that I have the original contract that I entered into, and I will file that if it is desired.

Q. It embraces specifications and all?—A. Yes, sir; it goes on to state all the dimensions and all the specifications which are embraced in the contract.

A copy of the above-mentioned original contract was put in evidence, and is as follows:

Articles of agreement entered into this thirty-first day of December, eighteen hundred and seventy-three, between Capt. A. J. McGonnigle, assistant quartermaster, an officer in the service of the United States of America, of the one part, and Thomas P. Morgan, of Washington, D. C., of the other part.

This agreement witnesseth that the said Capt. A. J. McGonnigle, assistant quartermaster, for and on behalf of the United States of America, and the said Thomas P. Morgan, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, have mutually agreed, and by these presents do mutually covenant and agree, to and with each other, as follows, to wit :

First. That the said Thomas P. Morgan shall furnish, and erect in a good and substantial manner, all the head-stones (slabs) required at the following national cemeteries, and in the order as below given, namely:

Brownsville, Texas, national cemetery; Alexandria, Louisiana, national cemetery; Chalmette, Louisiana, national cemetery; Mobile, Alabama, national cemetery; Barrancas, Florida, national cemetery; Fort Donelson, Tennessee, national cemetery; Nashville, Tennessee, national cemetery; Stone River, Tennessee, national cemetery; Marietta, Georgia, national cemetery; Beaufort, South Carolina, national cemetery; Florence, South Carolina, national cemetery; Wilmington, North Carolina, national cemetery; Salisbury, North Carolina, national cemetery; Raleigh, North Carolina, national cemetery; Danville, Virginia, national cemetery; * Ball's Bluff, Virginia, national cemetery; Battle Ground, District of Columbia, national cemetery; Soldiers' Home, District of Columbia, national cemetery; * Whitehall, Pennsylvania, national cemetery; * Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, national cemetery; * Beverly, New Jersey, national cemetery; * Cypress Hills, New York, national cemetery. Twenty-two (22) cemeteries in all. Those north of Washington, D. C., indicated, thus. "

Second. That the head-stones (slabs) to be furnished by the said Thomas P. Morgan, under this contract, shall be of white marble, of fine grain, good texture, and hard, and in all respects equal in quality to the sample exhibited by the United States as standard, in the office of the Quartermaster-General, at Washington, D. C.

The said slabs to be of the following dimensions, viz, four (4) inches thick, ten (10) inches wide, and when set shall be twelve (12) inches high above ground; for the latitude of Washington and south, to be twenty-four (24) inches in the ground, and for places north of that latitude, to be thirty (30) inches in the ground. The bottoms to be flat with square corners, and the stones to [be] of uniform thickness throughout. The top to be slightly curved, (convex,) and all of that part above ground to be polished neatly in the usual manner of finishing marble head-stones, and in all respects to be similar to standard exhibited by the United States in the Quartermaster-General's Office at Washington, D. C. The number of the grave, the rank, (if other than a private,) and name of the soldier, and the name of the State from which he came, if known, and if not known, the name of the organization to which he belonged, to be inscribed (on one face) in relief, or incised, at the option of the party of the second part. The rank of a private soldier is not to be inscribed. Abbreviations may be made in the Christian or first name of the deceased, also in his rank and in the name of his State or organization; provided, that all such abbreviations shall be made in the manner indicated in the lists of inscriptions to be furnished, when prepared and required from the Quartermaster-General's Office at Washington, D. C. In all cases of abbreviations and wherever required, proper punctuation shall be observed. When the name of the deceased is long it shall be put on the stone in a curve. The figures and initial letters (capitals) to be two (2) inches long and one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) of an inch deep; the other letters to be small capitals, one (1) inch long and one-fourth ($\frac{1}{4}$) of an inch deep. All rubbish left on completion of work at each cemetery, to be removed by the party of the second part.

Third. All of the head-stones (slabs) to be furnished under this agreement shall be inspected by a competent agent, to be designated by the party of the first part, and such inspection shall be made at each cemetery both before and after the stones are erected. Inspections shall also be made at point of shipment if desired by the party of the second part. When all of the head-stones (slabs) for any one cemetery have been erected, and after the agent shall have certified that they are in all respects as contracted for, they shall be received and become the property of the United States, and payment may be made thereon as hereinafter provided.

Fourth. All of the head-stones (slabs) required under this contract shall be furnished and erected by the fifteenth day of May, 1875.

Fifth. For and in consideration of the true and faithful performance of each and every stipulation of this agreement on the part of the party of the second part, the party of the first part agrees to pay, or cause to be paid, when in funds for that purpose, to the party of the second part, the sum of three (3) dollars and forty (40) cents for each head-stone furnished, erected, and accepted under this agreement, and this sum shall be in full for all transportation charges, cost of labor in erecting the head-stones, removing rubbish upon completion of work, and all other expenses of any nature whatsoever.

Sixth. It is further agreed that in the discretion of the party of the first part, partial payments may be made for the work as it progresses, as follows, namely: when the whole work at any one cemetery shall have been completed in the order named in the first article of this agreement; provided, however, that on all such payments, ten per cent. shall be withheld until the entire number of headstones required by this contract shall have been erected and accepted.

Seventh. In case of failure on the part of the party of the second part to furnish head-stones of the quality described, or to erect them in the manner herein prescribed, or to complete the work within the time stipulated in this agreement or upon his abandoning it altogether, then the party of the first part will have the right to furnish and erect said head-stones in the manner and at the cemeteries hereinbefore mentioned, and the excess in cost over the price agreed upon in this contract shall be charged to the party of the second part.

Eighth. No member of Congress, officer, or agent of the Government, or any person employed in the public service, shall be admitted to any share herein, or to any benefit which may arise herefrom.

Ninth. This agreement is made subject to the approval of the Quartermaster-General, United States Army.

In witness whereof, the undersigned have hereunto placed their hands and seals the day and date first above written.

A. J. MCGONNIGLE, [L. S.]

Captain and Assistant Quartermaster, United States Army.

The following indorsements were on the above:

Contract between Captain A. J. McGonnigle, assistant quartermaster, United States Army, and Thomas P. Morgan, for furnishing and erecting head-stones at national cemeteries.

Date: DECEMBER 31, 1873.

$\frac{6}{23} = \frac{31}{48}$ } Quartermaster's-General's Office, 1874. Bond, \$35,000.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1874.

Approved.

J. D. BINGHAM,

Acting Quartermaster-General, Brevet Brigadier-General, United States Army.

[In pencil.] Contract and bond signed December 31; filed January 3, 1864.

I have also here a regular specification and list of the cemeteries, with the number of blocks and head-stones. It is as follows:

SPECIFICATIONS FOR HEAD-STONES FOR NATIONAL MILITARY CEMETERIES.

For the known.

A white marble or gray granite slab (4) inches thick, ten (10) inches wide, twelve (12) inches high above ground, and, for the latitude of Washington and south, twenty-four (24) inches in the ground; north of that latitude, thirty (30) inches in the ground.

The part above ground to be polished neatly, and to have the top slightly curved.

The number of the grave, the rank and name of the soldier, and the name of the State from which he came, to be cut on one face; the figures and capital letters to be 2 inches long and $\frac{1}{8}$ inch deep; the other letters 1 inch long and $\frac{1}{8}$ inch deep. The letters may be in relief or incised, at the option of the bidder.

The portion below ground to be rough-dressed, and at least $\frac{1}{8}$ inch wider and thicker than the part above ground. The bottom to be straight and of uniform thickness, and the corners square.

For the unknown.

A granite or marble block 6 inches square, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet long, (6" $\times$ 6" $\times$ 2' 6".)

The top and 4 inches of the sides of the upper end to be neatly dressed, and the number of the grave cut on the top in figures 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches long and $\frac{1}{8}$ inch deep, or relieved. When the figures are more than three, they will be arranged in a curve around the margin.

The top to be flat or slightly convex; the bottom to be flat and full 6 inches square; the rest of the block to be rough-dressed or split, but to be of full size throughout.

The block to be firmly set in the ground so that the top shall be just even with the top of the grave.

The marble for the slabs to be white, of fine grain, good texture, and hard; for the blocks, to be nearly white, of pretty fine grain, and good texture—to be a good, durable marble.

The granite for the slabs to be of uniform gray, of a fine grain, uniform mixture of the ingredients, and free from all oxides; for the blocks, to be gray, of pretty close grain, and to be good granite for building purposes.

Specimen head-stones, giving the form, the style of finish, and the quality of the stone required, will be exhibited in the Quartermaster-General's Office in a few days.

Notes.

1. These slabs may be of uniform width and thickness throughout, (viz, 10 inches wide and 4 inches thick,) at the option of the bidder.

2. The granite slabs may be fine-pin hammered on the back and the face rubbed or sanded smooth.

3. The term polished is used to signify the usual manner of finishing marble head-stones.

M. C. MEIGS,

*Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General, U. S. A.,*QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, June 27, 1873.

I will state that I entered into a contract with acceptable bondsmen, and proceeded to execute my part of the work.

Q. State whether you completed your part of the work, and what became of the contract.—A. I did not complete my part of the work, except Brownsville, Tex., the worst cemetery I had; Alexandria, La., Barrancas, Fla., White Hall, Pa., and Beverly, N. J., I had under way.

By Mr. HARDENBERGH:

Q. Is there a national cemetery at Beverly?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is the extent of it?—A. It is very small. There are 138 known graves and 7 unknown; total, 145. After that I disposed of my interest in the contract to Samuel G. Bridges, of Keokuk, Iowa.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. State the terms upon which you sold out to him.—A. I have perhaps stated a little in advance. By an arrangement with Mr. Jones I had agreed to take his share of the contract and execute the work, and in my negotiation with Mr. Bridges I disposed of Mr. Jones's contract and mine too. The price that I was to receive for Mr. Jones's part, as well as my own, covering about 97,000 or 98,000 head-stones, was $20,000, $5,000 of which was to be paid in five months after the date of the agreement; $5,000 in seven months; $5,000 in nine months, and $5,000 in eleven months. The agreement was dated December 24, 1874. Is it the wish of the committee that I state these matters historically in their order?

The CHAIRMAN. State all the circumstances.

A. About the time of the maturity of the first note, Mr. Bridges came on here with Mr. Sheldon, of Vermont, a gentleman who was executing the work—getting out the marble and preparing it for shipment; that is, the work was being done at his quarry. Mr. Sheldon, after he came here, said that he had undertaken to furnish this marble, and he had assumed a good deal of responsibility about it, and would have to make some arrangement about the paper that was coming due. He seemed to be dissatisfied with the arrangement, and proposed to take up the paper if I would accept the paper of his firm in lieu of the paper that had been given by Mr. Bridges at a considerable discount. Looking at the matter all over, I agreed to accept Mr. Sheldon's offer, which was, I think, about $14,000. It was $13,500, and then they paid me some expense that had been incurred, making it in all about $14,000, all of which paper has been paid. I believe that is all I know about it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How did it come that you took less for Mr. Bridges's paper than it called for?—A. I was satisfied of Mr. Bridges's inability to pay it.

By Mr. THORNBURGH:

Q. What changes were made in the contract after the bids were accepted, and before you sold out your interest?—A. I think the first modification was made May 16, 1874, by the following letter:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., May 16, 1874.

"SIR: You are respectfully informed that the Secretary of War has, under date of the 14th instant, authorized the following modifications of the specifications for head-stones for the known graves in the national cemeteries, viz:

"Slabs to have the figures and letters of a uniform size of one (1) inch in length, and one-eighth ($\frac{1}{8}$) of an inch in depth. A variation of one-thirty-second ($\frac{1}{32}$) of an inch in depth may be allowed.

"The edges of the slabs may be slightly rounded; a perfectly square edge will not be insisted upon.

"The term 'white marble' is to be considered as signifying what is known, commercially, as white monumental marble, not statuary marble.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"M. C. MEIGS,

"Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General, U. S. Army.

"Mr. THOMAS P. MORGAN,

"Washington, D. C."

Q. I see that does not include the change of that part of the stone that went under ground which was required originally to be of full size. Was that change made before you sold out your contract?—A. No, sir; that was all done after I retired. I think that is all the modification that was made.

Q. What difference would these changes, made since the contract, make in the expense of furnishing the stones?

The WITNESS. Your question has reference to the time that I was connected with it? Mr. THORNBURGH. Yes.

The WITNESS. If you will excuse me, I do not know what that modification was in reference to the base of the stone; I only know that they made some modification, but what it was I do not know. In reference to the modification to which I referred in my testimony a moment ago as to the depth of the letters and square edges, it would make no difference in the cost at all where the edges may be rounded. The advantage there was about mutual to the contractor and to the Government. The object in allowing that was this: That when the slab would come from the saw these edges were very sharp and fine, and in the handling of them they would often chip off, so that if the stone was rounded a little, it made it much safer in transportation for the contractor, and made the stone look better—gave it a better finish.

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. Do you mean the edges or angles?—A. The edges.

Q. By the terms of the original contract the corner of the stone was to be a right angle, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were they required to round the edges?—A. The design and plan of the stone was all worked out, and the stones were on deposit at the Quartermaster-General's Office as samples for us to bid by, and the stones had a very slight curve on the top.

Q. Then the modification was to the edges and not to the angles?—A. Yes, sir. In reference to the change in the cost of letters it was to the interest of the contractor. I could hardly give an opinion about it, for I had no work done under the original plan of lettering. That was a matter that I know gave us a great deal of concern, because the letters were cut so deep that it jeopardized the letters and made it more difficult to get the name on the slab, on account of the size of the letters. If you want an opinion I can give it to you without having worked those deep letters and the large capital at the commencement of the name. All I could do would be to give an opinion. I did not execute any work under the original plan of lettering.

By Mr. THORNBURGH:

Q. You say the stone was equally as good, and perhaps better for the Government by rounding the edges?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The stones looked as well and were as serviceable and durable?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State whether or not it did not save the contractors the rejection of a great many stones that would get chipped on the edges in transportation?—A. That is what I said; that in the transportation of the stone they were liable to chip off.

Q. If they were chipped would they not have been rejected?—A. Yes; and even if the stone was handled without the edges being rounded, by having that permission the small chips could often be worked out by rounding the edge.

Q. You could put stones in that you could not have used otherwise?—A. Yes, sir; stones that would have been objected to.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. When you made that bid did it have reference to an incision?—A. Yes, sir; incised letters.

Q. Did you bid with reference to the incised or raised letters?—A. Yes, sir; incised letters; and when I made the bid I had the raised letter in view at the same time, because it was optional with the contractor to use either; there were parties before this who were pressing this sand-blast, which was an improvement in lettering; and I had the raised letter in view at the same time.

Q. Which of the two processes is the most expensive?—A. The incised letter.

Q. Which is really the best for monumental purposes?—A. I think the blast is the best; that is my judgment. It is novel and it looks prettier.

Q. Have you ever had any experience in that business?—A. No, sir; not in head-stone business until this. My business has been that of general contractor. I have had a little to do with almost all sorts of things, but nothing with marble in that form.

Q. Were those raised letters liable to be broken off in executing the work and handling the stones?—A. There is danger in working the little letters that they place on the stone to make the letters in the stone; there is liability, occasionally, for that to blow off, and sometimes it will blow off; if it does, if the machinery is not stopped instantly, it will affect the letter on the stone. Of course, any raised letter is more liable to be broken in transportation than an incised letter.

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. When you say "raised letter," you do not mean that it is raised above the general surface of the stone?—A. No, sir.

Q. It is sunk by the sand-blast but left standing out?—A. Yes.

Q. It is not raised above the general face of the stone?—A. No, sir.

Q. Does it make much difference in the expense, if you use the sand-blast process, how many letters are worked, or how few? Does either the size or the number of the letters make much difference in the expense?—A. No, it does not.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Could not these incised letters be cut out by the sand-blast?—A. You can cut them out, but you could not make an incision of the letter as well as you could make an incision of the spaces between the letters. You cannot make the lines and angles sharp enough.

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. State whether the amount of lettering on a head-stone, where it is worked by the sand-blast, makes any difference in the cost.—A. It does not, in my judgment.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What was your reason for selling out your contract to Mr. Bridges?—A. I thought I could do as well by selling out as to execute the work. There was a good deal of difficulty, annoyance, and delay about it that I did not anticipate, and I thought it would be about as well for me to sell as to go on with it myself; although I expected to have done much better.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Bridges had a specimen of the marble that he proposed to use deposited with the Quartermaster-General before the bids were considered or not?—A. I do not. I did not know Mr. Bridges until some time after the bids were opened.

By Mr. THORNBURGH:

Q. Did you have on exhibition there a specimen of the marble you proposed to use?—A. No; I deposited mine after the bids were opened. I did not, for the reason that samples of the marble required by the Department were there, and we were bidding with reference to those. When I was called upon for a sample I furnished it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you present at the opening of the bids?—A. I was not.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Was there any difference in the allotment of cemeteries between yourself, Jones, and Bridges in this respect; whether either of the allotments was more judiciously situated than others, and, therefore, likely to be more profitable in executing the contract?—A. I discovered that the allotments were numbered, and I asked the question why that was; mine was No. 1. I was answered by the officer of the Department that they tried to make the division as equitable as possible, but they thought there was a little preference in the list, so they put on the numbers and cast lots for the three bidders to whom the contract was awarded. That was the explanation I had. They considered No. 1 a little more favorable than the others, though they tried to make it as equitable as possible.

Q. Who gave you the explanation?—A. Colonel Mack told me.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. In attempting to secure this contract did you simply file your bid and rest upon its merits, or did you get some one to aid you in procuring it?—A. I had an attorney.

The matter hung for a long while; there was no award made, and I could not tell why. I never went to the Department myself. I had Mr. Caperton as my counsel to help me there. He called several times at the Department, and through him I learned about this division.

Q. Did you have any other person employed?—A. No, sir; not employed. There were a number of my friends to whom I named it, and asked their assistance if they could help it. The Secretary did not know me at all, and I thought they might aid the matter in representing who I was. I was an old citizen of Washington and an old contractor. Mr. Caperton was really the only man who was employed to do the work.

Q. What friends saw the Secretary and used their influence?—A. Mr. Murtagh was one, and I think Mr. Samuel V. Niles was another. I conversed with them about it. I do not call to mind any others now. I know that there were several parties who I thought might aid me, and whom I spoke to about it.

Q. None of these gentlemen expected a consideration?—A. No, sir. Mr. Caperton was my attorney; I agreed to pay him.

Q. What did your attorney say as to the reason why this contract was divided among three, instead of to the lowest bidder?—A. As well as I remember now, the attorney reported that the Secretary was very much embarrassed about the award of this contract; and after deliberating upon the matter a good while he concluded that the best thing he could do was to divide it, and I supposed the division would be in accordance with the bid. I thought I would get a share of the blocks as well as the head-stones. I did not know how it was to be divided. It was only my own judgment. I know I requested that a geographical division might be pressed, so that I might get the work around Washington, in Maryland and Virginia. But I did not get it in that way.

Q. You did put up some of this work?—A. I put up the head-stones at Brownsville, Texas, and had prepared several other cemeteries; they were in course of preparation.

Q. Did you have any part of your work in Florida?—A. Yes, sir; at Barrancas.

Q. You sold out before you completed Barrancas?—A. Yes, sir; the stone was at Brandon worked out.

Q. Were any of your head-stones rejected?—A. Yes; all for Barrancas was rejected.

Q. What did you do with them after they were rejected?—A. I turned them over to Bridges.

Q. Did you sell them to him?—A. I did not sell them to him. I reported to him these stones at Brandon, and it was understood that he would take charge of those stones, and was to settle with the Richmond quarry for them.

Q. Do you know whether those stones on his hands were accepted from him after they were rejected on your hands?—A. I do not. I have no knowledge of those stones as to what became of them, except that I know Barrancas has been finished; but whether those were my rejected stones I do not know.

Q. How many of them were there?—A. Five hundred and eighty-five.

Q. What engineer rejected those stones on your hands?—A. Mr. George D. Chenoweth.

Q. Is Mr. Chenoweth still in the service as engineer?—A. I am so informed.

Q. Do you know anything about his having received a watch from any parties connected with this head-stone business?—A. Only from rumor. I know nothing personally.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Chenoweth received or demanded any consideration from any contractor for his engineering services in any way?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know how many engineers are employed in that service now?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know how many of those cemeteries were under construction at one time? At how many of them is the work going on?

The WITNESS. Do you mean at this time?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; or at any time.

A. I only know from what I have heard through Mr. Sheldon and Mr. Bridges. They have told me from time to time, when they have been here, what they were doing. I asked the question of Mr. Sheldon, who, I think, was here in February, and he told me they were about half done. Since then I have seen Mr. Bridges and he told me they were a little more than half done.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Bridges has been more successful in having his stones accepted than other contractors?—A. I do not; because I have had no knowledge of his work at all.

Q. Are those stones now inspected at the quarries or at the cemeteries?—A. They are inspected at both points, or they were when I was doing the work, and I understand it is still the practice. The stones, after being worked out, are inspected as to their general appearance, by the inspector, as to color and workmanship, and quality of the stone; and they are inspected on the ground after they are set to see if they are in line and properly spaced. I think that is still the practice.

By Mr. HURLBUT :

Q. The quarry inspection has nothing to do with the work?—A. Yes; it is all done right there on the spot. We always had them finished where they were worked out.

By Mr. THORNBURGH :

Q. Supposing they get broken or chipped in transportation so as to injure them?—A. We have to stand the loss.

Q. The inspection at the final destination covers that?—A. Yes, sir. If the committee would like to see it, I have here a report of the Brownsville work, where I suffered considerably from errors in names and States, which I had to make good—every stone.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Q. How was that done, by relettering?—A. We had to send out new stones.

Q. Do you know whether the stones have been put in upside-down in any instance?—A. I do not, but I think it would have been allowed.

Q. Was that ever done by you?—A. No, sir; I think it would have been allowed, but it was not done by me, for the reason that there were no parties at Brownsville that could do the work. I had to send out a second lot.

Q. How many did you lose in that way at Brownsville?—A. I think it was 60 out of 1,300.

Q. Do you know whether these inspectors were all taken from civil life, or are they officers of the Army?—A. I think they are all civilians, so far as I have heard. I do not know all of them. I think the officer at Brownsville, Lieutenant Nixon, is both an inspector and acting quartermaster, but the work was inspected afterward by Mr. Chenoweth. I think they are all in civil life, with the exception of Lieutenant Nixon.

By Mr. HURLBUT :

Q. He was simply receiving-officer; his inspection was not final?—A. He was receiving-officer and inspector, too. The final inspection I had after replacing those stones that were in error was upon his certificate and inspection.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Q. When you were executing the work yourself, did you assume all the expense and cost of erecting the stones under your contract?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You charged none of it to the Government for labor done in erecting the stones?—A. No, sir; because the contract expressly stipulates that all transportation and all expense of erection shall be borne by the contractor.

Q. Did you make any charge for extra labor or expense in any way?—A. No, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. If I understand the manner in which the contracts were let, a division only was made of what are called slabs, which were for the known graves; the contract for blocks, which were for unknown graves, was all given to one man?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State whether or not that one man (whose name, I believe, was Sage,) was the lowest bidder for the blocks; was he lower than you?—A. Yes, sir; he was lower than me on the blocks, and higher on slabs, and the aggregate of his bid was a great deal over mine; I think more than $100,000.

Q. Was he given any slabs?—A. No, sir.

Q. He was given the blocks because he was lower on the blocks than anybody?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But none of the slabs were given because he was higher than you and others?—A. Yes, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1876.

DE WITT C. SAGE sworn and examined.

By Mr. GLOVER :

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. Cromwell, Conn.

Q. I believe you were a bidder on the head-stone contract for soldiers' cemeteries.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State what you know about that matter; the manner in which the contract was let; how it was divided up, and all you know about the manner in which bidding was done.—A. It would be really a difficult matter to go through the whole. It would take a long time.

Q. Condense it as well as you can.—A. The advertisement called for bids—

Q. You may omit that. We want your personal experience and knowledge of the matter, and about your own contract.—A. I presented my bid on the 6th of September. I was present at the opening of the bids, and saw those bids opened, and made a minute of the different bids. That memorandum of mine is worn out and spoiled, and I have lost it. After the bids were all opened I started for home. I had concluded that I was not a low bidder, and I had no further business in Washington at that particular time.

Q. You did not ascertain who the lowest bidder was, did you?—A. By my memorandum, William Patrick, of Saint Louis, was the lowest bidder; but I did not fully understand the matter. I supposed that the lowest bidder would take the work. I did not fully understand that they required white stones; and, consequently, when the bids were all opened and had been read, I saw by my memorandum that William Patrick was the lowest bidder, and I concluded that he was to have the contract.

Q. Did you have a specimen of stone on deposit in the Department?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Mr. Patrick?—A. Yes, sir. I say "Yes;" I suppose he did. It was generally understood that each bidder had a sample of stone. I cannot remember whether Patrick had or not, but I suppose he had.

Q. What happened after you went home?—A. After I went home I saw several articles in the newspapers saying that white marble was required for this work. Then it occurred to me that my bid for white marble for blocks was the lowest, and I returned to Washington to look after the matter. On my arrival here I found that I was right; that white marble was required for this work; that nothing but white marble would fill the specifications. I had a conversation with General Meigs, and he said to me that I was the lowest bidder for blocks, and if the contract was to be divided (and he thought it might be) I was entitled to the blocks for the unknown.

Q. Whom else did you see—anybody else?—A. Yes, sir; I saw various parties in connection with it; I saw Colonel Mack and Captain McGonnigle.

Q. What did Colonel Mack have to say?—A. The general impression I got by talking with each one of them was that nothing would be accepted except white marble; that that appropriation was for $1,000,000, and the idea was to get just as good stones as $1,000,000 would buy. Consequently, I took my starting-point from that—that if white marble was required, I was surely the lowest bidder. Now, what was to be done with the slabs was a question that was not settled in my mind, and I made a statement in writing, showing the advantages of accepting my bid for blocks, and other bids for slabs. I have a copy of that statement with me. General Meigs thought the contract ought to be divided. His first recommendation was that Walsh Brothers' bid for Italian marble be accepted. He told me that he wrote a letter to the Secretary of War, recommending that Walsh Brothers' bid be accepted. I have never seen that letter, but simply state what he told me. General Meigs became convinced from what he had seen that Italian marble would not be accepted for this work; then he recommended that the contract be divided to secure the completion of the work.

Q. Do I understand you to mean that he recommended that the division be made between yourself and these three other gentlemen for blocks and head-stones?—A. He gave me to understand that he had recommended that, three or four days after I presented that statement.

Q. When did you get notice that you would get a part of the contract?—A. [After referring to a paper.] It was October 27, 1873, by the following letter:

"You are requested to notify this office whether you will enter into a contract, with sufficient sureties, to furnish, under your bid for head-stones, all of the blocks required, except those for Fredericksburgh, Va, Camp Nelson, and Lexington cemeteries.

"By order of the Acting Quartermaster-General.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"A. J. MCGONNIGLE."

Q. What was your reply to that?—A. My reply was written here in Washington, although it was dated at Cromwell, Conn. I always dated my letters from Cromwell. I was here at the time. My reply is as follows:

"CROMWELL, CONN.,

"October 28, 1873.

"SIR: Referring to your letter of October 27, I would say I will enter into a contract, and give sureties, to furnish, under my bid for head-stones, all of the blocks required, excepting those cemeteries named by you. Should it be offered me, I would also furnish, under my bid, any cemetery or number of cemeteries with head-stones."

Q. Did you mean under your bid at $5?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there any response to that?—A. No, sir. That last portion of my letter I was not asked for, but I simply put it in, thinking if there was an odd cemetery that was not called for, it might be awarded to me.

Q. When did you enter into the contract?—A. My contract is dated December 31, 1873. [The witness exhibited his original contract.] I received notice of the contract previous to receiving the contract. [The witness also exhibited to the committee a copy of specifications attached to the contract.] I understand those specifications, in that form, are very scarce.

Q. Did you execute bond?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And proceeded to carry out the contract?—A. Yes, sir; on my receipt of notice that the contract was awarded to me, I immediately arranged for the bond.

Q. How much did you do?—A. I went on and completed the stones for Brownsville, Tex., and shipped them to Brownsville. I completed the stones for Chalmette, New Orleans, and shipped them. I completed the stones for Baton Rouge, New Orleans, Mobile, Port Hudson, Barrancas, and Gettysburgh.

Q. Did you set up any stones?—A. The stones at Brownsville were set up. The stones taken to Chalmette were shipped and should have arrived there. I arranged with Mr. Bridges to take my contract, about the time that the stones for Chalmette should have arrived there.

Q. What was your understanding of the contract—that you were to furnish, complete and entire, all stones on the ground for the prices at which they were awarded to you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you made no charges for extra work?—A. I did make charges for extra work at Gettysburgh cemetery. When I arrived at Gettysburgh cemetery, I found that it had been laid out in circles by the State, and they had arranged to set a curb on all those circles. They were so arranged that there was a large monument in the center, made by Mr. Batterson, of Hartford, Conn., and the graves of the soldiers were in circle around the monument pointing toward the monument. They had arranged to set a 10-inch curb around this monument in circles, and to cut the inscriptions opposite each body that was buried there. On two sides of the monument were a number of unknown graves, 979. On completing the cemetery, however, they did not get so far as to set this curb, but they put in the foundation. In putting in this foundation, they put in some stones that weighed a ton and a half. They came on the circle where it was necessary to remove them so as to set my stones. This foundation was laid in common granite that was picked up on the grounds there, and brought from different places; at any rate, it was a very solid foundation, and in order to set my stones, it was necessary to remove all that foundation, in order to get earth to set them in. I objected to that; I thought that it did not come under my contract to take out that whole foundation, amounting to many hundred tons of stone, and haul in earth to set those stones in. I therefore objected to it, and the Department awarded sixty cents a stone extra for removing the curb and for buying and hauling in earth to replace that foundation.

Q. Did the Department pay that extra amount?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was no part of the contract you turned over to Bridges?—A. No, sir. I say "no, sir;" about the time this was done, I was negotiating with Mr. Bridges, and the result was that I did turn this over to Bridges.

Q. But the account had been adjusted?—A. The account had been adjusted in my name on my own account, but as the transfer occurred about that time, I transferred the additional amount to him.

Q. Upon what terms did you sell to Mr. Bridges?—A. I sold to Mr. Bridges for a consideration, of course; that consideration was seven cents per stone set; that was my net profit. In addition to that, I reserved to myself the ten per cent. that was retained by the Government, according to the terms of the contract.

Q. In addition to the seven cents per stone, you got the ten per cent. reserved on the completion of each cemetery?—A. Yes, sir. In my sale to him, I also transferred to him stones for Baton Rouge, Port Hudson, Mobile, Gettysburgh, and Pensacola, and the expense of those stones and other expenses, up to that time, amounted to $20,140.

Q. Was your pay for those stones, already furnished, to be computed in this seven cents per stone and ten per cent.?—A. No, sir; my arrangement with Bridges was such that he was to pay for the labor on all stones up to that time, which amounted to $20,140.

Q. That was your entire remuneration for the sale of the contract?—A. No, sir; that was my entire remuneration for the work that I had in process at that time—for labor on stones that had been accepted up to that time; for instance, the Chalmette stones had been finished, accepted, paid for, and shipped to the cemetery.

Q. Did the Government pay for them before they were shipped?—A. No, sir; I had paid for them; they had been accepted by the Government. I had paid the quarrymen for the cutting of the stone, had shipped them to the cemetery, and had paid the freight. That was one charge to Mr. Bridges. The charges on the other stones, and expenses of that kind, amounted to $20,140. He paid me that amount in notes and cash; I considered it cash; or rather Mr. Sheldon paid me. I did not pay much attention to Mr. Bridges, for I did not consider him responsible in the matter at all.

Q. Did you have any stones that were rejected by the engineers before you sold out to Bridges?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you do with those stones?—A. Those were all laid aside. According to my arrangement for the purchase of stones, I was to receive such stones as were accepted by the Government.

Q. You did not pay for those that were rejected?—A. Not at all; because I had nothing to do with them. I had a great many stones rejected on Chalmette cemetery. The greatest trouble was that they were not full size.

Q. What was done with those stones afterward?—A. They are at Sheffield, Mass., I suppose, at the present time.

Q. They were not removed to the cemeteries?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have any rejected after they were delivered to the cemeteries?—A. No, sir; I do not think I had. They were very particular on inspection of those stones, and it was understood that any stones that did not come up to a certain standard should be rejected at the quarry where cut, so as to save transportation; and, consequently, they were very particular on inspection. After the stones were delivered to the cemeteries, I do not know of a single stone being rejected, except it was broken in two. In shipping stones we always ship some extra stones to allow for breakage. If a stone was broken in two, of course, it would be rejected. I shipped 48 extra stones to Chalmette, to replace any that should happen to be broken in two. I do not know of any others. I do not remember the number that were broken in two, but I presume there were some.

Q. You did not have any rejected stones at Barrancas which you turned over to Mr. Bridges?—A. No, sir; I think not.

Q. What were your profits from that sale to Mr. Bridges?—A. I am sure I never put it in figures, but I am to receive seven cents per stone, and the ten per cent. that is retained by the Government. And I received $20,140 for stones and labor up to the time of my sale.

Q. How many stones were embraced in your contract?—A. I find by actual working, that it has increased very much from the estimate; for instance, here is Little Rock set down at 37 stones, and there are, in fact, 2,700.

Q. Have you made any estimate as to about what will be the aggregate number of stones for the cemeteries you disposed of?—A. I cannot say exactly, of course, but as near as I estimate, it amount to 110,000.

Q. That would be $7,700.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the 10 per cent. on 110,000 stones at $2.42 would be $26,620?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the $7,700 and $26,620 together make $34,320?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was paid to you as fast as the cemeteries were finished?—A. Except the 10 per cent.; that was retained until the contract was completed.

Q. The entire contract?—A. Yes, sir; that is paid on the completion of the entire contract, and I have a bond signed by the parties that the contract shall be completed on time. The original time has expired, and has been extended, and in consideration of that extension, they have agreed to pay me interest on this $55,000 from the 15th of May last, when the contract was to be completed.

Q. How near is it completed now?—A. As I understand it, it yet requires 46,000 stones—my part I am speaking of. There are in the vicinity of 70,000 stones, in all, delivered, set up, and in transitu.

Q. Did you sell to Bridges, or did you really sell to Sheldon & Slosson?—A. It was done in Bridges's name.

Q. He negotiated it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. These other men became the sureties, did they?—A. I considered Sheldon & Slosson the persons I was doing the business with.

Q. Do you know anything about awarding a contract to three gentlemen for the slabs?—A. Yes, sir; I know that it was done; I know that it was offered to four.

Q. Do you know why it was awarded to three different persons instead of the lowest bidder?—A. I do not know surely, of course, but I have heard. I heard in general conversation at the time about the work as to what should be done; my opinion was asked in regard to it, whether, if the contract was given to Mr. Jones, I thought he would fill it or not. I have generally understood, and it was understood at the time, that if the contract was given to one party the prospect was that it would not be filled.

Q. Do you know any reason why one-third of that contract was given to Mr. Bridges at $3.56 instead of being given to him at Jones's bid of $3.39, that being the lowest bid?—A. The idea of the Secretary of War was, that if that contract for all those slabs was given to one person—to Jones for instance—he would not fill the contract. It was generally understood—now I am asserting a thing that, of course, I cannot swear to—but I know that it was generally understood that Mr. Jones was an irresponsible bidder, and they looked upon him as such; but if all the slabs were divided up, then they had confidence to think that the work would be done.

Q. What was understood about Mr. Bridges's responsibility as a bidder?—A. Colonel Mack went to Keokuk to ascertain whether he was a responsible bidder or not. I suppose he went at the expense of the Government, and I suppose he went expressly for that purpose.

Q. Do you know what he found out?—A. He came back and reported that any portion of the contract awarded to Mr. Bridges would be carried out. He got his information, as I understood, from George Williams.

Q. Am I to understand you to say that Mr. Bridges was considered of himself a responsible bidder, or that he could get good security?—A. That is the idea.

Q. The latter?—A. That the security offered by Mr. Bridges satisfied the Secretary of War and Colonel Mack that his part of the work would be carried out.

Q. Am I to understand you to say that if one-third of the contract, or even if all of it, had been given to Mr. Jones, Mr. Jones could not have given a good and sufficient bond for the execution of the contract?—A. No, sir; not at all. I think the impression was that he could give a sufficient bond. But Mr. Jones, at that time, was under protest; that is, he had an account that was unsettled as paymaster of the Sixth Army Corps.

Q. For how much?—A. I do not know the amount. I might tell by my papers at home. He had an unsettled account with the Government as paymaster, and also as Indian agent.

Q. Would not that have been a very good place for the Government to have saved their losses, if there were losses on that account?—A. I do not think it would. I think it would have added just that much more to it.

Q. Would not that have been a good opportunity for the Government to have saved an old debt?—A. I do not think it would. They might have saved an old debt, but they would have broken him up on this contract by retaining that money. He had no capital, so he represented to me. I know that that matter was talked of by the Secretary of War at the time, and I am fully convinced in my own mind that the reason why Jones could not make a move was for fear that the Government would retain the amount that they claimed was their due on his account; at any rate, I have received that impression from what he told me.

Q. But the Government did give him one-third of the contract?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know who his securities were?—A. I do not know, I am sure, except from what I have heard. I understood Dr. Blake, of Washington, was one of them, but that is simply hearsay. I have no positive knowledge in regard to it.

Q. Now I ask you, as I asked a while ago, if you can account for the reason why one-third of this contract was given to Mr. Bridges at a higher rate by some $20,000 than Mr. Jones, who was the lowest bidder?—A. Simply this: the impression was, at the time, that any contract given to Mr. Jones would not be carried out.

Q. Is that any reason why Mr. Bridges could not have done his part on the contract at Mr. Jones's bid, as it was let to the lowest bidder?—A. He could not be called upon to do it at Jones's price.

Q. He could have been excluded, could he not?—A. If Bridges was called upon to do a certain portion of those cemeteries, Mr. Bridges must have his bidding-price for it.

Q. Can you give the reason why one-third of this contract was let to Mr. Bridges for $20,000 more than Mr. Jones's bid would have aggregated?—A. I do not understand that it was $20,000 more.

Mr. GLOVER. If you will make calculation you will see that it is.

The WITNESS. I know this: that the impression at the time was that whatever was given to Mr. Jones would have to be done by some one else.

Mr. GLOVER. But it does not follow that it would have to be done at $20,000 higher price.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GLOVER. That does not follow, because there is a contract given to another man at 16 cents less than Bridges.

The WITNESS. Yes; and what has been the result of that?

Mr. GLOVER. That is not the question. You are arguing now outside of the facts. What we are trying to get at are the facts.

The WITNESS. I am not arguing at all; I try to answer your question. Now, I know you ask we why it was that Mr. Morgan and Bridges were given a portion of that contract, they being higher than Jones.

Mr. GLOVER. That is not what I asked you exactly.

The WITNESS. So I understood. Now, the reason, as I understood it, that Mr. Morgan and Mr. Bridges were given a portion of the contract, they being higher bidders than Jones, was the lack of confidence in Jones to fill that contract; for the Secretary of War was satisfied—

Mr. GLOVER. You seem to argue that.

The WITNESS. That is the only way I can answer that question.

Mr. GLOVER. Let me state to you what you have stated. You have stated already that you considered Bridges irresponsible; that in selling him your stones, you virtually sold them to Sheldon & Slosson.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GLOVER. And I infer from what you say, that if you had had the letting of the contract you would not have let it to Bridges, because of his irresponsibility.

The WITNESS. No; that is wrong.

Mr. GLOVER. And now you argue that it must not be let to Jones because Jones could not have carried it out, when Jones has sworn here that he could have given as good a bond as any man in America; and if it had broken Jones up, that is a matter of no interest to the Government.

The WITNESS. You have not got my idea exactly.

Mr. GLOVER. We will start again, so as to make this as brief as possible, and get to the point. Here is a contract which was advertised to be let to the lowest bidder.

The WITNESS. I do not so read it.

Mr. GLOVER. What do you understand?

The WITNESS. I do not think the advertisement reads so.

Mr. GLOVER. Your view, then, is different from that of any other witness who has testified.

The WITNESS. Here is a copy of the advertisement I cut from the Chicago Inter-Ocean while I was in Chicago, [producing a printed slip.] The idea was, as I understood it, that the Secretary's intention was to let that work to parties that he could be satisfied, in his own mind, would fill that contract; that would furnish all those stones, and furnish them of the quality required under the terms of the contract; that would go ahead with the work and put up the stones without trouble. Now, he investigated that matter thoroughly, and knew personally every bidder that bid. The exertion of that whole Department was to find out who would fill that contract; who would furnish those stones and who would not. The Secretary became convinced that the only way these stones could be furnished—

Q. How do you know that?—A. By conversation with him and with parties there.

Q. Did the late Secretary of War tell you that he did not believe that Mr. Jones could execute that contract?—A. That was the general impression; yes, sir.

Q. Why did he let him have one-third of it, then?—Because he thought he could do one-third of it. He thought one third would reduce the business to his capacity. That is simply my impression from conversation with him. I do not know that he ever said that in those very words, but it has always been my idea after talking with him. He gave me to understand, after dividing the contract into three equal parts, it would reduce the contract to the capacity of each of the bidders, and neither of them was capable of doing the whole.

Mr. GLOVER. I come back to the original question, and hope you will be able to see it this time. Upon your view of this contract, I do not see why you might not have been given the slab-contract at $5, although you were the highest bidder.

The WITNESS. No, there was—

Mr. GLOVER. If the Secretary of War has the right to select three or four men out of the whole number of bidders, and divide this work up among them at their respective bids, let that difference be what it might, involving as many hundreds of thousands of dollars as it might, I see no use in the world of advertising this bid; and your explanation that it is let out to one man at twenty-odd thousand dollars more than to another, when there is no evidence that he was any more solvent than the other, is a thing I do not understand.

The WITNESS. I have not figured that, but I think your estimate of prices, $20,000, is more than double what it is in reality.

Mr. GLOVER. My recollection is that it is $22,000, according to Bridges' estimate.

The WITNESS. That Bridges' estimate amounts to $22,000 more than Jones's?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; I think that it is more than that. Let me ask you what your understanding of the purpose of this advertisement was that you say you cut out of the Inter-Ocean?—A. Simply to invite proposals for head-stones for graves.

Q. Upon what terms; the lowest price and for the best material?—A. Both were to be taken into consideration.

Mr. GLOVER. Now I come to the original question again: do you know why one-third of that contract was given to Bridges at a probable price of more than $20,000 over that of Mr. Jones, upon the idea that this contract was let to the lowest bidder?—A. I have always understood that that contract could not be filled by either of the previous parties; that is, by either Morgan or Jones. At first it was supposed to be necessary to divide it into four equal parts; consequently, one-quarter of it each was offered to Jones, Morgan, Bridges, and the Brandon Marble Company, of Brandon, Vt., supposing that the four would make a sure thing of it. The Brandon Marble Company did not reply to the letter they received. It was supposed that if divided among four there would not be any question about the work being done, but there was a question. It was talked at the time that the work could not be done for the money appropriated. Every one supposed so.

Q. That was a mistaken notion, was it not?—A. Every one supposed so; it was general talk; it was so among marble-men, and for that reason marble-men did not bid on it.

Q. Were there not about eighty marble bidders on it?—A. Yes; and how did they bid? Their bids probably run from $2,000,000 to $32,000,000.

Mr. GLOVER. There were very few out of the eighty that went above a million dollars; that is my idea.

The WITNESS. If I remember right, there were very few who bid for less than a million.

Q. How many are there?—A. [Referring to a printed slip.] Ten.

Q. Was not that a mistaken notion, after all the talk both in the War Department and outside, that no one of these men could do that work?—A. I do not think the result shows it.

Q. Is not Mr. Bridges doing all the work to-day?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then it was a mistaken notion on the part of the Secretary of War and everybody else that talked about it?—A. I do not think so, because I understand that if Mr. Bridges had not this work he would not be in the position he is. Mr. Bridges is supported by Sheldon & Slosson.

Mr. GLOVER. You assume that no other man in the United States could be got to do this work. Any one could have done it if the contract was given to him.

The WITNESS. That is not my idea at all; but I do think that if Mr. Bridges had not all this work to do he could not have got Sheldon & Slosson to take hold of it. There was not sufficient in any one portion of this work to induce them to take hold of it; but by his having the whole and placing it all in their hands, as he has done, that has induced Sheldon & Slosson to take hold of it.

Q. Are you aware that Sheldon & Slosson had already taken hold of it before he bought your contract?—A. I am not at all.

Mr. GLOVER. It is a fact that they were his backers on the one-third?

The WITNESS. That is a mistake.

Mr. GLOVER. You think you know more about it than Bridges?

The WITNESS. I think I know that that was a mistake.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Bridges has sworn here that he went there and made the arrangement with those gentlemen.

The WITNESS. I cannot help that. I went there with Mr. Bridges myself when he first went there to buy the stone.

Q. When was that first time that he went there?—A. I mean the first time after the job was let. Bridges went there once previous to that to see what he could get the stone for. The first time I saw him after he got the contract, I went with him. I knew Mr. Bridges' position at that time, and I knew mine. I know that Mr. Bridges bargained for the stone at a certain price to be paid for by George Williams on 30 days' time.

Q. Do you say that Bridges could not have executed one-third of the contract unless Sheldon & Slosson had backed him?—A. I think Bridges could through George Williams, but I do think that the whole contract could never have been carried out except by Sheldon & Slosson.

Q. You think that nobody else in the United States could have carried it out on the same terms and at the same price?—A. I do think that. In fact, I know that if Jones had gone to Sheldon & Slosson with that matter, if he had that contract, they would not have taken hold of it. I think that if Morgan had that whole contract and had gone to them they would not have taken hold of it. I think that Mr. Bridges' going to Sheldon & Slosson with that matter, together with other considerations, caused them to take hold of it.

Q. What other considerations?—A. His arrangement with me, and Sheldon's and Slosson's conversations with me in regard to it.

Q. What did Sheldon & Slosson get out of this contract?—A. I have their agreement down at the house, but I could not say just here what it is. They get interest on the money advanced; they get a certain price for the stone, and they get a certain interest on monthly balance; they get 90 cents for blocks, and $1.41 for slabs.

Q. Delivered and finished?—A. No, sir; that is, they get $1.41 for slabs ready to finish—sawed to size. Then there is the expense of finishing, of which an account is kept; expense of transportation to the cemetery, of which an account is kept; and I have always understood that on the monthly balance they charge up the interest; that they were to be paid a certain interest on that balance, although I possibly may be mistaken about this, but I think I am not.

Q. Interest on what they advanced?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You had no lettering, I believe?—A. I had figures put on.

Q. How did you execute that; by hand?—A. Yes, sir; it is all done by hand.

Q. When did you first know Mr. Bridges?—A. I knew him soon after those bids were opened; that was the first time I met him.

Q. You did not know him before the opening of the bids?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you present at the opening?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where were those bids delivered?—A. They were delivered at the Quartermaster-General's Office.

Q. In what way were they delivered?—A. Of course I cannot answer for the whole, because I do not know that they were all delivered in the same manner; but I took my bid to General Meigs and handed it to him in person. I was well acquainted with General Meigs, and had had a previous talk with him. He understood that I was to be a bidder, and when I handed him my bid he told me to take it into the other room, and I took it into the other room to Captain McGonnigle.

Q. What did you do with it?—A. I just handed it to him and left it with him.

Q. Did you understand that there was a basket there, into which these bids were deposited?—A. I did not see any basket.

Q. Whose bids were opened first?—A. I am not sure; I could not say.

Q. Would not your original memorandum show?—A. Yes, sir; I think it would—that is, I think I could get at it from my memorandum, but I am sure I could not say now. I know about where my bids came; I paid more attention to them.

Q. Did you see any bid or bids put in after the opening commenced?—A. No, sir; not one.

Q. Did you hear of any being put in after the opening had commenced?—A. No, sir; and further, I know that there could not have been one put in.

Q. Why?—A. General Meigs sat at the end of the table—

Q. Did General Meigs open the bids himself?—A. He commenced to open the bids.

Q. Are you certain of that?—A. I know it. General Meigs sat at the end of the table, and Captain McGonnigle and one of the clerks, either Mr. Finkle or Mr. Wolcott—I am not certain about the name, because they were strangers to me at that time—sat at the side of the table. I have often thought that the clerk's name was Wolcott, but I may be mistaken about that. General Meigs sat at the end of the table, and these parties sitting at the side of the table opened and prepared those bids; that is, they took them and handed them up as fast as they were opened, and General Meigs read them.

Q. How long did he open and read the bids?—A. I am sure I could not say, but I know he read thirty. I am speaking from memory, now, and I should judge that he read as many as thirty, and I am under the impression that he read forty. The room was very hot; there were a great many there; we were all sitting at the other end; General Meigs was sitting at the end of the table, and I was sitting at the side of the room; at any rate, I was sitting where I could see every bid that was opened; I saw my own bid; I recognized it by the envelope it was in.

Q. Had you prepared your bid here in Washington or at home?—A. Here.

Q. You did not hear any complaint at that time of a bid being put in after the first bids were opened?—A. No, sir; there was no complaint; there was not such a thing talked of.

[The witness exhibited to the committee a copy of his bid.]

Q. Does your bid embrace all the cemeteries in the schedule?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You bid on the whole?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you ever talk with Bridges about a second bid of his?—A. No, sir; I never knew that he had a second bid.

Mr. GLOVER. He put in two bids.

The WITNESS. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. GLOVER. He put in a second bid on a small piece of paper attached to the printed bid.

The WITNESS. I remember of hearing such a bid read, but I do not remember the shape it was in or the condition it was in. I was under the impression that he had but one bid.

Q. There was no complaint of that kind of a bid at that time?—A. No, sir; none whatever.

Q. Did Mr. Bridges propose to you to buy you out, or did you propose to him to sell out at first?—A. I think I proposed to him. At that time I was very sick. I had a certain conversation with Mr. Bridges. I was feeling bad, and I asked him what he would give me for my work, and told him I did not believe I could finish it. I think I asked him without his mentioning it at all. Before that I telegraphed to him in Iowa that I would go to Chicago as soon as I could arrange the matter to meet him there, and I did meet him there. We did not arrive at any conclusion in regard to the matter at all. I went with him down to Keokuk, and we did nothing there. I came back home. He afterward came on there and found me sick abed. I was not able to see him, and all the conversation and arrangements in regard to that transfer were made in writing with him in my dining-room and sent to me up-stairs, and I replied to him in writing and sent to him below, and I have the whole of that correspondence.

Q. Do you know what he gave to Morgan for his interest?—A. No, sir; I do not. I was told that he was to pay Morgan $20,000, but I was told afterward that Mr. Sheldon could not see his money back again, and would not take hold of it, and it was then reduced to $13,000 or $14,000, I do not know which. Soon after this transfer to Bridges I started for Rutland, and was taken sick on the cars. I sold out my contract on account of what had happened to my family previous to that time, and on account of my sickness, and nothing else.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. What is your business?—A. During the war I was manufacturing ammunition for the Government.

Q. What was your business at the time you put in bids for furnishing head-stones?—

A. I was really doing nothing. I was in Chicago at that time on another matter.

Q. What was it?—A. My business is manufacturing. I have always manufactured since I have done business. In the first place, my father died and left me with a manufacturing establishment at sixteen years of age, and I took it and run it.

Q. What sort of a manufactory?—A. Brick and building. The business amounted to about $40,000 a year.

Q. Were you present when these bids were opened?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see any irregularity in that matter?—A. None at all; there was none.

Q. Did you see anything of a bid dropped in after some others had been opened?—A. It could not have been possible; there was no such bid put in; I am under oath, and know what I am talking about.

Q. When did you arrive in this city?

The WITNESS. At that time?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. No; at this time.—A. Night before last.

Q. Have you seen Mr. Sheldon, of the firm of Sheldon & Slosson?—A. Yes, sir; I saw him last night.

Q. What conversation did you have with him in relation to the testimony you were to give here to-day?—A. There was not a word said in reference to it; I met him at the train. He is quite an old gentleman, and is nervous and excitable, and was anxious about this matter. He was fearful that there was going to be some trouble about it. I knew he was anxious to learn what had been done, so I sat up and waited for the 11 o'clock train to come in, and went and met him at the train and walked with him over to the hotel. I told him, as far as I knew, what had been going on, and how matters stood—that nothing had been done; that the evidence was not closed; that there was nothing to alarm him; that he had better go to his hotel and get a good night's sleep. I did not talk in regard to the evidence; he never asked me a question. I told him I had been subpoenaed here. He never asked what I knew about it or what I was going to say. I met Mr. Bridges the night before last, and I saw him again last night, but my conversation with Bridges does not amount to anything because Mr. Bridges is not a particular friend of mine; I do not think much of him.

Q. You sold your interest in this contract, I understand, to Mr. Bridges?—A. Yes, sir; that is, in Bridges's name. I did not consider Bridges the responsible party; I did not consider, when I was talking about the transfer and about the sale, that I was selling to Bridges. It was wholly conditioned on Sheldon & Slosson signing the bond for the completion of the contract, and wholly on the ability of Sheldon & Slosson to furnish, deliver, and set the stones.

Q. What profit did you make in that sale?—A. I am to make 7 cents per stone, and the 10 per cent. that is retained by the Government.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. You throw away all the work you did?—A. O, no; I get all the stones previous to the sale, and the labor previous to the sale, which amounted to $20,140; that I received from Sheldon & Slosson in the way of notes.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. What number of stones did you furnish under your contract?—A. It is not known yet how many stones, and cannot be until all the lists are made.

Q. About how many?—A. I should judge about 110,000; that is, it was estimated at 105,000 at first, but the increase up to the present time amounts to a little over 5,000, so that it will amount, unless there is a decrease, to about 110,000.

WASHINGTON, April 8, 1876.

CHARLES SHELDON, of Rutland, Vt., being duly sworn, made the following statement:

The first intimation I had of this matter was through either Mr. Sage or Mr. Bridges. I told them at what prices I would take a part of the head-stones and a part of the blocks. Our business is very large, and in sawing an order for our regular customers, we have a great many small pieces that we could work up in this way, and we gave them very low figures for that reason. I heard little more about it until at the time of the letting. My son was in Washington soon after the opening of the bids, and saw some persons here on the question of Italian marble, he stating that the American was far preferable for durability. Go out, for instance, and look at the statue of Washington, also of Columbus, and see how the pedestals on which they stand are cracked, and statue of America, one leg cracked off. General Meigs cited these as instances where there had been exposure and no cracks at all, not having noticed them for some time.

My son came down here with reference to that question, and I knew nothing further until I received a telegram from Bridges stating that he had got a portion of the contract, and wanting to know if we would sign his bonds. I telegraphed back, "no;" but that if he got responsible parties to indorse his paper, I would give him stones on sixty days' paper, and on longer time by adding interest. I may have seen Mr. Sage; I don't remember; but he knew what I would do, for he was a man of some responsibility and a man of business capacity. I had a visit from Mr. Goodell, of Brandon, and he told me the amount for which the contracts were let, and said they could never carry them through at that rate. He said that he knew they could not, and said that if we would join him and hold back, we would get that whole million; and he endeavored to have me enter into an arrangement to do that, which I totally refused to do. Bridges found a man named Williams, in Keokuk, to back him.

Williams gave me a written order for the slabs, to be shipped in his own name. He is a responsible man; and by the way, he did caution me against Mr. Bridges. We commenced to furnish slabs to order of Williams, and blocks to Sage. Satisfactory arrangements were made with him, but I would go no further than I could furnish in my regular business, from material that was smaller than would meet the general wants of my trade. Mr. Bridges in some manner got Mr. Sage into an offer to sell out his contract. He induced my son to come down to see Sage, who was sick, and there gave a power of attorney inducing my son to sign his (Bridges') bond to Sage, and thus brought us responsible for the entire block contract and purchase money to Sage. I offered Bridges $10,000 at once if he would find some other parties to step into our shoes. Bridges moved a little slow in his contracts, and Williams got into difficulty with Bridges, and the whole thing stopped so far as the Bridges-Williams contract was concerned, and I was written to to come to Washington, and when here, I got a request to interview the Secretary of War in regard to it. I told him the difficulties with Williams and Bridges. Williams had withdrawn his order, and Morgan and Jones had done little or nothing, not more than one per cent. on their 100,000 slab contract in a year. Negotiations were made, and I saw I could not get rid of Sage's contract, blocks and slabs all going to one place, and if I got a little less than cost on the slabs the same superintendence would do, and I finally took hold of the matter, but I tried very hard to get hold of some responsible party and to get out of the thing, and I still had the $10,000 ready for any one that would relieve me. In the mean time Bridges had control of the sand-blast, or the right to use it. He had set some cemeteries with marble that we had furnished. I saw that the sand-blast removed a very great objection, and I thought made it possible to carry the contract through with good management without loss. As I say, I furnished the means and followed up the trace to some western cemeteries, and I felt with that we might get out safe; still, as it was a business far away from home, I held out the $10,000 offer right straight through. I galvanized the whole thing into life when it was dead, with the exception of the Sage contract. I shall probably lose some money, but I do not think I shall lose very much. That, in short, is the way I got into this matter. It has taken more capital than I ever expected.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How much profit does Bridges get out of the thing?—A. He has got nothing at all yet. He is ostensibly the contractor.

Q. His profits are entirely contingent?—A. His profits are entirely contingent. He won't get as much as he paid Morgan and Jones; I am very certain of that. We have got the far-western cemeteries done. With what is due from the Government, the cemeteries are yet in debt to us about $25,000. Whether that can be made up on the balance I do not know. I yet hold my offer good, and will thank any man to step into my shoes. As to the material and the manner in which the work is being done, all these stories in the papers are infamous lies. The Sun had a long article the other day about certain material being rejected at Brandon, saying it was the better class of marble for monumental purposes. That was brought down here to Morgan—that same marble—and after the Brandon Marble Company pleaded with me to take this off their hands, I paid for it, and not over two-thirds of it has been received by the Government. I became somewhat familiar with the objection thought to exist to dividing this matter up. Jones was the lowest bidder by one cent on Morgan and seventeen cents on Bridges. There was very little confidence on the part of the Secretary of War that either one of them would carry it out, and he was trembling; but when he got Williams hold of it, he thought that part might be carried through, but he was doubtful as to the rest. The first year elapsed and but little was done by Morgan and Jones. Some small quarries had got out stone for them, but they would not ship them until they got the money, and there they lay. I furnished the money, and where there is a chance of two or three thousand to be obtained at the prices we are charging, I let Bridges buy and I pay for them. I pay the money and charge him six cents apiece. Jones and Morgan gave good bondsmen, but you know the difficulty of that. If it had gone into the market at that date, the bonds given by those men, fully paid, would not have furnished the stone. Nothing made it possible to do that work without a large loss except the sand-blast. It would require two hundred men, and with that number of men, you know the difficulty of keeping them employed. The finishing would be in the hands of the Stone-cutters' Union; it is a close corporation, and they are paid four or five dollars a day.

Q. Who was in charge of the Barrancas cemetery, Florida; was that Morgan?—A. He started it. He had arranged for the stone, I think, at Brandon.

Q. Then he sold out his contract and his material there?—A. Yes, sir; he had not paid a cent for it.

Q. Do you know anything about that material having been rejected by one of the engineers and afterward accepted when sold to Bridges?—A. Yes, sir; I know all about it.

Q. Can you explain why it is that the stones were rejected under Morgan and accepted under Bridges?—A. It is not wholly true; it is only true in part. The circumstances were these: The stones, or a portion of them, were out for the Barrancas cemetery, and, I think, a few stones for some other; the engineer went up there and examined the lettering of the stones; they were not exactly situated where he could see whether they were sound or not, and he saw that there were many errors in the lettering, and that a portion of them were roughly done, and he insisted that they should be placed where he could examine them. He said, "You know, gentlemen, what the agreement is, and you prepare them for another inspection. I will be over at such a time." He came up again, and the same difficulty then existed. I do not know this except as I sent my man up there to see what there was of it. That was after it was purchased by Bridges. Then a large number of the stones were rejected. I think there was more time and trouble devoted to preparing those stones than to any other ten thousand. After Chenoweth had passed them, I sent my own man up there to examine them. I knew that the marble is what is called laminated marble, and it requires pretty close inspection. There are liable to be cracks with the grain, which an engineer like Chenoweth would not be apt to discover. I knew that freezing and thawing would open those seams, and I sent my man up there to take out a number that had to be replaced. After all this was done, the stone were taken and I paid for them.

Q. What is your knowledge of Mr. Chenoweth as regards his qualification for the position he holds? He is quite a young man, is he not?—A. They tell me he is. He has got some considerable science, but he is impulsive, and, I think, lacks judgment in regard to these things. I have been excessively annoyed; it is a very unpleasant thing for me to have a boy come in and inspect work that I have passed upon myself. I have never had a business difficulty in my life, and I am perhaps not a proper judge as to his capacity, but it is very unpleasant to be at his mercy. If General Meigs came and said that this was wrong or that was wrong, if it was a man that I thought was capable of judging, I would not object; but there are one or two others of the same character.

Q. Do you know how those young men were appointed, Chenoweth and Clark?—A. I do not know anything about that at all. After a competent engineer had passed upon the stone at Beaufort, S. C., he received instruction that required him to make some alteration in some stones that were injured in transitu, and he did that in conformity to his instructions, but he was recalled to Washington, and this Clark was sent on there, and he did not like the way it was done, and said it must be done the other way at great cost. Still, the young man was honest. There is no unbusiness-like transaction connected with this head-stone matter that I have known of, with the exception of the short-sighted policy that I have pursued myself, and the wrong that I think the contractor submitted to in allowing these blocks to be separated, although the separation saved the Government $100,000.

Q. Did Mr. Morgan ever propose to sell to you?—A. I don't remember whether he did or not. I know he wished me to furnish him stone, and offered me $10,000 on the 100,000 slabs in advance of what I was getting from Bridges at the time. I refused to touch them.

By Mr. TERRY:

Q. Have you any interest in the quarries where these stones are gotten from?—A. I own them.

Q. Had you ever made any such remark as the following: "When Morgan proposed to sell to Sheldon, Sheldon replied to Morgan, 'Can't purchase, because I will have to pay a large sum to somebody in Washington?'"—A. Never a word of that kind at all; not an intimation.

Q. You have no knowledge, in the distribution of these contracts, of anything being paid to any parties about Washington?—A. It seems to me absolutely impossible, for this reason, it is a low figure, and I know the cost, and don't know where the money could come from. The contractor cannot pay for a telegraph message. I have got in my pocket now a written appeal from him to pay his hotel-bill. I received it when I arrived here last Thursday. He has got nothing. Well, he has got the sand-blast.

Q. Who is that?—A. Bridges.

Q. Were you here at the bidding?—A. No, sir.

Q. Had you ever any conference with General Meigs or General Belknap in regard to this matter?—A. I never did. Prior to the bidding, my son, Charles H. Sheldon, saw President Grant, General Belknap, and General Meigs.

Q. Was Charles H. Sheldon a bidder?—A. O, no. He came on here and said there was no chance for a responsible bidder.

Q. I find among the papers a letter from a member of your firm stating that the firm of Walsh Brothers did not exist in New York.—A. I guess it does not say that; he may have said "not as marble-men."

Q. It says, "There is no such firm here."—A. He could not find the firm as marble dealers; they were not known as such.

Q. Was that letter written by a member of your firm?—A. Yes, sir; Charles H. Sheldon, one of my sons, who was then a member of the firm.

Q. Had he or the firm any interest in this contract at that time?—A. Not a particle, sir.

Q. Did they expect any interest in it?—A. No, sir; no further than I had given the prices for which I would furnish Sage 50,000 of the blocks, and Bridges 50,000 of the slabs.

Q. Who requested him to go to New York and see whether there was any such firm as Walsh Brothers or not?—A. I do not know that fact. Can you get that letter?

Q. I will state that we can get the letter, but we should like to have seen your son here in place of yourself.—A. I think if you read that letter over you would not see any necessity for it.

Q. Well, if he had no interest in the contract and was not requested by the War Department, why should he be in New York writing such a letter as he did?—A. I could tell you. I sent him to Washington to find out why General Meigs had got prejudiced in favor of Italian marble. He came with several letters of prominent marble-men. It was to protect the reputation of American marble.

Q. I have a letter dated—

"178 BROADWAY, N. Y.,
"October 17, 1873.

"DEAR SIR: After diligent inquiry among all the prominent marble-dealers in this city and Brooklyn, I cannot find any one by the name of 'Walsh Brothers,' whose names appear on the samples in the Quartermaster-General's Office. I would respectfully call attention to the fact that the samples are all Italian marble, unsound at that, and that the name of 'Walsh Brothers' is undoubtedly a cover for some firm dealing wholly in Italian marble, and who, under existing revenue laws, are able to have the entire work finished in Italy, and imported free of duty as 'Works of art by American artists residing abroad.' As labor is so cheap in Italy, is it just to American laborers to have this work taken from their hands?

"Very respectfully, yours,

"CHARLES H. SHELDON,

"West Rutland, Vt., firm of Sheldon & Slosson, West Rutland, Vt.

"Colonel O. A. MACK,

"War Department, Washington, D. C."

Q. This letter was written by one of your firm?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had your firm any interest in this contract at that time?—A. None but the memorandum agreement that I spoke of, that we had told Bridges if he would furnish satisfactory security we would furnish so many head-stones.

Q. This letter is dated October 7, 1873; had you any contract with Bridges at that date?—A. No contract at all; only we had stated for what we would furnish him fifty thousand head-stones. He expected to get them all, and we said that we would furnish only so many, at a price given, if he furnished satisfactory security.

Q. What was the inducement for writing this letter?—A. It was to show, and get an opportunity of showing satisfactorily, by reference or in any other way, that the Italian marble, in the first place, was not as well fitted for this climate as American marble was, and to show that it was a foreigner that was acting through Walsh Brothers; because, if he was a practical marble-man, he must have known that it could not have been done in this country for the prices he mentioned there without machinery.

Q. The letter says, "On inquiry among all the prominent marble-dealers in New York City and Brooklyn, I cannot find any by the name of Walsh Brothers, whose names appear on the samples in the Quartermaster's Office;" is it not a fact that the firm of Walsh Brothers is one of the largest in New York City?—A. I have never heard of such a thing. I have never been able to find marble-men that told me that they were anything else than stevedores, taking large contracts for unloading ships.

By Mr. GLOVER:

Q. You know there was such a firm as that?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you know of a firm of that name having a marble-yard?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was the inquiry a very diligent one?—A. I don't know; the inquiry was made by my son; and I know I examined the Directory and I could not find them as marble-dealers.

Q. Who requested your son to make this examination?—A. I sent him to Washington to see if any efforts were being made to introduce Italian marble into this contract, and if he found that that was so, to take measures—through Struthers & Co., of Philadelphia, Fisher & Bird, of New York, and Batterson, of Hartford—to satisfy General Meigs that Italian marble was not as well fitted for our climate, for out-door monumental work, as American marble. Those were the instructions that I gave him.

Q. How much money have you paid to Bridges or any other person on this contract?—A. I have paid Mr. Sage, I think, $11,000; I have paid Mr. Morgan $13,000 for Bridges's notes, amounting to $20,000. Mr. Sage has a larger sum left, because he has the reserved 10 per cent. and 7 cents per stone. I think I paid him at one time three thousand and some odd dollars on that. The $11,000 was a bonus on the contract, and then 7 cents a stone, and then the reserved 10 per cent. he had the privilege of drawing. If there was 100,000 stone, it made altogether $42,000 that he was to get from the contract.

Q. Mr. Sage gets $42,000 altogether for his profit in the contract for selling out?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you bound to pay that?—A. Yes, sir. There would be a small profit on the blocks, which, for the most part, will be eaten up by loss on the head-stone slabs.

Q. Then Mr. Sage is to get $42,000 and Morgan $20,000?—A. That is Bridges's bargain, but I repudiated it, and I would not pay anything. I tried to get the Secretary, as it had lapsed, to put it into the market again, but he said he would not extend one without the whole. In many instances we can get 500 tons of head-stones and slabs delivered for 40 per cent. less freight than we could 250 tons.

Q. That makes $55,000 that you have paid for Bridges as purchase-money for Morgan and Sage's interest. Has anything been paid to any one else?—A. I wish to impress upon your minds that I tried to buy off from the Sage contract for $10,000. I offered it but did not succeed.

Q. Now, do you know of any money other than the $55,000 having been paid at any time heretofore or contracted to be paid at any time hereafter to any other person whatsoever for any purpose whatsoever, besides Mr. Bridges, upon this contract?—A. There is no contract to pay even Bridges, unless there is a residue after paying this other.

Q. Then you answer that you do not know of anything paid or to be paid?—A. I wish you to separate the question in regard to the $55,000.

Q. Well, I do not wish to. I wish to have an answer.—A. I know of no person; there is no contract to pay any money, further than that sum.

Q. Nor of any person whatsoever to whom any money has been paid further than that sum?—A. No other person.

Q. Did Mr. Bridges, at any time, state or claim to you that the contracts had cost him money to get them?—A. No; only traveling expenses.

Q. Did you ever at any time, or did any member of your firm ever at any time, or did any person, for or on behalf of your firm, ever or at any time before or since the making of the contract you are now filling, have any conversation with the late Secretary of War, General Belknap, upon that subject?—A. Before the contracts?

Q. Before or since.—A. Yes, sir; before I bought Bridges's notes that Morgan had.

Q. Who had that conversation with the Secretary of War?—A. Myself, with the Secretary of War, at his own office; introduced by Senator Morrill, of Vermont.

Q. What was that conversation in reference to?—A. I cannot remember the exact words of it. I remember that the Secretary remarked that this thing had come to a standstill, with the exception that we were then doing a little on the Bridges matter, and he should like to see it put in the way of continuance. I think the expression was a "resurrection."

Q. Was that all your conversation with him?—A. No, sir. I told him then that my opinion was that the best way was to let the thing lapse, and call upon the bondsmen.

Q. Anything further?—A. He replied that he very much disliked to do that; that there was a million dollars appropriated, and these contracts were let for less than $800,000, and he should take a great deal of pride in being able to cover that amount back into the Treasury; I may not use his exact words.

Q. Has it come to your knowledge at any time, or have you now any knowledge or information whatever, of any money having been paid or to be paid by Mr. Bridges or other persons for securing these contracts?—A. No.

Q. You have never had any intimation of the kind?—A. O, I have seen in the papers intimations, but I knew there was not any money to pay unless it came out of our pocket, and we took care that none of our money went that way.

Q. Do you know of any person largely interested in your contracts ever at any time paying or agreeing to pay to any persons any money for political or any other purposes?—A. There are other purposes. We are the only parties of any interest in this contract.

Q. What other purposes?—A. I have paid Bridges $150 a month to support his family with. I don't know of a dollar of money connected with these contracts for any other purposes at all.

Q. It is not the money connected with these contracts I ask about; it is persons connected with these contracts.—A. I have not paid for political purposes within twenty years. I have lived in Vermont, where it is not necessary to insure success. Williams was to have half the profits for furnishing the means for carrying out the Bridges contract. That was the arrangement. I saw all the papers, and settled the quarrel between them. Williams tried to have me get him out. I paid Williams for the inventory of property on hand—I think seven or nine thousand head-stones. I don't remember the exact number. This was an inventory of the property he had finished on hand and some machinery connected with it, and for the reserved 10 per cent. on the contract, represented to me to be worth $33,000 in all. I bought that material, the marble on hand, and the reserved 10 per cent., and paid him $30,000.

Q. Can you say that the contract between Bridges and Williams was that Williams was to have a certain per cent. of the profits?—A. Yes, sir; the contract, so far as that is concerned, was a verbal one, but they both told me that.

Q. Do you know what part of that $33,000 Williams got as part of his profits under the contract with Bridges?—A. From the inventory of property as given me he did not get anything. I paid him $30,000, and he says his books will show a loss of $5,000 now, and I believe him.

Q. Do you know about when you saw Bridges for the first time, and where?—A. I never saw him in my life until after Mr. Stephen Goodsell came there and tried to form a combination to prevent this contract from being carried out. It was some little time after that that Bridges came to my place, the first that I ever saw him.

Q. Was Bridges at your place between the 2d and 6th of September, 1873, of the year that the contract was let?—A. I don't think he was. I never saw him until after the contracts were made.

Q. Where did he come from when you saw him after the contracts were made?—A. I think he told me he had come from Keokuk; that he had been to get Mr. Williams and somebody else on his bonds.

Q. Did you meet him in New York at any time?—A. No.

Q. Or the Secretary of War?—A. No. I remember some other conversation, in regard to these contracts, with the Secretary of War. He said emphatically to me, "Mr. Sheldon, I want you to take hold of this; but I have told Mr. Bridges that I can do nothing for him under the circumstances in any possible way. I say this to you, that you should not have any expectations in the way of"—his expression was that he could not do it, and I must say that I thought he might perhaps favor us in some point where there would be disputes, but he told me emphatically that he could do nothing, and at the same time he said that he loved Sam. Bridges more than any living man, because when he was in the Army, Bridges was at home and took care of his family, bought everything for them, and took as good care of them while he was away as a brother or a son could have done; but, said the Secretary, "in this matter I will not and cannot do a thing." I told the Secretary I asked nothing but what was right. I saw him, I think, but once afterward, meeting him on the street. I was in Washington several times, but never called on the Secretary after that.

I call especial attention to the following statement, which is part of my testimony:

In reply to the question, "How much did you pay for the Morgan and Jones contracts," I should have said: Several months prior to the purchase of the balance of the Morgan and Jones contracts, Morgan assigned to S. G. Bridges about twenty cemeteries to complete; these comprised the most difficult and expensive cemeteries in the Morgan and Jones contracts. For these cemeteries Morgan received nothing in the way of payment, desiring to get them off his hands. A member of my firm assumed to furnish money and marble to complete the twenty cemeteries, forgetting that 10 per cent. of the contract-price would be reserved by the Government until the entire Morgan and Jones contracts were completed. The amount of the reserved 10 per cent. (including one additional cemetery, assumed after) amounted to over $9,000, which would be lost to my firm if the entire contract was not completed. To avoid this loss I finally bought from Morgan four notes made by S. G. Bridges, of $5,000 each, paying Morgan $13,000 for the notes, which carried the Morgan and Jones contracts with them. At the time I made the purchase I considered I was practically advancing the $9,000 reserved by the Government, and paying four thousand dollars for the notes and balance of the Morgan and Jones contracts.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 12, 1876.

Present, the chairman and Messrs. Cook and Hurlbut.

WILLIAM H. DUNKINSON sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your residence and occupation.—Answer. I reside in Baltimore County, near Baltimore City. My business is principally at Washington, in prosecuting claims, &c. I have been only living in Baltimore County about four years; I have lived here since 1852.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the corrupt or improper use of money, either in the lettings or by parties who got the contracts for furnishing head-stones?—A. Not the remotest in the world.

Q. Have you any knowledge of any money being used by parties interested in those contracts for political purposes?

(Objected to by Mr. Hurlbut.)

A. I have no knowledge of any moneys having been used for any such purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. I heard that you had stated that $25,000 of money of those parties had been used for political purposes, and I was urged to call you for the purpose of proving that fact.

The WITNESS. No money was ever appropriated or ever handed to me for such a purpose, nor do I know of any such transaction in that contract arrangement.

Q. Do you know of it in any other arrangement?—A. There was no other arrangement connected with that particular contract that I know of. I am perfectly willing to state my entire knowledge of the whole thing from the beginning.

Mr. HURLBUT. The only thing we care about is whether or not any improper influence of any kind was used to procure that contract, or whether any funds or profits derived from it were improperly used or given, under the guise of political assessments or anything else.

The WITNESS. Not one solitary dollar, within my knowledge, on the contract obtained; and I think I have a pretty thorough knowledge of the whole transaction.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any money so paid on a contract that was expected to be obtained?

The WITNESS. When?

The CHAIRMAN. At any time.

The WITNESS. I do not know how to answer that question. I have no knowledge of any money that ever was obtained or placed for any object of corruption. If the committee insists, I will give any knowledge that I have in regard to that tomb-stone arrangement, but I think I ought to be confined to the tomb-stone contract as obtained.

The CHAIRMAN. Or any other contract that was not obtained?

The WITNESS. There was no other contract in relation to it. In no transaction that I have ever had any connection with was there any corruption or improper use of money that I know of.

Q. Do you know Mr. Jones?—A. Very well. I was Mr. Jones's attorney, and obtained that contract for Mr. Jones.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Jones is the gentleman who asked that you be called, to give any evidence or information that you may have in regard to the use of money in the connection named.

The WITNESS. I received a communication from Mr. Jones, in which he called to my recollection the fact of my having mentioned to him something in regard to an original contract with other parties, and I very promptly answered him that he had misconceived the whole matter, as he had really done. He had supposed that I had said to him that I knew that a large amount of money had been used in the presidential campaign for General Grant. I never intimated any such thing.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 18, 1876.

JOHN C. COMFORT sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your occupation and residence.—Answer. I am a contractor by occupation; my residence is Shiremanstown, Cumberland County, Pennsylvania.

Q. Have you at any time been contractor to furnish to the Government gravestones for soldiers' graves?—A. No, sir; but I was a bidder under the general letting.

Q. In what, if any, way have you been connected with the cemeterial department?—A. I at one time had a contract to hedge the graves of the cemeteries in five States—New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina, and West Virginia. Those in West Virginia I was not called upon to hedge. The contract was let by Col. Henry C. Hodges, A. Q. M., of Philadelphia.

Q. Who was the inspector of your work?—A. I did the work in the spring of 1871, and at that time that class of work was reported by the superintendents of the cemeteries, and the payments were made upon their certificates. There was no difficulty about that; everything went along peaceably at that time. They reported the linear feet of work done, and certified that it had been done.

Q. What, if anything, do you know of corrupt practices on the part of any of the officers connected with the cemeterial work?—A. In the summer of 1872 I was a bidder for the building of the walls of the national cemeteries of Beaufort, S. C.; Memphis, Tenn.; Raleigh, N. C.; and also for the lodges of the cemeteries of Raleigh, N. C.; Memphis, Chattanooga, and Fort Donaldson, Tenn.; Logan's Cross-Roads and Lebanon, Ky. I also bid, by invitation of General Meigs, upon the lodges of Danville, Glendale, and Seven Pines, in Virginia. I was awarded the contract for the walls at $3.70 per linear foot, for the six first-named lodges at $2,400 each, and the three last-named at $2,800 each. The contract provided that the inspection should be made by some officer designated by the Quartermaster's Department. At some points the Government was not at the time the contract was made in possession of a title to the ground, and on that account there was considerable delay in getting the work started. Some time in the latter part of April or the beginning of May, 1873, there were three engineers appointed by the Quartermaster's Department to locate and inspect the work that was being done by the contractors.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. What do you mean by locating the work?—A. Locate the sites of the walls and the sites of the lodges. They were very liable to get out on other people's ground. About the 15th of May, 1873, I was introduced to three engineers in what was known as the cemeterial room of the Quartermaster-General's Office, by Mr. Meyer.

Q. Who was he?—A. He was the chief clerk in the cemeterial department. One of those engineers was G. D. Chenoweth, another was Samuel Robbins, and the third was Mr. Clarke. I was informed that Mr. Chenoweth was located in Washington, and would have charge of the work immediately around Washington, including that in the State of Virginia.

Q. Who gave you the information?—A. Mr. Meyer, this clerk I refer to. He was in charge of the cemeterial department, I believe; he told me that Mr. Chenoweth had transportation to go to Seven Pines, Glendale, and Danville, to locate the sites for the lodges to be erected by me. Mr. Chenoweth came to me in the room and said it would be impossible for him to go, as he had no money to pay his hotel-bills. I told him that I regretted this, as I was going on that night. He came to me again in the office and said he could not go, unless I would loan him money. I told him it would not do to loan him money; that General Meigs would object to anything of that kind; he said General Meigs would not object to it. He came down to the hotel afterward, (I was then stopping at the Metropolitan,) and he repeated the same story, that it would be impossible for him to go, and that he would get money in a few days. I told him, nevertheless, I was going. A few moments before the train was starting to Richmond, at night, he came down and said he was going on; that he would get money, he supposed, from the folks at home. He went on to Richmond, and when I registered at the Ballard and Exchange Hotel he registered his name, and said he supposed that we would take rooms together. While there he had no money to pay his carriage-hire for transportation to the cemeteries. He had by that time received a letter from home, but without any money. When we came to leave Richmond on the 22d of May, he had no money with which to pay his hotel-bill, and as he had registered in my room, he left it for me to pay. I paid it on the 22d of May, 1873. The amount of his bill was $21. [Witness produces the original bill, in which the charge referred to ($21) was debited to Mr. Chenoweth, and continued:] I don't know whether the omnibus-bill was included in that item. When he went to stake out the lodge at Seven Pines, he was unable to do so. He was entirely incompetent so far as that work was concerned. The superintendent of the Richmond cemetery was there, and remarked about the manner of his doing that business. I staked out the lodge myself, because he could not do it. This manner of doing business I did not like, and I called his attention to it frequently. During the summer the same thing occurred repeatedly. I was either charged with hotel-bills for him or he would borrow money. [Witness here produced another bill, of date September 30, 1873, from Ford's Hotel, Richmond, in which Chenoweth is debited with $8.50.] He borrowed money of me about the 17th of December, 1873, and after he had got some money from a Mr. Williams, a man in Richmond, (he was afterward appointed by the Government to finish some work there,) he came to me and asked me to let him have some money to pay his hotel-bill, as he did not have enough; he said he would give it to me when he got back to Washington; but I have not seen it since. At one time during the summer he insisted upon my buying a horse for him. I did not invest. There was a fast horse in Fredericksburgh, owned by some baker, and he wanted me frequently to buy it for him. I called his attention frequently, in this connection, to a letter in the Quartermaster-General's Office, written by General Meigs to some contractors that had sent a collection of flowers to Mrs.

Meigs, which the general refused to receive, and sent them to Arlington, and about which he sent a very stinging letter to the parties, (Miller & Hays, of Philadelphia,) objecting to anybody sending any presents whatever to any person connected with him or his Department. Chenoweth also wanted me frequently to buy him a watch; said he had no money, and wanted a watch. I told him it would be impossible to do anything of the kind; that it would be entirely out of place. One evening he came to me at the hotel, and told me that unless I would buy him a watch he would pass no more work; that he had done this, that, and the other, and I went down stairs into Goldstein & Co.'s, the jewelers, and bought a watch, and brought it up stairs, and brought with me two witnesses, and told him distinctly that I would not give him that watch, but I would lend it to him, because General Meigs was opposed to anything of that kind. George Axel Meyer was one of these parties, and the other gentleman was the proprietor of the hotel, Mr. Hildreth. I was then stopping at the Metropolitan in this city. I reported the matter to Colonel McGonnigle, who was in charge of national cemeteries, and showed him some of these original bills. I told Colonel McGonnigle about it. He said that Chenoweth was an appointee of General Meigs, and he had nothing to do with him. In the summer of 1875 I showed the papers to A. F. Rockwell, then in charge of national cemeteries, but he said that he believed that they were a God-damned lie, the whole of them, and that he felt Mr. Chenoweth was honest. Chenoweth, after his appointment, for a considerable length of time, would come to me to write his reports of different works. I made several of the draughts; among others was the original of the cistern afterward adopted and built by the Government at the national cemeteries, and the plan of the graves which had to be removed at Glendale National Cemetery for the erection of the new lodge. I wrote the report, and went over the calculation of the measurements of the amount of wall in the City Point Cemetery that had been erected by another contractor, and Chenoweth had been sent there to measure it, and asked me to make the calculation. I wrote his reports frequently for about three months. Frequently he would interfere with the hands which I was working, and would direct works to be done which had to be rebuilt. He interfered with my foreman at the draining of the Richmond Cemetery. I might add that, in addition to the work already mentioned, I had a very great deal of job-work, which consisted of erecting flag-staffs at some of the national cemeteries, draining four or five cemeteries, pointing the Richmond wall, placing mansard roofs upon the lodges of Fredericksburgh, Va., Cold Harbor, Va., and Fort Harrison, Va. He endeavored frequently to get the hands that I was working to leave, telling them they would never get their money. I furnished a sworn statement, verified by two witnesses, to this effect. I gave the original to General Meigs, and he said he would submit it to Chenoweth, and see what he had to say about it. He said he wanted the engineers to mind their own business, and never to interfere with the contractors on their credits. Mr. Chenoweth's reply to this was that he had not interfered, although the fact was supported by the testimony of two sworn witnesses. During the summer of 1873, about the 13th of July, the acting quartermaster in charge at Nashville, Tenn., mailed me a check, or was said to have done so, for $4,662. This letter and check did not reach my address. It turned up in the dead-letter office, was returned to Nashville, held there (by reason of a mistake made by the quartermaster as to some vouchers) some ten or twelve days, and I received it on the 25th day of October, 1873. The original envelope had not the county upon it. The terms of their agreement required them to pay monthly for the work which was finished.

Q. Has this anything to do with anything that was wrong in the matter?—A. I should say that the Post-Office Department required them to put the county on, and the holding of the check by the quartermaster on account of a mistake of his own was wrong. After the Government declared the contracts void, as they did on the 1st of December, 1873, I tried repeatedly to have the time extended, but they refused. After they took charge they used material that I had procured for work different from that provided in the contract. They put in a lot of extra draining at the cemetery at Seven Pines. At Danville they built a cistern. I might add that, during the summer of 1873, Mr. Chenoweth directed me to put in one hundred and ninety-four feet of drainage at Danville, Va. He said that it was necessary, and when he came home he would have the Quartermaster-General authorize it, and I would receive pay for it. I put in one hundred and ninety-four feet, or thereabouts, which was done at the same price per linear foot that I received for draining the cemetery at Seven Pines, Cold Harbor, and Fort Harrison. After it was in, he refused to report the matter to the Department. I met him one time at Fortress Monroe and insisted on it. There had been an appropriation or authorization by General Meigs for $50 to put in a drain across Lee street. He said he would give me a certificate for that, and when he came back to Washington he would have the matter paid. I reported the matter frequently to the Department myself, and they refused to pay more than the $50. The $142 or $144 which, according to Mr. Chenoweth's original agreement, ought to have been paid, was not paid. General Meigs decided that it was not authorized by him, and that $50 was sufficient, although he had paid $1 per foot for all other work of the same kind. I wrote the specifications for the stone-work and the brick-work of the lodges as they are now printed, with the exception that the architect in charge allowed, instead of stone-weathering, a molded brick weathering on top of the base, at the option of the contractor.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Do you know where Mr. Chenoweth is now?—A. I met him about two weeks ago in the lobby of the House. The chief clerk in the Quartermaster's Department told me this morning that Mr. Chenoweth had resigned, and that he was not any longer an employé of the Quartermaster's Department.

Q. Do you know when he resigned?—A. Mr. Finckel said about four weeks ago, as I understood, or about the time this testimony was before this committee.

Q. Has he ever offered to pay you or re-imburse you for the sums of money?—A. No, sir.

Q. Has he acknowledged it as an indebtedness at all?—A. No; but I am told he said so to outside parties. I will remark here that he took the watch down to Goldstein's, (after the matter had been reported at the office.) Goldstein & Co. have the watch marked with my name; so that he gave it in to one of the gentlemen of that firm by the name of Wallach. That firm now has the watch, and Mr. Wallach told me that they held to the order of Mr. Chenoweth, and as his property. The watch was broken before he took it to Goldstein's, and he directed it to be repaired.

Q. Did you ever ask this gentleman who holds the watch to return it to you?—A. No, sir; I asked him what he would take for it, and he said if Chenoweth did not take it up in a reasonable time he (Wallach) would take for it what the repairs cost.

Q. You say your name has been put on the watch?—A. Yes; Mr. Chenoweth told them to put my name on the watch; it was only fastened on with paper, however. The way I ascertained about it was, that I had a watch of my own there getting fixed, and I sent a man there to get it, and when he came back he told me that I had two watches at Goldstein's.

Q. Your name was not engraved on the watch?—A. No, sir. After hearing that I had two watches there, I went down to Goldstein's to see about it, and found this other watch there.

Q. Did you ever complain to General Meigs about these transactions with Chenoweth?—A. No, sir; when I went to General Meigs he would tell me that McGonnigle was in charge of cemeteries, and I should go and see him. I went to General Meigs about ten days ago and told him I would be summoned as a witness, and asked him if he would prefer hearing this testimony with reference to Mr. Chenoweth, or whether he would prefer to get it from the Military Committee. He said he would rather get it from the Military Committee.

Q. You said you understood that Chenoweth had told other parties that he owed you money?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He acknowledged to other parties that he owed you sums of money, did he?—A. Borrowed money, I understood.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. This money that you gave him was loaned money, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was given him for no corrupt or bad purpose?—A. No; He pleaded poverty in the beginning; said he had no money to pay his hotel-bill or anything else, and tried constantly to get things out of me. I am satisfied that when he tried to get that horse and that watch his idea was to keep them, because another contractor has told me that he tried to sell the watch to him. He is willing to be qualified that he tried to sell that watch.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL:

Q. Who is that contractor?—A. Mr. A. W. Sweeny, at 313 Thirteenth street, southwest.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How much money did you give him in all, including the watch?—A. About $150.

Q. Did he inspect your work?—A. Yes.

Q. Did he make a favorable report?—A. No, sir; he did not.

Q. Do you think the giving of this money and the watch had any influence in his report of your work?—A. No, sir; I think that the only thing that influenced him was that he could not get money enough. After I reported the matter and showed up his way of doing business and his incapacity to the Department, he appeared to be terribly prejudiced, and said he had got rid of all the other contractors but one, and he intended to get rid of him. His brother was a bidder on some of the work.

Adjourned.

NORTH CAROLINA COTTON CLAIMS.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following

R E P O R T :

[To accompany bill H. R. 1146.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1146) for the relief of the State of North Carolina, having had the same under advisement, report :

It appears from the evidence submitted to your committee that the State of North Carolina, at the conclusion of the recent war, was the owner of several lots of cotton located at different places in the State of Georgia. It appears also that W. W. Holden, provisional governor of North Carolina, deputed J. J. Litchford, a duly-authorized agent of said State, to proceed, in the summer of 1865, to the State of Georgia, for the purpose of collecting and transporting to market such cotton as belonged to said State of North Carolina, which he was directed, when in market, to dispose of for the use and benefit of said State. Said agent found stored in a warehouse in Thomasville, Ga., according to the receipts of said warehouse, 347 bales of cotton, recognized and labeled as the property of the said State of North Carolina. It further appears that Colonel W. K. Kimball, of the Twelfth Maine Volunteers, was instructed to take possession of all warehouses in said Thomasville supposed to contain cotton belonging to the Confederate States. In the execution of this order he was necessitated to hold military surveillance over said warehouses until the arrival of a regular Treasury agent, which did not occur until August 15, 1865.

On that date United States Treasury Agent A. G. Brown did seize all cotton stored in the warehouses of Thomasville, Ga., and proceeded to ship it, via Savannah, to Simeon Draper, United States cotton-agent at New York, by whom it was sold, and the net proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury of the United States. Relative to this lot of 347 bales, seized at the place aforesaid by said Treasury agent, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to Congress, dated February 1, 1875, (see Senate Ex. Doc. No. 23, 2d sess. 43d Cong., pp. 44, 45,) reports the seizure, at Thomasville, by said agent, of only 331 bales, 75 of which were given to contractors, 10 sold in Savannah, and 246 shipped to and sold by United States cotton-agent at New York, Simeon Draper. The net proceeds of said 246 bales of cotton paid into the Treasury of the United States, per report of the Secretary of the Treasury, was $36,462.43.

And it further appears that the agent of the State of North Carolina collected, in September, 1865, 161 bales stored at Columbus, and 14 stored at Genoa, Ga., in all 175 bales, which he, the said agent, in obedience to his instructions from Governor Holden, shipped via Apalachicola to New York, where it was seized, April 16, 1866, by Simeon Draper, United States cotton agent, sold, and the net proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury was $6,070.11. (See Senate Ex. Doc. No. 23, pp. 56, 57.)

A third lot of 70 bales of cotton, belonging to said State, was also seized by Treasury agents in the month of January, 1866, the proceeds of which the Secretary of the Treasury refunded to said State in the summer of 1874, by the authority of the 5th section of an act approved May 18, 1872, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the proceeds of all cotton seized after June 30, 1865.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in paying for the 70 bales aforesaid, recognized the right of the State of North Carolina to recover the net proceeds in the Treasury of the United States of all cotton belonging to said State which had been seized after the cessation of hostilities.

The net proceeds of the 246 and the 175 bales of North Carolina cotton would have been paid for by the Secretary of the Treasury at the same time he refunded the proceeds of the 70 bales, but it was alleged that the said lots of 246 and 175 bales were not seized in violation of the act of May 18, 1872. This objection your committee believe was purely technical, as appears from the subsequent report to Congress of the Secretary of the Treasury; for, by reference to Senate Ex. Doc. No. 23, 2d sess. 43d Cong., it is shown that all the cotton claimed by the State of North Carolina was, in fact and in truth, seized after June 30, 1865.

By the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated May 29, 1865, it was declared that pardon and amnesty, with the restoration of all rights of property, (except as to slaves,) is hereby granted to all persons, &c. In pursuance of this proclamation, the Secretary of the Treasury, in a circular-letter, dated June 27, 1865, and addressed to Treasury agents, forbade them to seize any cotton unless it was known to be the property of the Confederate States.

Notwithstanding the positive instructions set forth in the circular-letter aforesaid, which forbade, most emphatically, the seizure of private property, the agents of the Government, in violation of the President's proclamation, and the circular-letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, did seize the lots of cotton aforesaid, belonging to the State of North Carolina, 85 bales of which no returns are made, and $12,000 expenses charged against the illegal seizure and sale of 421 bales.

It is clear to your committee, from all the facts and evidence, that the seizure and sale of said cotton was in contravention of law, consequently illegal and unauthorized, and that the net proceeds now in the Treasury, as shown by the report of the Secretary, should be refunded to the State without further delay. And your committee find the sum due the State of North Carolina, per the Secretary's report, to be—

For the 246 bales.....	$36,462 43
For the 175 bales.....	6,070 11
Total.....	42,532 54

E. J. GURLEY.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to a Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill H. R. 593.]

The Committee on Claims have examined the petition and testimony affecting the claim of E. J. Gurley, of McLennan County, Texas, and find that the petitioner asks payment of two claims for attorney's fees for services rendered to the Government by employment of officers of the Government. The first is for professional services in the prosecution of Peter Garland and some eighteen other persons, charged with the murder of seven Caddo Indians, in Palo Pinto County, Texas. The petitioner, Mr. Gurley, has been for many years a practicing lawyer at Waco, Tex., and during the year 1859 he was employed by Major Robert S. Neighbours, superintendent of Indians in Texas, to prosecute said Garland and others. The defendants, nineteen in number, were charged with the murder of seven friendly Indians of the Caddo tribe, of the Brazos agency, in Texas, on the 27th day of December, 1858.

On the 14th day of January, 1859, said superintendent of Indians made affidavit before Hon. N. W. Battle, judge of the district court, in whose district said offense was charged to have been committed, alleging the perpetration of the crime, and that no peace-officer residing in said county could be procured to execute a warrant of arrest against said offenders. So great was the indignation among the people along the frontier of Texas adjacent to the Indian reservation, on account of the outrages committed by the Indians upon the white people, and so thoroughly were the entire people in sympathy with the defendants, that the civil officers refused to execute the process of the court. The petitioner, then, on the 17th day of January, 1859, obtained an order from said district judge, directed to Captain John S. Ford, commanding a company of Texas rangers on the Texas frontier, and commanding him with the force under him to arrest the defendants and bring them before the court for trial; but Captain Ford was himself a frontier man and had been fighting Indians all his life, and had frontier men under him who had been compelled to take the field to protect themselves and families from Indian depredations, and he and they were also in sympathy with the defendants, and he refused to execute the process. The petitioner then applied to Governor H. R. Runnels for an order to Captain Ford to execute the process. After a great deal of trouble and delay, the order was executed, but it was found, when the issue was made and met, that the courts were powerless and the laws silent in the presence of a whole population in arms for their own protection and the protection of their defenders.

The prosecution shared the fate of the civil power; it passed away in the presence of an irresistible force. An accommodation was finally had that removed the Indians out of the State, and the troubles arising out of these charges and all others from the same source passed away with the removal of the Indians. The part taken by Mr. Gurley, as prosecutor for the United States, involved him in great personal danger, as the sentiment of the country was overwhelmingly with the accused. He was continually threatened by armed men, and the whole population were in bitter hostility to him; but notwithstanding the peril in which he was placed and the loss of business his relation to the accused caused him, he firmly and faithfully pressed the prosecution and exerted himself with great courage, industry, and perseverance till the civil power subsided in the presence of an assemblage of armed men, which the State was unwilling to meet and overcome with force. All of this occurred in a district where Mr. Gurley had a large practice, almost all of which was sacrificed by his employment in these causes. Hon. John Hancock, now a member of Congress, and his law partner, states his service to be worth not less than $5,000; Judge Battle says not less than $2,500 or $3,000. He has also testimony of other citizens of Texas, and among them the governor of Texas; the Indian agent, Colonel Ross, and others; all testifying to the courage, ability, and efficiency with which he discharged the duties of his position. We therefore think he is entitled to the relief he asks, and for this branch of his case we report as a reasonable compensation the sum of $1,000.

The facts in the other case are: That on the 16th day of April, 1854, Capt. R. H. Anderson, United States Army, was ordered by Brig.-Gen. W. S. Harney to proceed with a detachment of men under his command to Fort Graham, in Hill County, Texas, and arrest Asst. Surg. Josephus M. Steiner, and convey him to Austin, Tex., for trial before court-martial for killing Maj. R. A. Arnold, his superior officer, who was at that time in command of the fort. His orders stated that "H. P. Brewster, esq., a gentleman of legal learning, would accompany him and give such advice as the exigencies of the mission might require." Sickness in Mr. Brewster's family at the time of Captain Anderson's departure prevented him from accompanying the command, and Captain Anderson proceeded without him and arrested Dr. Steiner in Hill County, Texas, while he was claimed by the sheriff of said county as his prisoner and in his lawful custody, and proceeded with him toward Austin as far as Waco, where he and his detachment were arrested by legal process on a charge of rescuing the prisoner Steiner from the custody of the sheriff of Hill County, the penalty for which offense was confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary not less than five years nor more than ten years. In consequence of the absence of Mr. Brewster, Captain Anderson employed the firm of which Mr. Gurley was a member to defend himself and his men, and advised his superior officers of what he had done. On the trial by the examining court the men under his command were discharged, but he was held to answer before the district court of Hill County, to which he was remanded, and by which he was tried and acquitted, the petitioner acting as his counsel during the trial.

This claim was before Congress at a previous term, on the petition of the applicant asking for $5,000. The circumstances surrounding this case are similar to the facts in the former case. The attorney in this case had to contend against a whole people whose sympathies were all for Steiner, and whose passions were aroused fiercely against Captain Anderson and his men, for what they considered a flagrant act of wili-tary usurpation, and the victim of that outrage a man of unbounded popularity with them. On the 4th day of June, 1858, the Senate Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill to the Senate for the relief of petitioners for the sum of $1,500, (Cong. Globe, vol. 36, part 3, page 2699.) January 31, 1860, the same committee reported a bill for $1,000, (vol. 39, part 1, page 647,) which was afterward passed by the Senate and sent to the House, (vol. 40, part 3, page 1451.) In the House the Judiciary Committee reported back the Senate bill to the House and recommended its passage, (vol. 41, part 3, page 2354.) The bill on a point of order was sent to the Committee of the Whole, and was not reached in the calendar during the session. The claim of the petitioner is meritorious and just, and considering the long time that has elapsed during which the petitioner has remained unpaid, and that the Senate have twice reported in favor of its payment, once at $1,500, and once at $1,000, the committee feel that the sum of $1,000 is but reasonable compensation, and they report in favor of paying said amount for said services in defending Captain Anderson and his men. They therefore report the accompanying bill as a substitute for the House bill, providing for payment of both of said claims, and recommend its passage.

THOMAS M. HOWARD.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to a Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill H. R. 3766.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3766) for the relief of Thomas M. Howard, of Lewis County, Missouri, have considered the same, and report as follows:

It appears from the records of the Post-Office Department that Thomas M. Howard, of Lewis County, Missouri, was mail-contractor on route No. 10471^a, in the State of Missouri, in the year 1861. It is admitted by the Department that Mr. Howard rendered the service to the Government, and that there is due him the small balance of $111.63, which sum, says the Department, "cannot be settled until Congress makes an appropriation for that purpose." The committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 31st ultimo, addressed to the honorable Postmaster-General and referred to this office, I have the honor to inform you that Thomas M. Howard was a contractor on route No. 10471^a, in the State of Missouri, in 1861, and there appears to be a balance of $111.63 due for mail service on said route from April 1 to November 1, 1861.

This account cannot be settled by this office until Congress makes an appropriation for that purpose.

Very respectfully,

J. M. MCGREW, Auditor.

Hon. J. M. GLOVER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

JOSEPH W. PARISH.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to a Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill S. 830.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 830) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish, submit the following report:

In December, 1863, Hadley & Co. had a transaction with the commissary of subsistence at Louisville, Ky., by which they agreed and undertook to deliver 2,000 barrels of pork. This they failed to do.

In 1865, Joseph W. Parish, the party asking relief under this bill, had (for the firm of Parish & Co.) a large contract, which he was then engaged in fulfilling, to furnish ice to the medical department of the Army at New Orleans, was under heavy bonds, and this contract demanded his constant attention; any day's delay or neglect endangering its violation, and rendering him liable to heavy penalties.

He was in Saint Louis, and an order was issued from Louisville for his arrest, because it was believed that he was interested in the Hadley & Co. bid, either as a silent partner or in some manner, and as the Government had suffered a loss by such failure, and such loss had not been made good otherwise, Parish should be held for the same. He protested against such liability, but was, nevertheless, taken before the proper authorities, and, after taking counsel, in view of his other engagement, (on his ice contract, the neglect of which would be most disastrous,) it was deemed advisable to pay the amount demanded, to wit, $4,280, which he accordingly paid under protest, and was thereupon released from the military arrest. The object of this bill is to refund this amount with interest.

The matter was long pending before the proper executive officers. On the 7th of April last, the Third Auditor held that there was no law under which the accounting-officers of the Treasury could entertain such claim, and it was therefore disallowed for want of jurisdiction.

The Second Comptroller held and found, on the 12th of the same month, that Mr. Parish appeared, from the evidence, to have a just and meritorious claim against the United States to the amount of $4,280, but that settlement of such questions did not lie within the jurisdiction of the accounting-officers of the Treasury, nor was there an implied assumpsit for the torts of its officers.

Under such circumstances, if Mr. Parish cannot be relieved by Congress, he is without remedy.

It seems to be quite clear that the officer ordering the arrest acted upon a mere suspicion that Parish was interested in the bid of Hadley & Co., a suspicion quite unfounded. He is vouched for by several persons as a man of integrity and veracity, and in his petition and papers denies under oath most flatly such interest. In this he is corroborated by other witnesses.

Under such circumstances, we cannot doubt his right to relief, and we therefore report back the accompanying bill with the two amendments of the Senate, and recommend its passage.

O

D. W. PRICE AND THOMAS AKERS.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following

REPORT :

[To accompany bill H. R. 4074.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1464) for the relief of D. W. Price and Thomas Akers, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to make the following report :

On or about the 17th of July, 1867, the petitioners were the owners of 141 barrels of whisky, which were stored in the bonded warehouse of Cuthbert & Cunningham, in the city of Brooklyn, third revenue district of New York. Afterward, in the month of April, 1868, information was lodged with the district attorney for said district alleging that said whisky was not under proper bond. One of said claimants, Mr. Akers, hearing thereof, went to John E. Risley, Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who, it appears from the proofs, introduced Akers to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Rollins, and thereupon both the Commissioner and the Deputy Commissioner informed said Akers that the collector had no right to seize said whisky, and that he need incur no expense of inspection for any such purpose; that the whisky being in bond, the Government was in no danger of losing the tax, and that the claimant ran no risk.

Relying upon this assurance, the claimant went off to the State of Ohio, where he learned, by indirection, that proceedings had been instituted in the eastern district of New York for the forfeiture of said whisky on the ground aforesaid; which proceedings were instituted on the 8th day of April, 1868, and an order of publication thereof was made, returnable the 25th day of April, 1868. Immediately on the receipt of this information the claimant, on the 23d of April, 1868, wrote from Columbus, Ohio, to said Deputy Commissioner, reminding him of the assurances made to the claimant by said Deputy Commissioner and Commissioner. Thereafter the said Commissioner, on the 5th day of May, wrote to the collector of said district, directing him to discontinue the proceedings instituted for the forfeiture of said whisky. Before the receipt of this letter, however, judgment of forfeiture had been rendered and the property sold.

These 141 barrels of whisky belonged to one firm; and although the 141 barrels were libeled and proceeded against as one parcel and one case, and the order of publication stated the case to be "The United States against 141 barrels of whisky," yet on the return-day of said writ the informer represented the case to the district attorney as being three arcels of whisky, belongiug to three separate owners, and thereupon the action was changed to three suits, against 47 barrels of whisky in each case, and without any further notice of this change of the cause of action and of the parties, judgment thereon was rendered on the 27th of April, 1868; by which the fees and rewards of the informer were greatly enhanced. The proceeds of the sale of this whisky amounted to $9,300; of which $3,917.46 was consumed as fees of marshal, clerk, and informer, and the remainder, $5,382.58, was paid into the Treasury of the United States. The alleged ground for this seizure and forfeiture was, as claimed by the Government officials, the insufficiency of the bond, although no such specific allegation appears in the information to have been lodged in the case.

The proofs submitted to the committee would seem to establish that the bond in this case was amply sufficient; and it further appears to have been both the policy and custom of the Internal Revenue Department not to insist upon a forfeiture of such property where the same was stored in a Government warehouse, for the reason that this custody of the property was the best security for the Government, while its enforced sale very frequently resulted in the loss of the Government tax. The petitioners claim the full amount realized on the sale of this whisky. It is true that this whisky was forfeited under a judicial proceeding, and it might be said that, constructively, the claimants had their day in court; but it does seem to your committee to be clear and just, upon every principle of law and equity, that where the Government itself, through its own accredited and authorized agents, informed the claimant, upon application, that he was in no danger, and assured him that the matter would be stopped, and he went off relying upon that assurance, and the Government, nevertheless, in violation of such assurance, proceeded summarily and hastily to seize and dispose of the whisky to the great detriment and injury of claimants, the Government should make restitution. That a court of equity would enforce such a rule of simple and plain justice between two citizens, there is no question. If a party by himself, or his authorized agent, mislead another to his injury, the party thus misleading will not be permitted to profit by his own bad faith or conduct. As the Government did not, however, receive the whole sum of $9,300 for which the whisky sold, your committee, as a matter of equity and a fair adjustment of the case between the claimants and the Government, only recommend an allowance to the claimants of the sum of $5,382.58, the amount actually covered into the Treasury; for which sum they report back a bill with a favorable recommendation.

ALEXANDER & CO.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to a Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following

REPORT :

[To accompany bill H. R. 3161.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3161) for the relief of Alexander & Co., of Fayetteville, Tenn., having had the same under advisement, report :

That the firm of Alexander & Co. was composed of W. S. Alexander, E. L. Allen, and N. B. Alexander, the last-named being now dead. Said firm were engaged under the internal-revenue laws of the United States from about the 1st day of December, 1866, until about April, 1867, in the distillation of spirits in Lincoln County, Tennessee, during which time they manufactured a lot of whisky, amounting to 2,286 wine-gallons, which were seized by the Government officers of the United States under the following circumstances, at Huntsville, Ala., while in transitu to Memphis, Tenn., about May 1, 1867: Said whisky had been regularly gauged by T. O. Crawford, an inspector of the United States, and a permit to ship the same had been obtained from the collector of the district, as appears from copies of the permits filed with the papers. Said seizures and detentions were made by the Government on a charge that there were more proof-gallons of whisky in said barrels than had been assessed thereon.

At the time of said permits the section of country in which said distillery was located had only recently come under the supervision of internal-revenue officers. Officers and distillers, to a certain extent, were ignorant of the laws and regulations, and particularly the mode of ascertaining the proof-gallons of spirits, as defective instruments were used in gauging. This appears from the fact that a short time after said whisky was seized it was regauged, and found to contain upward of five hundred proof-gallons more than the same gauger had only a few days before gauged it at. The matter was referred to the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who refused to declare the same forfeited to the Government, on the grounds that there was no intentional fraud in the case, and that the irregularity was more the fault of the Government officers than of the distillers; whereupon he directed the collector, Mr. Joseph Ramsey, to release the same upon the payment of the taxes thereon. It appears that the distillers were unable to raise the money to pay the taxes except out of the sale of the whisky, and the whisky was retained by the Government officer, Mr. Joseph Ramsey, on deposit in Huntsville, Ala., and who appointed one W. M. Alexander as his special agent, or as the agent of the Government, to sell said whisky for the purpose of discharging the taxes due thereon. The total amount of taxes due to the Government amounted to about $4,222, on 2,286 wine gallons. The whisky itself was worth about $3.25 per gallon at that time, making $7,429. The whisky at no time was under the dominion or control of the claimants.

It appears from the testimony that the agent took charge of the whisky in May, 1867; that it was stored with the firm of Neil & Sprague, of Huntsville, Ala., private merchants, there being no bonded warehouse in that place. The store-house was a large single room, which the firm used as a grocery-store, the whisky being in the same room, where it remained until the last of the lot was sold in December, 1867. It appears from the testimony that said agent, W. M. Alexander, applied several times to John Faris, United States deputy collector at Huntsville, Ala., for permission to remove said whisky elsewhere, upon the ground that it was being stolen, which requests were refused by said Faris, upon the ground that he had no authority for doing the same. There was not a sufficient demand at Huntsville for whisky to place the whole lot on the market at one time, and the agent could force only about six or eight barrels per month on the market. It also appears that the agent informed Mr. Ramsey, the collector, that the whisky was being stolen, and he asked him for permission to ship the same elsewhere, which was refused. It also appears that the cooperage and material of the barrels containing said whisky were excellent, and the whisky could not have been lost from leakage.

The agent proves that in May, 1867, all of the barrels were full of whisky, except a small deficiency, caused by evaporation, in each barrel. He further proves that when he finished selling it in December, 1867, said forty-eight barrels had only yielded about nine hundred and fifty gallons, all told. Said agent further proves that he sold said whisky at the rate of $3.25 per wine gallon, realizing therefrom, after paying storage and charges thereon, $2,777.27. He further proves that he paid all of said sum of $2,777.27 to Collector Ramsey and his deputy in Lincoln County, S. T. Farrar. The vouchers for the payment of the amount are filed with the papers. It further appears that the charges and commissions for selling the same amounted to about $300. It also appears from the testimony of J. S. Alexander that he was employed to convey said whisky from the distillery in Lincoln County, Tennessee, to Huntsville, Ala., a distance of about twenty-five miles, and that he did deliver the same to the firm of Neil & Sprague in good condition, and with the barrels all full of whisky, for the purpose, on the part of Alexander & Co., to have it shipped in a day or two to Memphis, Tenn., and that the same was seized a few days after its delivery.

It appears that after the payment of the $2,777.27 taxes to the Government, a balance remained unpaid of $1,444, that amount being the deficiency of tax; which latter amount, after being suspended in collection by the Government for six or eight years, was revived and pressed for collection, as your committee believe, through the selfishness of the informer, who seemed to be willing to sacrifice the property of the distillers, who had been acquitted of any fraudulent intentions by the Government officials, in order to obtain his moiety, as he uses this language in his communication to the Commissioner: "Self is, nevertheless, a subject of concern in this connection." Opposed to this, the claimants insist that, after deducting said $1,444, the Government is equitably and justly indebted to them in the sum of $3,207, with interest thereon, say, from January 1, 1868. In a transaction between private citizens, your committee are of opinion that the claim of Alexander & Co. would be a valid, equitable set-off against the collection of such a claim as the Government proposed to enforce against them. The Government, after the seizure of said whisky, took it from the dominion and control of the distillers, and became a trustee—first, to apply the proceeds to the payment of the taxes due thereon, and second, to hold whatever balance remained in trust for the benefit of the distillers.

The committee are satisfied that while the Government, through its agent, had possession of said whisky, a large quantity of the same was stolen, or in some other way lost, and that the loss cannot, upon any principle of equity, be visited upon the distillers; that the Government would be estopped from inflicting such a loss upon the distillers, because it was the occasion of the loss itself.

Notwithstanding the claimants had lost the whole of their whisky through the action and default of the Government officials; the revenue collector of the fourth district of Tennessee, the successor of Joseph Ramsey, who was the collector at the time of the removal of the whisky from Lincoln County to Huntsville, finding that there was a supposed balance of tax remaining unpaid, notified Hon. D. D. Pratt, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of such fact, and after correspondence on the subject the collector was permitted to issue his distraint-warrant, bearing date January 21, 1876, directed to W. B. Nicks, deputy collector, who resides in Lincoln County, Tennessee, instructing him to distrain property of the claimants to the amount of $2,984.32, which included the tax, interest, and damages, and said deputy collector distrained the property of E. L. Allen, one of the claimants, consisting of sundry town lots and tracts of land in Lincoln County, valued, as is alleged by the claimant, at something like $10,000; and, after giving notice, the said deputy collector, Nicks, exposed the same to sale, the claimant, Allen, protesting against the right of the Government to make such sale. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue declined to suspend the sale, and the claimant was forced to apply to Congress for relief or sue the collector on his official bond.

Believing that Congress would be willing to protect him against the hardships of the case, he has seen fit, on behalf of himself and surviving partner, to make this application to Congress. The mere statement of the facts of the case, that the Government got the proceeds of the whole forty-eight barrels of whisky, and has since sold, say, $10,000 worth of the real estate of one of the claimants, thereby reducing him to penury and leaving him without a home to shelter his family, would be manifestly a hardship, alike unjust and unconscionable, and your committee feel that it would be only a partial indemnity to the claimants to refund the balance of the tax, damages, and costs, amounting to about $3,000, which the Government realized in the sale of said property. In a court of equity the claimants would have been entitled to all the balance of the value of the whisky remaining after the payment of the tax, which excess in their favor the proof shows to be from $3,000 to $4,000.

But inasmuch as the claimants ask only to have the amount remitted or refunded which was collected by the Government in the sale of said property, your committee do not feel authorized to go beyond the amount asked for at the hands of Congress, and they are content to recommend the payment of the $3,000 demanded in the bill for their benefit.

Your committee think it proper to state that the real cause of the seizure of said whisky grew out of the collector of the fourth revenue district of Tennessee, Joseph Ramsey, granting a permit to the claimants to ship the same from the district before the payment of the taxes. The revenue collector took the written obligation of the claimants to pay the taxes when they had shipped the whisky and sold the same in Memphis, Tenn., at the same time giving them a receipt acknowledging the payment of the taxes. The collector, in a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, dated May 28, 1867, in explanation of his conduct, after describing the embarrassments in the execution of his duties, says:

In this state of things, in order to enable the manufacturer to dispose of his whisky for consumption, so they could realize the money and pay the taxes, said whisky never having been in public bonded warehouse, Class B, and understanding that in most places in Alabama and Mississippi there were no public bonded warehouses to send it to, we did not see how we could do better than to permit the owners to transport their whisky under their own private bond, with security for the taxes in thirty days, feeling that by their bond we had the tax secured.

The then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, E. A. Rollins, in a letter addressed to the collector, Joseph Ramsey, says:

I am of opinion, from all the evidence before me in this case, that Alexander & Co. are not so much in fault in this matter as the revenue officers in your district. The apparent fraud seemingly arises rather from neglect or want of knowledge of duties on the part of officers than fraud on the part of Alexander & Co. From all the facts that are before this office, I have decided to release the spirits of Alexander & Co., if, in your opinion, they have not knowingly violated the law.

It appears from this that the question was determined by the proper Department, which is conclusive against the Government as to the good faith of the claimants, leaving nothing but the real question of equities to be adjusted between the Government and these parties for the loss of the whisky while in possession of the Government, to which the claimants were subjected as set forth; and the committee are content to report back the bill with the following amendment: After the word "whisky," in line 7, insert the words and property; and as thus amended they recommend that it do pass.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCCRARY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill H. R. 4075.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred bill H. R. 2416, respectfully report—

That by the original Pacific Railroad act, approved July 1, 1862, giving aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, it is provided that the main or trunk line of the road should begin at the one hundredth meridian of longitude, and at a point between two hundred and three hundred miles west of the city of Omaha, situated on the Missouri River. At the same time several roads or branches were provided for to start on said river at Omaha and at points from one hundred to two hundred miles above and below that city, viz :

1. The branch running from Omaha, known as the Iowa branch. This was required to be, and has been, built by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, (sec. 14.)

2. The Sioux City branch, starting at Sioux City, on said river, and about one hundred miles north of Omaha. This, by this act, was required to be built by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, (sec. 14,) but by the amendatory act of 1864 could be built by another company, (sec. 17, act of 1864.)

3. The Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad, to start at the mouth of the Kansas River, being a point also on the Missouri River, more than a hundred miles South of Omaha. (Sec. 9.) This road is now known as the Kansas Pacific Railroad.

4. The Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company, whose road ran across the State of Missouri, was allowed to extend its road from Saint Joseph, a point on the same river, so as to intersect the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad branch last above described, or to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad at the one hundredth meridian or with the Iowa branch at any point east of the said one hundredth meridian. (See sec. 13, act 1867.)

To the several companies that should build the main line from the one hundredth meridian to the Pacific Ocean and these several branches, the Government gave large subsidies of land, and advanced the bonds of the United States, sufficient to almost, if not wholly, construct them.

The purpose of the act was national, to facilitate the transmission of the mails, troops, and supplies, to develop the country and serve the public generally. For this such large bounty was given, and the companies became the well-paid agents or instruments to effect such purpose. These branches not only ran through Nebraska and Kansas, but met at the Missouri River, the several roads extending from the east through Iowa and Missouri. Where companies did not exist proposing or asking to build any of the branches, the act, in order to carry out the general purpose, required the Union Pacific Railroad Company to build them, as in the cases of the Iowa branch and the Sioux City branch.

"The general object is further evinced by the provision contained in the same act (sec. 12) which requires that "the whole line of the said railroad and branches and telegraph shall be operated and used for all purposes of communication, travel, and transportation, so far as the public and Government are concerned, as one connected, continuous line."

To meet demands in the same direction, and further advance the public interest should occasion require, section 18 says :

And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, * * * Congress may at any time—having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein—add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

By an amendatory act, approved July 2, 1864, Congress did add to and amend said act. Among the alterations made are the following:

1. The subsidy was largely increased.
2. Power is given to bridge the Missouri River and other streams. (Sec. 9, act 1864.)

3. The road and branches are not only required to be operated as a connected continuous line, as demanded by section 12 of the original act, but "in such operation to afford and secure to each equal advantages and facilities, as to rates, time, and transportation, without discrimination," &c. (Sec. 15.)

4. By sections 18, 19, and 20 the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, a corporation of Iowa, which was building a road across Iowa, was authorized to extend its road from the point on the Missouri River, some thirty miles south of Omaha, where it struck said river, and join the Union Pacific Railroad at the 100th meridian, or the Iowa branch heretofore referred to, at any point east of said meridian.

Section 15, however, of this amendatory act, which provides that the several companies, in operating the main line and the several branches, shall "afford and secure to each equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time, and transportation, without any discrimination," refers to "the aforesaid roads," and therefore does not literally in terms include the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad extension provided for in these latter sections. Nevertheless, in our opinion, it was the purpose of Congress to constitute this extension a branch, and to place it in the same relation and upon a like footing as the other branches then already provided for.

1. The authority for its construction and junction with the main road or one of its branches is found in the Pacific Railroad act, which the Pacific Railroad Company accepted, and under which it built its road and Iowa branch.

2. The section authorizing it compels it, like the other branches, to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad not farther west than the 100th meridian.

3. Its construction was authorized with a like view to serving the public interest, as the means for building it were largely supplied by the munificent land grant it received from the Government. This public purpose would be largely destroyed if the Union Pacific Railroad Company can deny it connection, or permit it to be operated in connection with its road only upon such terms as said Union Pacific Railroad Company may impose. If, as is charged, those who choose to pass over this branch, after paying fare for its length of nearly two hundred miles, must, on going west, pay to the Union Pacific Railroad Company the same fare from the point of junction as from Omaha, the use of this branch is almost forbidden.

4. Section 20, referred to, says: "And the said company" (the Burlington and Missouri River Company) "shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities granted to the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company by the said last-mentioned act so far as the same may be applicable." The "last-mentioned act" means the act of 1862.

Now, there is no feature or provision peculiar to said Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad except that it was authorized to connect with the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad branch, or directly with the Union Pacific Railroad or its Iowa branch, and the further provision that it should receive subsidy for but one hundred miles—as from the point at Saint Joseph it could and naturally would do with either within that distance. But neither point can be applied to the Burlington and Missouri Railroad extension.

In terms, it was required to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad or its Iowa branch, and it was wholly impracticable to connect with the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad branch. Again, in terms, it was to receive subsidy for the full number of miles it should build, and therefore the one hundred mile restriction has no application.

But, in common with the other branches provided for in the act of 1862, it was to be operated in connection with the main line, under section 12 of that act, as a "connected continuous line." To this extent the reference in section 20 of this amendatory act to the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad may be applied. But this would have been as well effected by giving the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company the same privileges and immunities as had been given to the other branches, and this, no doubt, was thought to have been effected by the terms used.

This being so, no ground exists for contending that it was not the purpose of Congress to confer alike upon this branch with the others the added privilege of bridging the Missouri River, found in section 9 of the amendatory act, and the more enlarged and better defined regulations contained in section 15 of the same act respecting the operation of the main road and branches as to pro-rata terms and against discrimination. To carry out this original intent of Congress, by declaring the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad such branch, is the object of this bill.

But whatever may be the opinion respecting the original intention of Congress in this regard, there is no doubt but that Congress has the power to regulate the relations and operation of the several railroads chartered and subsidized by its authority. To do so as is proposed in the bill is due to the public and just and equitable to these roads.

1. From the point of junction to the Missouri River the distance by each road is about the same; that is to say, from Omaha, on the Missouri River, to Kearney, where the roads join, the distance over the Union Pacific Railroad, or rather over the Iowa branch, which is owned and operated by the Union Pacific Railroad, is 195 miles; from Platts-mouth, on the same river, where the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad extension begins, it is 191 miles to Kearney.

2. Neither road has any advantage as respects grade, both running over an almost entirely level country.

3. The objection that the Union Pacific should not be subjected to a pro-rata basis in its connection with this branch because of the heavier grade of the former through the mountainous region has not much force. For 300 miles and more west of the point of junction, and till the city of Cheyenne is reached, the Union Pacific Road continues to run in the level valley of the Platte. For this distance, at least, neither road has any advantage, and it is over this that the chief use occurs as far as the Burlington and Missouri branch is concerned.

The majority of the roads running from Chicago, and over which through or national business will go, center at Omaha. This Burlington and Missouri Railroad proper, it is true, starts at Chicago, or the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Road, in connection with which it runs, does. But this extension of it runs through, and is met by roads passing through, a rich agricultural section, and the value of it consists, as far as its connection with the Union Pacific Railroad is concerned, in furnishing a means to send westward such products and supplies as are demanded at the military posts and Indian reservations. These posts and reservations lie largely north of, and are reached from, Cheyenne and points east of it. A leading purpose expressed in the Pacific Railroad acts is that of facilitating the transmission of troops and supplies. The unjust discrimination practiced by the Union Pacific Railroad Company complained of virtually shuts out competition for furnishing supplies to the Government from that quarter traversed by the Burlington and Missouri Railroad extension, thereby working an injustice to both the Government and those settlers who might otherwise compete.

Again, it will be recollected that in aiding in the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad the Government advanced its bonds for one hundred and fifty miles of the road west of Cheyenne, for that which was supposed to be the work-difficult of construction, to the extent of $48,000 per mile, or three times the amount allowed for constructing the road east of Cheyenne. For the remainder of the road west of that city double the amount, or $32,000 per mile, was allowed.

Again, it may be answered that west of Cheyenne, and along the Union Pacific Railroad, lie the vast coal-beds belonging to that company. It may be submitted whether, in view of the proximity to and comparative cheapness of coal, the leading item of expense in the operation of railroads, any more cost attends the running of the Union Pacific Railroad west of Cheyenne than the running of the Burlington and Missouri Railroad extension.

4. It may be further urged, as a reason why the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad may be made a branch of the Union Pacific Railroad without doing any injustice to the company of the latter, that most of the branches originally provided for have not been built, and declaring this road one is but the substitution of a branch which should have been built. The Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad, provided for by the act of 1862, was subsequently permitted to run directly to Denver, in Colorado.

The Saint Joseph branch was never constructed.

The Sioux City branch, by subsequent authority, was not run southwesterly toward the 100th meridian, as originally intended, but was built down the Missouri River to a point near Omaha and connected with the Union Pacific Railroad immediately west and almost in sight of Omaha, almost wholly defeating its usefulness as a branch.

In fact, except the Iowa branch, which runs directly east from the 100th meridian to Omaha, and which is owned and operated by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad is about the only one which, from its length, point of connection, and direction, answers the public purpose of a branch as was contemplated in the first instance by Congress, and for which the Government paid so generously.

It may be added in support of the power of Congress, also as indicating its disposition, and particularly in answer to the objection that roads on this side of the mountains should not be allowed to prorate with a road running over both level and mountainous sections, that the last Congress, by act approved June 20, 1874, (vol. 18 U. S. Stat. at Large,) together with second section of act of March 3, 1869, (vol. 15 Stat. at Large, page 324,) constituted the Denver Pacific Railway a part of the Kansas Pacific Railroad, (formerly the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western branch,) bringing all under the operation of section 15 of the amendatory Pacific Railroad act before referred to.

Section 15 of the original Pacific Railroad act provides that "any other railroad company now incorporated, or hereafter to be incorporated, shall have the right to connect their road with the road and branches provided for by this act at such places and upon such just and equitable terms as the President of the United States may prescribe." In the opinion of your committee, it is competent for Congress, under the power reserved to alter or amend said act, to exercise itself directly the power to prescribe just and equitable terms to be observed in adjusting the relations between the main line and all branch or connecting lines.

Your committee report a substitute for the bill referred to them, and recommend its passage.

H. Rep. 809—2

FIDELIO S. HUNT.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to a Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill H. R. 3750.]

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3750) for the relief of Fidelio S. Hunt, beg leave to report:

The facts of the case are as follows: Fidelio S. Hunt was appointed by the President in the recess of the Senate, in August, 1865, as internal-revenue collector for the second district of Mississippi. His commission expired July 28, 1866. In June, 1866, he was re-appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and continued in office until May, 1867. During this period the Treasury account shows him debited with $2,953,954.86, and credited by $2,799,086.05, leaving a balance due by him of $155,024.96.

He was appointed at a period when, just after the close of the civil war between the States, there was great confusion in the State of Mississippi, due to the convulsions of its social condition and the disturbance of the relations between the planter and the laborer. He claims that he was compelled to employ many assistants, clerks, and collectors, and did all in his power honestly and faithfully to serve the Government. These employés, necessary, as he claims, to the full discharge of his duties, he paid; and as the law did not allow the number he employed or make provision for their payment, he notified the head of the Internal Revenue Office, and was told that Congress alone could afford any remedy.

The amount paid out for salaries was very large, and as the law did not authorize a credit for them, the administrator of the collector and his sureties cannot, in a suit now pending against them on the official bond of the collector, plead such payments as credits against the Government.

Another item of his claim is on account of taxes charged to him, but which he claims were bonded and taxes paid in New Orleans to the Government officials there, and for other taxes which he could not collect at all, because of the insolvency of the parties and for other reasons.

As these claims do not present a legal defense against the suit of the United States on the official bond, and as the Treasury Department has no power to act in the matter otherwise, so as to do him justice according to the very right of the case, the bill referred to the committee provides that the proper accounting-officers be authorized and directed to re-open and re-adjust the accounts of said Hunt; that he be allowed credit for all sums paid by him to employés, on proof that their employment was necessary and the compensation paid was reasonable. Also, that as to uncollected taxes, to allow proper credits therefor on proof that the collector was guilty of no culpable default, that he could not, by the exercise of due diligence, collect such taxes, and that he used due diligence to do so.

It seems to the committee that such relief is proper, and that upon the proof required by this act being furnished, justice demands that an honest and diligent officer should not be held liable for losses he could not avert, or for expenses personally incurred without which he could not have discharged the duties devolved upon him by the Government. The large amount collected in less than two years, nearly $3,000,000, shows the extent and importance of his duties, made more onerous and difficult of regular performance by the state of the country at that period.

The bill referred to the committee is therefore reported back, with some amendments deemed proper to guard the powers vested in the officers of the Treasury thereby more carefully, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

JOHN T. ARMSTRONG.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CABELL, from the Committee on War-Claims, submitted the following

R E P O R T :

[To accompany bill H. R. 4081.]

The Committee on War-Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4081) for the relief of John T. Armstrong, of Alexandria, report :

That John T. Armstrong has been a resident of Alexandria, Va., for many years, and adhered to the Government of the United States as a true and loyal citizen during the entire period of the late war, as well as before and since; that at the commencement of the late war said Armstrong was the "leasehold owner" of a certain wharf and appurtenances in the city of Alexandria; that said wharf was taken possession of by officers of the United States Government on or about the 1st day of June, 1863, and was held and used at intervals by the military authorities of the Government for Government purposes for the space of twenty-three months; that it was perhaps entirely necessary at the time that said property should be taken possession of by the Government, but it was well understood by the officers acting on behalf of the Government as well as said Armstrong that the latter should be paid a reasonable compensation for the use of the property; that at the time the Government was using said wharf the said Armstrong was paying rent for the same to the owners thereof in fee, and that no compensation whatever has been made to said Armstrong for or on account of said property; that just prior to the occupancy of said wharf by Quartermaster Ferguson, in behalf of the Government of the United States, said Armstrong had expended a considerable sum of money to put the property in repair, and that it was in good repair when taken possession of by United States officers, and proved of great value to the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army; that it appears by testimony that said Armstrong notified more than one Government official that he desired possession of his property during its occupancy as aforesaid, and that in lieu thereof he would demand $100 per month for the use and occupation thereof; that it appears that said property was worth, during the occupancy aforesaid by the Government, from $80 to $100 per month; that on account of irregularities of the quartermaster and others who occupied said property, payment was not made to said Armstrong for the same; that the Government authorities occupied said wharf from June 1, 1863, to March 4, 1864, and from June 1, 1864, to March 4, 1865, and from June 1, 1865, to November 1, 1865, making in all a period of twenty-three months, for which said space of twenty-three months your committee think that Mr. Armstrong should be paid at the rate of $80 per month, making the sum of $1,840, and report a bill for that amount, with recommendation that it do pass.

DR. A. G. TEBAULT.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CABELL, from the Committee on War-Claims, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill H. R. 4082.]

The Committee on War-Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Dr. A. G. Tebault, of Princess Anne County, Virginia, report:

That previous to and upon the 27th day of August, 1864, Capt. Thomas P. Jackson was superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau in Norfolk and adjoining counties, including the county of Princess Anne, in the State of Virginia. That prior to the period above named the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands had, under the authority of laws passed by the Congress of the United States, and in pursuance of the orders of the military commandant of the department in which was situated said last-named county, assumed entire control and management of a number of farms in said county, and assembled thereon a large number of freedmen, women, and children who were entirely dependent upon and supported by said bureau under the authority of law and the departmental commander as aforesaid. That on or about the said 27th day of August, 1864, the surgeon in charge of the sick and infirm upon said farms was ordered to the front, when said Capt. Thomas P. Jackson, in pursuance of the authority conferred upon him by law and by virtue of his position, contracted with Dr. Alfred G. Tebault, a gentleman of high character and eminence in his profession, to attend upon the sick and infirm located upon five Government farms situated near London Bridge, in said county of Princess Anne; that said Tebault was informed by said Jackson that he would be paid the same pay per month for his services rendered to said freed people as that paid to assistant surgeons of the United States Army; that, in pursuance of said employment, said Tebault entered upon the discharge of his duties, and so continued from the said 27th August, 1864, until 30th October, 1865, rendering not only his services but dispensing medicines and other necessities at his own expense to the occupants of said five farms, numbering upon an average 170 women and children, all of whom were helpless and destitute, and entirely dependent upon the Government, which had assumed their control, management, and support; that, according to the ample proof in the case, Dr. Tebault rendered valuable and efficient medical aid to the sick and infirm upon said farms during the period aforesaid, for which services and the medicines dispensed by him, owing to the irregular management of such matters incident to a period of war, he has never received any compensation whatever. Your committee find that it was usual during the period of the war for departmental commanders and their subordinates to employ by contract surgeons and physicians to attend upon the sick and wounded dependent upon the Government, when by any accident or mischance regular surgeons could not be spared from the field or from Government hospitals.

Your committee are also of the opinion that under the circumstances and in the interests of ordinary humanity, the said Captain Jackson was justified in employing said Dr. Tebault to take the care and charge of the sick and infirm upon the Government farms aforesaid, who, without such medical aid as incident to the care and support promised when they were placed upon said farms, would have greatly suffered. The testimony shows that the services of a physician and surgeon were at all times during the period referred to required by the situation of the inhabitants of said farms, and that said attention was rendered fully and faithfully by said Tebault, who rendered his services and dispensed his medicines under the employment aforesaid and in the full belief that he would be paid according to the terms of the contract entered into by him with Captain Jackson.

Your committee, therefore, report a substitute for said House bill, paying to Dr. Tebault the sum of $1,000 for services rendered and medicines furnished to the occupants of the farm aforesaid from August 27, 1864, to October, 1865, and recommend its passage.

STOCKBRIDGE AND MUNSEE INDIANS.

AUGUST 8, 1876.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill H. R. 4086.]

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George T. Bennett and others for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe of Indians in the State of Wisconsin, submit the following report:

That, prior to 1856, difficulties and dissensions of a serious character had for many years existed within said tribe, to allay which several treaties and laws had been made, but without effect. In 1856, for the purpose of settling all past differences in the tribe, and again uniting the members thereof in a common brotherhood, a treaty was concluded and signed by the individual members of the tribe, by which treaty the Indians surrendered their lands at Stockbridge and received in exchange the lands at Shawano, where they have ever since resided. By the terms of the treaty the lands at Shawano were to be allotted to the individual members of the tribe, heads of families, which was done immediately after their removal to their new home; and such allotments have ever since been occupied by the families to whom they were so assigned.

The treaty was satisfactory to the tribe, and all the members accepted it as a settlement of former difficulties, removed to the new reservation, and resided there in peace until 1871, at which time a minority of the tribe obtained the passage of a law through Congress, which, among other things, provided for an enrollment of the tribe, and the distribution of tribal funds according to such enrollment. This law and the enrollment under it were not opposed by any members of the tribe, none apprehending that any persons would be excluded who were parties to the treaty of 1856. When the enrollment under the act of 1871 was made, under the direction of the officers of the tribe, and who were principally instrumental in obtaining the law of 1871, a majority of the tribe were arbitrarily and, as the committee believe, wrongfully denied enrollment, for reasons existing before the treaty of 1856, and which apply with equal force to those who were enrolled under the law of 1871. After the completion of this enrollment, the minority, which had been enrolled, and constituting the de facto government, declared that those denied enrollment were not members of the tribe, and had no interest in tribal funds or in the reservation, and have re-allotted the lands of those excluded, assigning their homes, on which they have resided for twenty-five years, to members who were permitted to be enrolled under the act of 1871. The Government of the United States, in recognizing the de facto government as the proper government, has affirmed the said enrollment, and denied the excluded portion of the tribe any relief, referring the whole matter to Congress.

Following up their design to drive the majority of the tribe off the reservation, and absorb to their own use the tribal property, the minority have notified the excluded portion of said tribe to leave the reservation, and the Secretary of the Interior has directed their removal.

The committee have had this matter under consideration for several months, and have given it careful attention, and the committee believe that great injustice is intended to the portion of the tribe sought to be excluded from the reservation. They gave up their homes at Stockbridge and moved to this reservation under treaty stipulations, to which each one was a party. They have resided on the lots assigned to them for a quarter of a century, supposing them to be their own. They have no other homes, and, if driven away, they and their families will be beggars and vagrants.

The committee are of the opinion that whatever may have been the equities between the members of the tribe in regard to the lands occupied by it prior to the treaty of 1856, that treaty must be regarded as a settlement of all differences prior thereto, and that in virtue thereof every member of the tribe signing that treaty obtained an equal interest with every other member in the lands acquired by it, and the Government is bound to carry out in good faith the object sought to be accomplished by it.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill herewith reported.

MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

AUGUST 9, 1876.—Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHN B. CLARK, Jr., from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, by unanimous consent submitted the following

REPORT:

[Forty-fourth Congress, first session.]

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 14, 1876.

On motion of Mr. Morrison, from the Committee on Ways and Means—

Resolved, That the several committees of this House having in charge matters pertaining to appropriations, foreign affairs, Indian affairs, military affairs, naval affairs, post-office and post-roads, public lands, public buildings and grounds, claims and war-claims, be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire, so far as the same may properly be before their respective committees, into any errors, abuses, or frauds that may exist in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting said branches of the public service, with a view to ascertain what change and reformation can be made so as to promote integrity, economy, and efficiency therein; that the Committees on Expenditures in the State Department, in the Treasury Department, in the War Department, in the Navy Department, in the Post-Office Department, in the Interior Department, in the Department of Justice, and on Public Buildings, be, and they are hereby, instructed to proceed at once, as required by the rules of the House, to examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures of the respective Departments submitted to them, and to examine and report particularly whether the expenditures of the respective Departments are justified by law; whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness both as to their character and amount; whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; whether any, and what, provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amount; whether any, and what, retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments, without detriment to the public service; whether any, and what, abuses at any time exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters or others, and to report from time to time such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several Departments and the accountability of their officers; whether any offices belonging to the branches or Departments, respectively, concerning whose expenditures it is their duty to inquire, have become useless or unnecessary; and to report from time to time on the expediency of modifying or abolishing the same; also to examine into the pay and emoluments of all officers under the laws of the United States and to report from time to time such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require. And for the purpose of enabling the several committees to fully comprehend the workings of the various branches or Departments of Government, respectively, the investigations of said committees may cover such period in the past as each of said committees may deem necessary for its own guidance or information or for the protection of the public interests, in the exposing of frauds or abuses of any kind that may exist in said Departments; and said committees are authorized to send for persons and papers, and may report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate and inquire into the matters set forth in the foregoing resolutions in the legislative department of the Government, except in so far as the Senate is exclusively concerned, and particularly in reference to the public printing and binding, and shall have the same authority that is conferred upon the other committees aforesaid.

II MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS,
Clerk.

The committee appointed under the resolution of the House to make investigation relative to the conduct and management of affairs connected with the Post-Office Department, have discharged their duty as fully as the circumstances of the case would permit, and beg leave to submit the following report for the information, consideration, and action of the House:

The testimony is voluminous, containing much information upon the methods, administration, personal conduct of the officers of the Department, the action of contractors connected therewith, and some of the principal routes of service, through which the Government was defrauded. Yet the testimony is defective and incomplete, in that some of the witnesses were unwilling to impart the facts within their knowledge; others absconded, so that they could not be made to respond to the subpoenas; and others, still, are dead.

The results of the investigation, we believe, are of sufficient importance to suggest further reforms in the administration of this important Department of the Government, and are such as will suggest necessary legislation, create a healthy public opinion in the matter of civil service, and should lead to censure and prosecution of the parties in and out of office who have conspired to and aided in schemes of public plunder. But we believe, from the results obtained, that still greater abuses exist, and many guilty parties are yet undetected.

The abuses discovered in the administration of the postal service, whether reflecting upon the higher or lower officials of the Department, or upon the contractors operating in connection with the Department, or both in combination, seem, so far as the testimony extends, to have originated with the ring-contractors in a method of obtaining contracts at exorbitant prices, appropriately characterized as the "straw-bid system," which had its beginning several years back, but seems to have reached its highest development under the administration of Postmaster-General Creswell, and has continued, with less force, however, under his successors.

Mr. Creswell, in this connection, states in his testimony:

In the first year I was Postmaster-General, 1869, there was scarcely any, if any, straw-bidding; none that came to my attention. That was the letting for the New England States and New York. When the next year came around, it was reported to me, after opening the bids, that there had been what was called straw-bidding.

As appears from the evidence, these contractors, in order to defeat the efforts of the Department in obtaining a contract on fair and reasonable terms for transporting the mails, formed a ring of many bidders, whose bids ranged from exorbitantly high figures to manifestly small amounts. The contract is awarded to the lowest bidder, who fails, in the interest of the ring; then every next lower bidder would retire or refuse to answer when notified, leaving the Department the alternative between some bidder higher up the list or a continuance of the old contract in the nature of temporary service, the temporary service always being performed by the old contractor, at the old exorbitant prices, because no one else on the long mountain-routes in the Territories would be prepared to commence temporary service, the old contractor owning he horses, stages, &c. Where there were bidders who did not belong to the ring, the testimony shows that these bidders in many instances received large sums to refuse to answer to the bids when notified that the lowest bidder had failed to execute the contract. The contractor was by this means enabled to virtually control the contract and force the Department to let to him on his own terms.

In operating this vicious system for the purposes of plunder and corruption, there appears from the testimony to have been a combination between these rings.

First, a ring of contractors.

Second, a ring of officials, embracing clerks in the contract-office, and sometimes an intermediary ring of brokers or agents, by which the two former combinations were brought in contact, and enabled to effect and perfect their schemes against the public Treasury.

That many clerks in the Department were in the pay of some of these contractors was fully developed in the trial of one Hinds, and the circumstances surrounding that case force us to believe that this corrupt combination between those clerks and contractors pervaded all those usually denominated ring-contracts to such an extent that the contractor was enabled, from information gained from the clerk who had official access to the records, to know positively who was the lowest bidder, making it an easy matter for him always to have the lowest bid on any contract he desired to manipulate. The contractor thus made secure in the lowest bid, would commence his operations to control all other bids up to a point at which he wished to carry the mail. It is needless to say that this was always at an exorbitant price. As an illustration of this pernicious system that pervaded all the valuable contracts on the western rivers and Territories, we submit the following extract from the testimony of John E. Reeside, of route 7587:

Accepted March 30, 1871.

Contract was drawn, dated March 30, 1871, and transmitted to William Wood, at $900 per annum, by schedule, allowing forty-eight hours running-time each way, but it was never executed.

"July 12, 1871.—Authorize F. P. Sawyer to carry mail temporarily on route six times a week, by schedule of forty-eight hours running-time, at $34,296 per annum, former rate of pay.

"July 17, 1871.—Accepted bidder having failed to begin service, contract with F. P. Sawyer, of Washington, D. C., from July 1 to December 31, 1871, or until otherwise ordered, at $34,296 per annum, for service six times a week, and re-advertise route.

"Leave Fort Gibson daily, except Sunday, at 6 a. m.; arrive at Sherman in forty-eight hours. Leave Sherman daily, except Sunday; arrive at Fort Gibson —."

The bids on the route (7587) range from $80,049 as low as $900, which was the lowest bid on a route of two hundred and five miles.

Of course the lowest bidder failed to execute his contract, and temporary service was let to the old contractor at $34,290 per annum. It is a noticeable fact that a large number of the bidders on this route are known as ring contractors, many of them then, as well as now, having large contracts with the Government.

The House will also take notice of the fact that F. P. Sawyer, jr., a son of the old contractor, was a bidder at $17,450 or $20,000 for invited service.

By administering the Department in violation of law, in some instances; in others administering it under a vicious and questionable construction thereof; in others still, by an evasion of the spirit of the statute, when the letter was seemingly recognized; and by either incompetency or corrupt officials, the following corrupt and evil practices obtained:

First. Service was improvidently and inconsiderately granted where no public demand existed or public convenience accrued.

Second. Exorbitant prices were allowed for services when needed and the work when done.

Third. Services when not rendered according to the contract, either in spirit or measure, were nevertheless fully paid for.

Fourth. When fraud was detected on the part of contractors, no adequate action has been taken by officials to either punish or correct the fraud.

Fifth. When official dereliction or corruption or remissness was discovered, the Department took no sufficient measures to punish delinquents or to prevent a recurrence of similar official wrong-doing; so that the Government lost annually, in violation of law and through corrupt practice, millions of the public money; and the guilty parties in office and out of office have generally gone free both of prosecution and punishment.

To show with more fullness the extent of the frauds perpetrated against the Government, and to indicate somewhat in detail the methods of these frauds and the parties culpable, inside and out of the Postal Department, your committee call attention to the subjoined statement of facts, as appears from the evidence bearing upon the routes of mail-service heretofore designated, as the same is embraced in the Huntley, Barlow, Kittle, and Peterson contracts.

It appears in the evidence that these abuses were practiced in the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, and on all the expensive routes in the Territories, including the Mississippi River and its tributaries. The routes openly held by the ring are estimated by witnesses to be about forty, but they controlled others by powers of attorney. The land routes were let in 1870 and 1871 by Postmaster-General Creswell, and it appears from the evidence that they were advertised for a less number of times per week than the old service, making a show of economy, which finally worked into the hands of the ring by increasing the service so admirably, that it seems hard to escape the conviction that it was part of a premeditated programme.

The attention of the House is called to the fact that in all these routes within the first year, and in many instances within the first month, there was an order for increased service from one trip per week to two, and frequently six times, increasing pay of contractors at a pro-rata rate on original contract. When one trip is stipulated for in contract and the Postmaster-General orders two, the pay is doubled, and further as the trips are increased in the same proportion.

The House will note in this connection that it is a general understanding among contractors, and those who have a knowledge of postal subjects, that the expense incurred in starting a stage-line for once a week is almost sufficient for an additional trip, and that the additional expense incurred is slight in comparison to the additional pay received.

Above all things the contractor wishes a route upon which he can get an increased service, knowing that this is the most profitable. To illustrate the foregoing, we append statements from the evidence showing contract pay, date of orders, and amount of increase on the following routes:

Route 15414, from Walla-Walla, Washington Territory, to Missoula, Montana Territory.—Contract entered into with C. C. Huntley July 26, 1870, to run from July 1, 1870, to June 30, 1874, at $22,900 per annum. July 29, 1870, orders one additional trip on side supply from Missoula to Stevensville, 40 miles, and allow contractors $2,022 additional per annum from August 16, 1870. August 23, 1870, extends service on side supply from Stevensville to Girds Creek, increasing distance 45 miles, and pay of contractor $4,550 per annum pro rata from September 16, 1870. November 10, 1870, recognize service of C. C. Huntley in conveying the mails two additional trips per week over that part of the route from Missoula to Stevensville, July 1 to August 15, 1870, at the rate of $4,044 per annum, being pro rata, and refer to Auditor to pay. December 22, 1870, orders two additional trips per week, and on that part of this route between Walla-Walla and Missoula, 413 miles, and allow contractor $41,754 additional pay per annum from January 1, 1870.

Route 14773, Oroville to Portland, Oregon, 556 miles, and back, daily mail.—Contract with Bradley, Barlow & Co., at $134,000 per annum from December 30, 1870, to June 30, 1874. Order May 3, 1871: curtail route to begin at Tehama, omitting Rock Creek and Pine Creek, decreasing distance fifty miles, and pay $11,837 per annum; reduce service one trip per week between Red Bluff and Shasta, 40 miles, decreasing pay $1,353 per annum; six trips per week between Shasta and Callahan's Rancho, 75 miles, decreasing pay $15,219 per annum; and one trip per week between Callahan's Rancho and Yreka, 40 miles, decreasing pay $1,353 per annum. Embrace Parkville, Battle Creek, Millville, and Stillwater, Portuga, Beryville, Edgewood, and Gazelle, between Red Bluff and Yreka, increasing distance 153 miles and pay $36,223 per annum pro rata. Allow $2,440 per annum for six times a week service between Oroville and Chico, 24 miles, not pro rata, and allow contractor $8,861 additional per annum from May 8, 1871. June 8, 1872, order an increase of expedition so as to reduce the running time from four days fourteen hours in summer, and nine days four hours in winter, to three days in summer, and five days in winter, and allow contractor $45,945 additional per annum, being a sum equal to the actual increase in stock and carriers on that part of the route between Tehama and Eugene City, 382 miles, from July 1, 1872.

Route 16662, from Kelton, Utah, to Dalles, Oregon.—Contract with J. W. Parker, Owen Tuller, T. Smalley, Barlow, Bradley Barlow, of Saint Albans, Vt., agent, at Hill Beachy's bid, $192,000, from August 16, 1870, to June 30, 1874. June 17, 1871, order one additional trip and allow contractor $32,000 per annum from July 1, 1871, being pro rata. July 26, 1872, recognize the service of Parker, Tuller & Barlow in carrying the mails from Cayuse, by Pendleton and Meadowville, to Umatilla and back, daily, from July 1, 1870, to June 30, 1872, at the rate of $5,000 per annum, and refer to Auditor to adjust and pay. August 8, 1872, order a side supply from Cayuse, by Pendleton and Meadowville, to Umatilla, 45 miles and back, daily, and allow contractors $5,000, being less than pro rata, but agreeable to proposition from July 1, 1872.

Route from Kit Carson to Santa Fé, August 16, 1870.—Let this route begin at Kit Carson, and contract with Bradley Barlow, at his bid of $95,400 per annum, subject to the provisions thereof from September 1, 1870, to June 30, 1874, making failing bidder and his guarantors liable. April 5, 1871, order an additional trip per week, and allow $15,833 per annum additional pro rata from April 16, 1871.

Route 17401 from Santa Fé to El Paso.—August 16, 1870; contract with Bradley Barlow and I. L. Sanderson, at I. L. Sanderson's bid of $39,000 per annum from September 17, 1870, to June 30, 1874. Making failing bidder and his guarantors liable. April 5, 1871, order four additional trips per week on this route and allow contractor $52,000 per annum from April 16, 1871, being pro rata.

Route 17404 from Mesilla, New Mexico, to Los Angeles, California, 847 miles.—Advertised once a week, and proposals for twice, August 16, 1870. Contract with Bradley Barlow, T. J. Barnum, and I. L. Sanderson, at T. J. Barnum's bid of $124,000, from September 1, 1870, to June 30, 1874, making failing bidder and his guarantor liable. December 14, 1870, increase service on this route between Mesilla and San Diego one additional trip per week, and between San Diego and Los Angeles, 130 miles, four additional trips per week, and allow contractor $88,000 additional per annum, less than pro rata, but agreeable to proposition, from January 1, 1871. April 24, 1871, embrace Florence and Sanford, between Tucson and Sycatone, increasing distance 20 miles and pay $2,500 per annum, less than pro rata, but agreeable to proposition from January 1, 1871. August 12, 1872, extend service from Pinos Altos to Silver City, 10 miles and back three times a week, allow contractors $1,960 additional per annum, pro rata, from August 16, 1872. May 14, 1873, allow contractors $1,000 additional per annum to expedite the schedule between San Diego and Los Angeles, 146 miles, from 36 hours to 24, and $1,000 per annum to perform 7 trips per week in lieu of 6, between same points, from June 1, 1873, as per agreement.

Route 7505.—Recognized service of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company, J. A. Scudder, agent, from the 20th to the 31st July, 1871; the amount of transportation for that period, $442.30. There was a short contract made with B. H. Peterson from August 1 to December 31, 1871, at $18,400 per annum, and for that period was paid $7,650. It was then continued by order of the Postmaster-General from January 1 to June 30, 1872, and for that period was paid $9,200. The contract with Bodine C. Peterson commenced July 1, 1872, and continued to June 30, 1875. During that period was paid, July 1 to December 31, $9,000; January 1 to June 30, 1873, $11,250; July 1, 1873, to June 30, 1875, two years, $54,000.

The whole amount of fines, deductions, and special agents' fare for the period is $6,896, which, deducted from the amount of transportation for that period, (including the amount which was remitted, $606,) leaving the amount paid, $85,262.30. That includes the history of that route for the time.

In addition to the above, the Petersons had a contract, first for a tri-weekly mail, increased to a daily, from New Orleans to Red River Landing; also a land route from Red River Landing to Shreveport; also from New Orleans to Saint Francisville, from Memphis to White River, and other temporary service on Mississippi River and its tributaries.

Reviewing the methods of administration, in view of the law and the facts bearing upon the case, the committee submit the following conclusions for the consideration of the House:

ADMINISTRATION OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL CRESWELL.

The abuses incident to the existence and practice of the sham method of obtaining contracts, known as the "straw-bid system," had its first notable development and its most offensive prevalence under this postal administration; was known to exist by the head of the Department, and, ostensibly, efforts were made to correct the conceded evils of the system. Mr. Creswell puts in his testimony official statements, and personal evidence, as supplemental thereto, which were evidently intended as an elaborate defense of his official action; but this defense makes such concessions as cause it to fail of its purpose, and to put the official conduct of that officer under grave suspicions, affecting either his integrity or competency as a public officer. Indeed, his testimony, considered in connection with the postal laws and other unimpeached testimony, suggests either collusion between the Department and wrong-doers, or else a criminal negligence or a gross incompetency in the apprehension and discharge of the duties of the office.

First, there was positive violation of law in the instance of the contracts given to Peterson. The provisions of section 264, postal laws, read:

That the Postmaster-General may contract with the owner or master of any steamboat plying upon the waters of the United States, or of any steamship, or other vessel plying between ports of the United States, for carrying the mail for any length of time less than four years, and without advertising for proposals therefor, whenever the public interest and convenience will thereby be promoted; but the price paid for such service shall in no case be greater than the average price paid under the last preceding or then existing regular contract on the same route.

It was well known to the Department, both Mr. Creswell and Second Assistant Postmaster-General Giles A. Smith, who had immediate charge of the contracts, that Peterson was neither the owner nor master of any vessel plying upon the Mississippi, or any of the tributaries thereto. Under the provisions of the law he was not qualified to become a contractor, yet he was given the monopolistic control of all the contracts on the aforesaid rivers, and these contracts were made with him directly, and not as the agent for the owners or masters of vessels. It is true that he was the agent of all the principal steamers plying upon these rivers, empowered to enter into contract for mail-service for them, but he did not use his agency for the purposes contemplated by the parties who appointed him to represent them, but for a corrupt purpose, as will further appear in the consideration of this case.

As a matter of fact, the evidence will show that he took these contracts in his own name and sublet the different routes at large profits. As an illustration, the testimony will show that John A. Scudder, the owner of a steamboat, put in a bid to carry the mail from White River to Vicksburgh. The lowest bidder having failed, Scudder became eligible, and was prepared to carry it out in good faith according to the conditions of his bid. He received no notice, as was the custom under the regulations, and the contract was awarded to Peterson at much higher figures. Scudder's bid was $7,000. Peterson sublet to Scudder at $10,000, giving Scudder $3,000 more than he bid to do the work for.

Peterson did not sign these contracts as the agent or attorney for the owners and masters of steamboats, though he held their letters of authorization to do so, but in his own name; and granting him a contract under the circumstances, and in so many instances, were violations of the law, which both Mr. Creswell and Mr. Smith must have known.

Again, section 250, postal laws, declares—

That no contract for carrying the mail shall be made with any person who has entered, or proposed to enter, into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying, or who made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract. And if any person so offending is a contractor for carrying the mail, his contract may be annulled; and, for the first offense, the person so offending shall be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail for five years, and for the second offense shall be forever disqualified.

It is in evidence that Peterson entered into a combination to prevent the making of bids for certain routes, notably the Mississippi River, by which he secured the agency of all the owners and masters of steamers on said river; that he secured these agencies by representing to the steamboat men that he alone could obtain contracts over said routes from his peculiar influential and intimate relations with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and the Postmaster-General himself, as will appear in the testimony of Leathers, Scudder, and other owners and captains of steamboats; and he thus monopolized all the valuable contracts on the aforesaid rivers at exorbitant prices, then subletting the same, as his interests dictated, to the men whose powers of attorney or letters of authorization he held. This conduct was well known to the Department, as appears in the testimony of the Postmaster-General himself, and was a flagrant violation of the provisions of section 250, already recited, and subjected him not only to the annulment of his contract after it had been executed, but disqualified him from becoming a contractor at all. Yet the Department, knowing these things, continued to give him its confidence and its most valuable contracts.

Peterson was well known in the Department. The friend of Mr. Creswell, and an old and intimate friend of Second Assistant Postmaster-General Smith, having followed his fortunes during the war as regimental and brigade surgeon, and commenced his career as a contractor on Smith's advent into the Post-Office Department, he impressed the river-men and the clerks in the Department with the belief that he had controlling influence with the heads thereof, and openly traded on this alleged influence. He operated as a contract-broker or middle-man, and was well known to have neither the money nor the outfit to undertake and carry out these contracts. And yet, with a full knowledge of his character and his operations, neither Mr. Creswell nor Mr. Smith ever deemed it necessary to investigate the matter of the Peterson contracts, the manner in which he performed the service, nor did they ever abridge his contracts, but, as appears in the evidence of O'Brien, they paid him money, in violation of the regulations of the Department, in the absence of any certificate that the service had been rendered. So this man was permitted to plunder the public revenues during the whole administration of Postmaster-General Creswell, and until the attention of his successor, Mr. Jewell, had been called to the magnitude and enormity of the Peterson frauds.

The conclusions reached in this criticism and censure of the maladministration of the Department, in the instance of the Peterson contracts, is abundantly sustained, not only by the testimony of the witnesses named, but by the evidence of Woodard, Holbrook, O'Brien, Sickels, Hopkins, and Reeside, found in the printed testimony.

Section 247, declares—

That any postmaster or other officer of the Post-Office Department, who shall affix his signature to the certificate of sufficiency of guarantors or sureties before the guarantee or contract is signed by the guarantors or sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or illusory certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Notwithstanding the stringency of this act, postmasters have, with utter recklessness, ignored, or with corrupt design, in multitudes of instances, given certificates of sufficiency of guarantors or sureties that were false and illusory, so that probably a majority of the bonds accompanying bids for contracts are insufficient and worthless.

This practice not only withdraws a necessary safeguard from the public service, but tends directly to invite and encourage the system of sham or dishonest bidding that has been the source of such great evil to the postal service. As an instance at hand of the recklessness with which the law in this particular has been violated, we may refer to the postmaster of Washington, D. C., J. M. Edmunds. The worthlessness of the certificates referred to, and the utter insufficiency of the bonds designated, and the guilt and negligence of postmasters in this connection must have been known to Mr. Creswell and Mr. Smith, if they are credited with even ordinary fidelity and intelligence of the duties of their positions. Yet we do not see that any general effort was made to detect and punish postmasters for this conduct by dismissal from office or otherwise.

Second. He established service at great expense over routes that the public necessities did not require, and by which the public convenience was not subserved, and without any sufficient reason. At great cost he increased the service on routes already established, profiting thereby, not the people, whose money was consumed, but simply the contractor and his friends.

Among the needless routes we mention, from Washington to Norfolk, and from Baltimore to Fredericksburgh, (see Reeside's testimony;) from Boise City to Kelton, (see testimony of Underwood;) increase of service from Kelton to Dallas; on the Missoula and Walla-Walla routes, and more or less on all the routes heretofore specifically described, which will appear from the following tabulated statement:

Route.	Per annum. Contract services.	Per annum. Increase pay.
15414	$23,900	$47,522
15703	33,000	44,000
16622	192,000	37,000
17032	95,000	16,833
17401	30,000	52,000
17404	124,000	89,560
17773	134,000	63,677
	631,900	350,592

The evidence of Special Agent Underwood and James L. Fisk show that the route from Walla-Walla to Missoula was for a great distance through an uninhabited, mountainous country, many miles of it considered unnecessary as a mail-route, as there were no towns nor people along the route to be accommodated. It is stated by these witnesses, and by Ex-Postmaster Moore, of Walla-Walla, that frequently not half a dozen letters and papers would pass over the route in a quarter, and that the estimated cost for carrying each letter would be from six to eight hundred dollars.

Mr. Fisk brought these facts to the attention of Mr. Creswell, embodied in a written form at his request, which it appears has since been displaced or stolen from the records. Ex-Postmaster Moore believes that his removal was brought about through Huntley's instrumentality, because of his recommendations that this route was an unnecessary one.

Special Agent Underwood makes a report to Chief Clerk Woodward in regard to the route from Kelton to the Dalles in Oregon, from which we will make the following extract:

We find that service was increased from six to seven times per week, and an allowance of $32,000 for same. This was done without the advice of the agents of the Department, who were well acquainted with the service, and in my opinion was wholly unnecessary and unwarranted by the facts and the demands of the country.

Also,

We find an indorsement on jacket showing that the Department was advised that contractors were running a daily line of stages from Cayuse, via Pendleton and Meadowville, to Umatilla, yet Department allowed contractors $5,000 per annum for said service, making their full pay $229,000 per annum, when the facts were there was no other way to get from Cayuse to Umatilla except by Pendleton, and the stages had to go that way, and always have since the stages have ran through that country.

That part of this route from Boise City to Kelton, Agent Underwood tells the committee is, in his opinion, entirely unnecessary. "There is one route, from Boise City to Kelton, that intersects the railroad 792 miles from San Francisco, and one at Winnemucca, 464 miles from San Francisco, making 328 miles between the two points."

Between Boise and Kelton is a desert country. There it no one living on the line of the road, and there are no post-offices except one little way-office called Rock Creek, at a stage-station, and Boise is supplied from Winnemucca. It is also in evidence that the only consideration that demands this route from Boise to Kelton is the fact that the citizens at Boise and on the route beyond receive the mail twelve hours sooner than from the railroad at Winnemucca, on account of Winnemucca being 328 miles farther west on the railroad.

In regard to the Oroville and Portland route, we find that contract was let to Barlow at a private letting, without advertisement, he being the lowest bidder of three, at $134,000. It does not appear but that the manner of letting the contract was in direct violation of law, but it is due to the Postmaster-General to say that it was more economical than if he had followed the letter of the law. Attention is further called to Special Agent Underwood's testimony, from which we make the following extract:

We find in connection with this route that there was advertised at the same time and a contract let on route 14814, from Red Bluff to Yreka, by way of what is known as the Sacramento route, a distance of 153 miles, once a week, for $2,576 per annum. Petitions were filed asking that through mails be sent over that route daily; instead of which we find that the route was discontinued altogether, but do not find any consent of contractor to that arrangement. On same day that the service was discontinued on route 14814, and one month's extra pay allowed contractor, the said route was made a part of, or side-supply of, route 14773, and Bradley Barlow allowed $36,223. Had the service on route 14814 been increased to a daily it would have cost $18,032.

Third. He authorized and allowed to be paid, in violation of the regulation of the Department, moneys claimed for services before the certificate that said service had been performed was received by the Department, and sometimes on evidently fraudulent certificates, purporting to have come thousands of miles, but were evidently executed in Washington, as the ink was hardly dry, and sometimes on telegraphic dispatches. These facts are brought out in the evidence of Sickels, O'Brien, and Holbrook.

The margin for fraud in this violation of regulation for payment for services is so large, and the practice in this instance so utterly without excuse, that we content ourselves with a simple statement of the facts. The practice in this regard has been different under Postmaster-General Jewell.

Fourth. The evidence is presumptively conclusive, in the instance of the Sawyer, Peterson, and Kittle contracts, that in some instances the certificates were absolutely false, in that they certified to service never rendered, and yet, upon these certificates, the claims were allowed and paid. Sickels, in testifying as to the character of the evidence upon which payments were made to Sawyer, states:

Q. What were the doubts which suggested themselves to your mind regarding its truthfulness?—A. I can tell that best by giving you my stand-point. I know that in Texas one contractor had a wonderful influence. I know from correspondence that would drop into my hands. After I got well acquainted with my work I never gave a great deal of credit in my mind to the majority of the reports that came from Texas.

Q. Who was that contractor?—A. It was Mr. Sawyer. I think they thought down there that he ran the Department or had his own way, and they would report a failure, and then the same postmaster would certify afterward that the trips were made—would contradict his former statement, perhaps.

The evidence shows Sawyer to have been a corrupt man, a member of the contractors' ring, and paying out large sums of money for corrupt purposes.

The testimony of Sickels shows that Sawyer was in the habit of manipulating, with the knowledge of the Department, the certificates through the postmasters upon which payments were made by the Department to him, and the presumption in this connection is strong and irresistible that the certificates covered services that were never really rendered. Again, Hopkins testifies, he being an officer of the Government sent to investigate Kittle, who had a contract over the route from San Antonio to Corpus Christi for services for six times a week, but really rendered service over two-thirds of the route twice weekly, yet by false certificates received full pay called for by his contract. Now, let it be remembered that this man Kittle began as a contractor under Creswell in 1871, and continued until 1875, when his frauds were discovered by Postmaster-General Jewell, and his contracts annulled; and the presumption is that this practice of fraudulent certificates which was discovered at so late a day had been in operation during the greater period of his contract. Again, Sickels in his testimony alleges that Peterson's contracts from New Orleans to the mouth of Red River was carried out through the Kountz Line of steamers, which made only three trips weekly; and yet as the contract called for daily service over this route, there was furnished certificates for daily service purporting to be performed by the Kountz Line, and the money thereon was paid to Peterson. The evidence does not show upon how many other routes and for how long a time Peterson's corrupt practices in the matter of procuring fraudulent certificates extended; but the evidence in these three cases—in that it comes from unimpeached witnesses, comes in a time and under circumstances when it was not solicited or expected—in its suggestiveness is stronger than a direct declaration of the existence of frauds in this form.

A remarkable feature of this part of the investigation is that Mr. Creswell, knowing these men as thoroughly as he did, especially Peterson and Sawyer, neither instituted an investigation into their fraudulent practices, or made any attempt to correct or punish them.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF POSTMASTER GENERAL JEWELL.

This officer manifested a disposition to break up the straw-bid system and to economize in the administration of his Department. He, through Woodard, sought to ascertain the extent of frauds, especially in the Peterson and Kittle contracts, but still allowed the Peterson contracts to expire by limitation, though declared to be fraudulent by Woodard; and Kittle was not only, after being detected in a fraud, permitted to go unpunished, but was paid $24,000 more than he was entitled to, with the full knowledge of the Postmaster-General, and for a reason that neither stands good in law, nor in common sense, nor in official fidelity. Jewell also discovered the ring inside the Department, in the contract-office, but made no use of it, except to release all the guilty clerks, with Kittle, from punishment, for the purpose, ostensibly, of the prosecution of Hinds, a man who, the district attorney informed him, could not be convicted, and who seems to have become a partner of Kittle subsequent to Kittle's corruption and bribery of clerks. There is no evidence to show that Mr. Jewell had corrupt knowledge of these evil practices currently with their existence, or that he received in any form financial benefit therefrom; but his failure to correct the abuses promptly in the instance of Peterson, and to punish both by fine and otherwise in the instance of Kittle, and the inconsiderate and reckless release from prosecution of the guilty officials in the Department, subject him justly to censure and criticism, as lacking in official competency and vigilance, or as disposed, for political or other reasons, to prevent an investigation into the condition of his predecessor's administration—such as would have been incident to the prosecution of the guilty clerks. But to particularize in the matter of the Peterson and Kittle contracts, in order to form a correct and fair judgment of the action of the Postmaster-General, it is in evidence that Woodard, assisted by Reeside and O'Brien, at the instance of Postmaster-General Jewell, in the winter and spring of 1875, investigated the Peterson contracts, and reached the conclusion that they were fraudulent, and should be annulled; but at large public costs they were permitted to run until they expired by limitation in July.

Why was not prompt action, as in the Kittle case, taken in this? Why was not an investigation had, so thorough as to reach a reliable estimate of the amount of public money this man had fraudulently appropriated? Why were not measures taken to recover this money, and to punish him for his wrong-doing?

This feature of Mr. Jewell's administration needs explanation that has not yet been supplied. Relative to Kittle, Hopkins, a special officer of the Department, proceeded to Texas to investigate certain alleged violations of the contract then existing between Kittle and the Department, covering the route from San Antonio to Corpus Christi.

It was found that the mail which the contract required to be carried daily between these terminal points was carried some twenty miles daily from each point and return on the route, but the remaining larger portion received the mail only twice a week. False certificates of service done were made by the postmaster at Corpus Christi and intermediate points along the route, excepting San Antonio, not according to the facts, but alleged daily service; and Hopkins further testifies that this state of things had existed some length of time, and before the administration of Mr. Jewell.

He made a report of the facts to the Department, which was supposed to have been stolen, because it did not reach its destination. He duplicated his report on his return, and worked up a case against Kittle, in which the fines and deductions for the whole period amounted to $26,000.

The Postmaster General dismissed the postmaster at Corpus Christi, annulled Kittle's contract, but withheld only about $1,900 of his pay—which was the pro rata for the last quarter of his contract—leaving still in his hands $24,000 of the public money, on the ground that the settlements up to that date had been made, and that the Department had no right to go behind that date, even in a fraud like this, through which a robbery had been perpetrated upon the Government by false swearing of the postmasters and the corrupt devices of this man Kittle. Ordinary prudence and the practical judgments that govern men in their transactions with each other would have suggested a thorough investigation to ascertain the amount of the fraud; a prompt withholding of all moneys due until the question of fraud had been determined, and, finally, a civil prosecution on his bonds, or a criminal one, or both—not only as measures to protect the Government, but as an exhibition of authority that should deter others from similar wrong-doing. It was further developed that Kittle had corrupted some of the clerks in the contract-office of the Department. What was done? Contractors and clerks were alike given immunity from criminal prosecution, and the attention and indignation of the Department, in lieu of these acknowledged guilty parties, directed to one Hinds, a lately-made partner of Kittle, who was very distantly, if at all, connected with these fraudulent practices, and who, after a very vigorous prosecution, was acquitted by the jury.

We repeat that the action of Mr. Jewell with reference to Peterson,

Kittle, and the clerks, after a full knowledge of their guilt, is unaccountable, except—after conceding his personal integrity—that the investigation incident to these prosecutions would have laid open to the public view corruptions in office that partisan considerations made it at least desirable to conceal.

THE CONTRACTORS' RING.

The ring of contractors, from the evidence, seems to have embraced men of more or less prominence and experience, and to have numbered from thirty to fifty parties—familiarily known among the clerks as “The Forty Thieves.”

Existing laws on the postal service are so far defective that we may not be able to reach these men in many of the substantial outrages that they perpetrated on the Government and the people; but a body of men, accepted by the community as respectable, recognized by the Department as so far worthy of their confidence and so far reliable as to be intrusted with carrying out the details of one of the most important administrative branches of government—a service that controls the modes of intercommunication between the people of every section; upon which mental development, business transactions, and the comfort and pleasure of the people are so dependent—yet who have taken advantage of their position to establish a system of organized plunder, and, as an auxiliary thereto, have proposed to corrupt that class of our people who hold positions of public trust, and in carrying out their plans have largely debauched a whole Department and community—we deem it our duty to call public attention to these men as a class, for the purpose of directing a corrective, restraining public opinion upon them and the officers sought to be corrupted by them, and to suggest such legislation as will hereafter lead to their prompt prosecution and punishment for wrongs that have heretofore, because of the silence of the law, passed without notice and without retribution.

The general tenor of the testimony shows beyond doubt that they have systematically, by a method of sham or dishonest bids and other corrupt devices, combined to obtain monopolies of the postal service at exorbitant prices; that they have bribed clerks in the contract-office to give such information of the status of the different bids as would enable them to underbid honest, bona-fide bidders, so as to control the most valuable routes of mail-service in the directions indicated in the testimony. They further, by the corrupt use of money with officials, by false representation, and by manufactured petitions, have induced the Department to establish service over lines where the public convenience did not require it, and was not subserved by it.

Further, they have induced, corruptly, postmasters to give certificates as to sureties and bonds which are false and illusory; and they have, by corrupt means, obtained certificates for services not rendered, so as to plunder the public Treasury.

Finally, as appears in evidence, in the instance of Barlow and Sawyer notably, they have not only paid out moneys for corrupt purposes and to obtain contracts which the public interests do not require, but have been enabled so far to control efforts to discover, expose, and punish their evil practices as to defeat, as in the instance of 1872, as appears in Barlow's testimony, the ends of an investigation instituted by the honorable House itself.

Bearing on this point, we submit the following extracts. Mr. Barlow says:

By Mr. McMAHON :

Q. Just give us the names and amounts. We will infer the purpose.—A. Well, I paid some money to a man named Farrar.

Q. Please give us his full name.—A. I cannot give his full name. He was a lawyer here.

Q. How much did you pay him?—A. I paid him several thousand dollars.

Q. I think you can remember the amount.—A. I cannot tell you the amount; I kept no account of it.

Q. He was not your lawyer?—A. No, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. What did you pay him the money for? Give the history of it.—A. Well, it is quite a long story, and may not be very interesting to you, and it was not very pleasant to me. To begin with, there were the same questions raised there that the special agents of the Post-Office Department raised with reference to the Portland and Oroville contract, that there was no warrant in law for making the contract in the way it was done. These questions were raised before the committee about four years ago, (in 1872, I think,) and we had paid Mr. Carr $120,000 in coin for the stock on the road, and also about $25,000 for the other property on the road; and it would be pretty nearly ruinous to us to have the contract annulled, and I did not desire to have the investigation pressed, and those parties were pressing it, and I paid the money to get them to hold off.

* * * * *

Q. Whom did he represent?—A. I do not know whom he did represent. He and his party represented the combinations which were made at the time. I believe that, before the committee, Colonel McKibben assumed the authorship of the articles on the subject under investigation. The report of the committee will tell all about it.

Mr. McMAHON. We are not after the report of the committee; we can get that.

Q. How much money was paid?—A. I cannot tell.

Q. About how much?—A. I think it was quite a large sum.

Q. Over $5,000?—A. Yes, sir; over $10,000, and over $20,000.

Q. Over $25,000?—A. Yes.

Q. Over $30,000?—A. Yes.

Q. Was it over $50,000?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was it over $40,000?—A. Well, I could not tell you; I never kept a strict account of it.

Q. You just shut your eyes and let it go?—A. Well, I thought it was better.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Please state the amount, then.—A. I cannot. It is impossible for me to tell.

Q. Approximate as nearly as you can.—A. I have done so. I have said it was more than $30,000 and less than $50,000.

Q. That is a large margin—$20,000?—A. It is.

Q. Was it more than $40,000?—A. I should think that in one way and another it was.

Q. You think it was between $40,000 and $50,000, then?—A. I know it was between $30,000 and $50,000. It was less than $50,000. I speak from recollection.

* * * * *

By Mr. McMAHON :

Q. Was it paid all at one time?—A. No, sir; it was not.

Q. So much in hand, and so much on the report of the committee?—A. I cannot explain exactly. It was not a very agreeable subject.

Q. Well, what was the idea—that you were not going to pay out the money without an equivalent?—A. I did not pay it for some time.

Q. Dealing with that sort of men, you would not pay in advance?—A. No, sir; I did not; they trusted me.

Q. The money was paid, then, after the report of the committee was made?—A. I paid them some money along from time to time. I always had money, and when they wanted any I gave it to them, as you do to such men.

Also from testimony of Judge Paschal :

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. State to the committee whether, in your examination of Mr. Sawyer's papers, you found any other papers, drafts, or memorandum-books that were not before the committee when you were last examined.

[The witness produced a memorandum-book.]

A. This memorandum-book was handed to me by Mr. Taylor. Mr. Taylor, in looking over the book, happened to take it up, and brought it to me. It shows some of the running expenses, traveling-expenses, and other things.

Q. Is that Mr. Sawyer's handwriting?—A. Yes, sir; they are rough notes of running accounts which he kept. I see here "November," which seems to be November, 1872. Judging by the dates, I should say that in the past June this entry was made: "Paid attorneys, mails, $10,000." On the same page, which would carry it into the next year, 25th February, for the same kind of service, "attorneys, $8,000." It is next to the last of the page, on the right-hand side. Then there is an entry here which is a blind account. It is as follows:

Amount paid sharks on account of contract after 1st July:

Wm. H. Farrar, paid by L	$20,000
Captain Hinds, paid by L	7,500
Mrs. Stuart, paid by L	2,000
August. Paid Colonel Bell	150
Wolverton	2,000
Phips	3,000
Williamson	2,000
Sept. D. A. F	2,000
Oct. B. & Co	2,000
Oct. Wm. H. Farrar	4,000

Also, from the testimony of Francis C. Taylor, the partner of Sawyer:

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. What amount of those expenses were not put upon the books?—A. All the parties interested, I think, were in Austin, Tex., having a sort of general settlement, in November, 1872. I had been engaged for some time in trying to finish up the business between Ben Ficklin and Sawyer for the administrator, and Sawyer came on there during the time. Slaughter Ficklin had been there all the time. Sawyer brought with him his account for some $30,000 or $40,000 paid Abbott for coaches, for which he took credit, and which was divided between the different divisions. There were four divisions of staging, and all the parties were there. Sawyer had accounts against my division, and, I think, against all the others. After having various accounts put on the books of the several divisions, Sawyer said, "Here I have an account," amounting to considerable—as well as I now remember, from $50,000 to $60,000—and he said, "All the divisions will have to pay their proportion of this." It was a memorandum showing that amount.

Q. This November settlement or charging up of all the different accounts?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the $50,000 or $60,000 that was there brought in without vouchers, and which had not previously been entered upon the books, is a separate and distinct item from the $200,000 that you said had been previously entered upon the books?—A. Yes, sir; that amount of $200,000 was on a settlement between Ben Ficklin and Sawyer. This other amount of $50,000 or $60,000, I forget which, was for the year from July, 1871, to July, 1872, and was to be divided among the different firms then in existence; and, as Sawyer said, when it was presented, "Here is an account of money that I have expended in Washington, that must be divided between the different companies." I don't think Wright objected. I think Scott said a little, and Slaughter Ficklin said considerable, and intimated that such black-mailing operations should not be paid, or something of that kind.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. There were no names on the paper indicating to whom it had been paid?—A. No, sir; I am satisfied of that. I remember that there were two items of $10,000 or one of $20,000, I am not positive which, and which Sawyer stated or admitted that he had paid to the same party.

Taking the three men, members of the ring, as types of their class and their methods—dividing as they did the territory among them—there was some variety in the system they adopted to compass their ends, to wit, exclusive and comprehensive contracts in their assigned territory. Kittle's method, after putting in a bona-fide bid at big figures for himself, was to corrupt the clerks in the Department so as to find out the lowest bidder, and then put in a series of "straw-bids," which he could control, through which, by temporary service or a new advertisement, he would control the contract.

Peterson's method, who operated on the western rivers south of Saint Louis, was to make a corrupt combination by which he could control all the lines of transportation, thus preventing competition, this control being obtained by representations of intimacy and influence with Creswell and Smith, and in its turn used on Creswell and Smith to get a monopoly of the contracts in his own name, and subsequently, he without money or outfit, to sublet said contracts so as to net one-third or one-half of the gross amount for which they were let.

Barlow and Huntley's plan—for they acted really together, though sometimes separately—was to use the subordinates and agents in their employ, including even the women of their families, to put in straw-bids on a gradually ascending scale, and generally be able to control the contract on most desirable terms; and in the event of an independent bidder intervening between the sham and the highest bid, they held themselves in readiness to buy out the independent bidder for a bonus, and thus bring the contract up to the most extravagant figures.

As illustration of the first, the De Lacy contract, on the Kelton, Utah, to Dalles, Oregon; and, as illustration of the latter, the purchase of Governor Thompson, of Idaho, bid, on the same route, which latter purchase enabled Barlow to withdraw Thompson's bid and obtain the contract at an advance of $10,000.

In conclusion, your committee would say, as the result of this investigation, they have prepared a bill embracing their ideas of the modifications demanded in the interest of the Government and the public in the postal laws, which bill has passed both houses and awaits the signature of the President.

Further, your committee suggests, as a conclusion authorized by the facts elicited by this investigation, that the violations of law, the extravagance of expenditures, and the general negligence in the supervision of the affairs of the Department, and the failure either to expose or prosecute the violations of law during the administration of Postmaster-General Creswell, should subject him to the censure of the House.

Mr. J. G. CANNON, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted the following as the

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY:

Under the resolution of the House, known as the Morrison resolution, adopted January 14, 1876, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads assumed the task of making an investigation into the conduct and management of the Post-Office Department since 1868. In the course of their protracted labors the committee have given much attention to the transportation of the mails and the letting of contracts, and have made a particular inquiry into the frauds which, it is alleged, have been perpetrated by means of straw-bids.

The democratic majority having at length agreed upon a report which the minority deem grossly unjust to some of the officers of the Department, and in direct conflict, on many points, with the testimony submitted, the undersigned are obliged to avail themselves of their right to present their dissenting views.

The evidence taken by the committee, such as it is, covers nearly one thousand closely-printed pages. From its great length, it is impossible, within the limits of this report, to submit even an intelligible analysis of the facts as presented by the record and the multitude of witnesses. We have, however, arrived without difficulty at the conclusion that in this, as in all former investigations, the testimony itself furnishes the most complete and satisfactory vindication of the Department and its management; and in that belief we confidently commend to all who seek the real truth of the whole matter a careful perusal of the entire volume.

Since the first inauguration of President Grant there have been already three investigations into post-office affairs by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of each of which an elaborate report has been made to the House.

The first investigation was set on foot in 1872, by the Forty-second Congress, at the request of the then Postmaster-General himself, and resulted in a triumphant vindication of the Department. (The report of the committee, both majority and minority, can be found in volume Reports of Committees, second session Forty-second Congress, No. 38.)

The second investigation was held by the same committee, at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, upon charges preferred by Hon. William M. Stone, then and now a member of Congress. (See Report No. 775, 1st session 43d Congress.) The report not only discusses the law in reference to postal contracts and the legislation proposed to the House to remedy certain of its defects, so as to prevent straw-bidding, but goes into a careful consideration of all the charges against the Department and its late chief, Hon. John A. J. Creswell, and vindicates him in every particular. The honorable gentleman now at the head of the Committee on Appropriations (Mr. Randall) and his colleague on that committee, (Mr. Atkins,) both able and vigilant, and both intense partisans, were members of the committee, and both of them concurred in the finding of facts as reported by the committee.

The next investigation was upon charges presented at the same session of Congress, covering substantially the same matters, by the gentleman from California, (Mr. Luttrell,) then and now a member of Congress, and at this time a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The unanimous report of the committee (see report No. 783, 1st session 43d Congress) finds, among other things, that the charges against the Post-Office Department were not true, and states that the honorable gentleman from California (Mr. Luttrell) himself, pending the investigation instituted on his own motion, became so well satisfied as to the integrity of the Postmaster-General that he admitted "that he believed the Postmaster-General (Mr. Creswell) has been and is doing all he can to break up and punish straw-bidding, and that he is an efficient and vigilant officer."

So it will be seen that no Department of the Government has been so exhaustively investigated as the Post-Office Department, and that no Department has been so thoroughly vindicated for integrity, vigilance, and efficiency. This appears not only from the public records of the Department and of Congress, but also from the admissions of the honorable gentleman from California (Mr. Luttrell,) and the report of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Randall) and his democratic colleague on the committee, (Mr. Atkins.) Yet, in the light of all these facts, the present Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, under the Morrison resolution, felt impelled to make still another investigation of the same matters that had been thrice traveled over before, and not only that, but to investigate the former investigations themselves.

The fourth investigation commenced, with an unbridled commission and with plenary powers, on the 31st of January last. The committee worked industriously from that time until about the 1st of June last, when the investigation substantially ceased. Witnesses have been brought from the Atlantic and the Pacific, from the Lakes and the Gulf, to testify, at great trouble and loss of time and money. The realms of hearsay-evidence, suspicion, and conjecture, frequently under the lead of malice and hatred arising from disappointment or fancied wrong, have been explored to find something that would connect the Post-Office Department with some fraudulent or improper action; but in vain, for the evidence, when all in, shows conclusively that the Department, under Mr. Creswell and Governor Jewell, with the exception of four or five clerks who were detected in fraud by the Postmaster-General over a year ago and promptly dismissed, has been conducted with efficiency, vigilance, honesty, and economy; and that, in so far as the investigation may have been carried on to vindicate the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Randall) and the honorable gentleman (Mr. Atkins) from Tennessee, in their report of 1874, before referred to, it is a complete success.

But as the committee saw proper to investigate the investigations and travel over the thrice-trodden ground, it is proper that we should review the manner in which this investigation has been conducted, and refer to such new facts as may have been developed touching the former investigations, and especially to the evidence showing up the agencies by which they were brought about, and the persons who instigated them and profited by them.

First, the manner of the present investigation.

The action of the Post-Office Department as to all of its business is matter of record in the Department. For instance, the advertisements for service, the bids, their acceptance, the failure of bidders to enter into contract, the awarding of contracts, the contracts themselves, the orders increasing the service or changing the schedule-time or cutting down the number of trips, and the recommendations or proofs in support of such orders, with the proofs upon which fines or forfeitures are made or remitted—in fact, everything which forms a basis for action, as well as the action taken thereon, are all a part of the record in the Department.

And when we recollect that nearly $30,000,000 per annum are collected as revenue and $35,000,000 per annum spent by this Department, with its 300,000 miles of post-routes and its complicated service reaching over our extended territory and across every ocean and sea to every civilized nation of the earth, it will be seen at once that the only safety to the Department or the people is to have all the evidence touching all action had or proposed in black and white, and filed as of record among the archives of the Department, so that “a wayfaring man, though a fool,” if he wanted to fairly investigate and determine whether the action of the Department was right and proper, or otherwise, would first find from the record what the action of the Department had been and the proofs upon which it was based; and, if then it should be alleged that wrongful action could be established outside the record, such proof could be elicited and tested intelligently. This is especially important where the law is changed from session to session, so that frequently lawful and proper action one year would, under different law, be very improper another year.

But, strange to say, the committee did not, and would not, proceed in this way, but, on the contrary, refused to so proceed. Against all manner of protests and objections, they plunged at once into the examination of witnesses who were swift to testify as to such imperfect knowledge of the record as they by hearsay or suspicion might have. In the mean time their partial, imperfect, and frequently willfully untrue statements, with their hearsay and suspicion that were afterward contradicted beyond question by the record and by facts outside the record, were day by day telegraphed to a partisan press all over the country as truth, established by proof as strong as holy writ, and claimed to be evidence of the frauds, committed under the rule of this corrupt republican party, which demanded an administration in the interest of reform by the white-robed democracy.

The principal witnesses upon which the superstructure of the investigation was reared—in other words, the corner-stones of the edifice—were men who had been in the employment of the Post-Office Department, and who had been discharged for incompetency, fraud, venality, or improper practices. For example, to take one from the lot who was most reckless and sweeping in his statements, E. F. O'Brien. He makes no declaration against the Department as being within his own knowledge which is not conclusively disproved. In the main, however, his evidence is mere hearsay and suspicion, and was purposely given with such looseness as to time, place, and persons that it could not be met by contradictory proof. Upon his cross-examination, with brazen effrontery, he gloats over his own infamy. By innuendo and indirection, by mere opinion and suspicion, he accuses Mr. French, chief clerk; Mr. Lake, chief of inspection division; Mr. Creswell, Ex-Postmaster-General; Colonel Routt, former Second Assistant Postmaster-General; and Mr. Tyner, present Postmaster-General, all with corruption, favoritism, or venality. In fact, his whole evidence is a tissue of misrepresentations and false conclusions. As an example of the make-up of this witness, we quote from his evidence on pages 140 and 141:

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. You spoke of Mr. Lake, chief of the inspection division; how long have you known him?—A. Something like three years.

Q. You were in his division yourself for about three years?—A. No; he was only promoted to the chief of division some eighteen months or possibly two years ago.

Q. You were a clerk with him in the inspection division prior to that time?—A. He was clerk in charge of the Ohio division.

Q. You were in the office something like a year after he was promoted?—A. Yes, sir; perhaps a little longer; I do not remember the exact date of his promotion.

Q. Did you ever have a difficulty with him?—A. No, indeed; I never had any difficulty with any of the clerks.

Q. Was there any hard feeling existing between you and him?—A. Not that I am aware of.

Q. You are good friends, are you?—A. As good friends as men ordinarily are who are moving in the same circle of life.

Q. You never had any cause of quarrel?—A. No; the man never did me any harm that I know of.

Q. Be kind enough to particularize any improper action you may know upon his part in relation to his official duties.—A. I do not know that I could particularize any very particular thing that would reflect any discredit upon Mr. Lake, except, perhaps, the assumption of a little more authority at times than he was entitled to—a kind of overbearing manner.

Q. It was the manner in which he combed his hair and regulated his actions?—A. No, sir; not in any way or shape; but merely in transacting the business of the office. He had a kind of brusque manner that showed that promotion had rather spoiled him. Sometimes I have seen men promoted from private to corporal who thought they would make better major-generals than corporals. So it was with him; he was promoted from $1,200 to $1,400, and when he got to be an eighteen hundred dollar clerk he thought the whole Post-Office Department was on his shoulders.

Q. That is all you know or can say against him?—A. I am just speaking about that. As far as regards his doing anything out of the way or illegal, nobody would have a chance to discover it in his room, because his room is a private room, and the clerks did not go in there, but the contractors did; that is all there is about it. The clerks who did go in attended to their business and did not associate with or sit down and talk with him; so it would be impossible to put your finger on any one thing beyond the shadow of a doubt and say that he had done something wrong.

Q. If you know beyond the shadow of a doubt that he has done something wrong, give us the evidence.—A. I tell you that unless a man did know—

Q. Then why do you say that of him?—A. I do not.

Q. Why do you intimate it?—A. I did not intimate that he has done something wrong; you cannot find that in my testimony.

Q. If you have said that, you now take it back?—A. If I have intimated that he has done anything wrong, I stand by the record.

Q. Do you now intimate that he has done anything wrong?—A. No; I do not; neither have I.

Q. If the record says that you have so intimated, you stand by it?—A. That is what I said.

Q. You still say now that you do not know where he has done anything wrong?—A. I say I cannot say beyond the shadow of a doubt; everything is circumstantial evidence, as a matter of course; we were not spies watching him and trying to catch him or any of the clerks.

Q. You supposed he had an opportunity to do wrong?—A. I know he had an opportunity.

Q. Do you suppose he did?—A. I don't suppose anything of the kind.

Q. I am asking for evidence of the wrong he did.—A. I have already told you that I had no evidence of his doing anything wrong; I am only speaking of what a man might do.

Q. You only considered what he would do?—A. I don't know. I have had a great deal of experience among criminals, and I am rather suspicious of every man.

Q. You have not much confidence in human nature?—A. I have not.

Q. Your idea is that all men are thieves, and you have but to give them an opportunity?—A. I think that every man has his price, if he but gets enough.

Q. You measure human nature in that way, and for that reason you thought Mr. Lake, having an opportunity to do wrong in coming in contact with these men, he would improve that opportunity?—A. I was speaking, sir, in the general term—

Q. I am speaking in particular terms; do you include yourself when you say every man has his price?—A. Most certainly I do.

The place held by O'Brien was that of inspection-clerk in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's Office, his duty being to examine the certificates of postmasters at the termini of mail-routes, as to performance or failure of service by contractors. A dishonest clerk in a place of that kind can, by certifying to full service when the proofs show there should be a deduction, swindle the Government. With this explanation, we give an extract from his evidence, on page 148, in reference to the service on route 9603, from Evansville to Cairo:

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. I want to call your attention to the verbal order which Colonel Routt gave you to certify to the performance of service on the Evansville and Cairo route, and get you to fix as near as you can the time of that conversation.—A. That I cannot tell.

Q. Can you fix the year?—A. Eighteen hundred and seventy-two or eighteen hundred and seventy-three; I really would not undertake to specify which.

Q. Did you ever have more than one conversation with him on that subject?—A. I do not remember. I only know of one.

Q. And that was the time Mr. Sweetser, Mr. Theodore McPherson, and Mr. French were present?—A. So far as my memory serves me, that was so.

Q. It related to this account business which you were making up at that time?—A. Yes; and to some other accounts.

Q. Had you made any fines and deductions on that route at that time?—A. Yes; on all those routes.

Q. I am speaking of this route now.—A. It is a very hard thing for me to separate that particular route from any other, because it was in the general routine, and, as a matter of course, I have not the date.

Q. When did the service commence on this route by the company of which Mr. Sweetser was secretary?—A. Before I went into the Post-Office Department.

Q. Did he at that time give you instructions in the future to certify the performance of the service by that company, without reference to the registers?—A. —I do not know that he did. He may have; I do not remember.

Q. You swear that you do not remember whether he told you not only to certify to the performance of service at that time, but also to certify in the future that the service had been performed on that route by the company of which Mr. Sweetser was secretary, without reference to the register?—A. I do not think there would be an order like that given.

Q. If the case had been made up at the time Colonel Routt told you to certify according to the register, do you remember what the amount of fines and deductions would have been?—A. No; I do not.

Q. I will ask you if it is true that for the quarter ending March 31, 1873, on the Evansville and Cairo route, (at that time No. 9603,) according to the registers returned by the postmasters, the fines and deductions should have been $1,298.16?—A. I have no recollection of it.

Q. Was that the quarter that Mr. Routt directed you to certify to without reference to the registers on file?—A. I cannot tell without reference to the books. The record will show.

Q. Is it true that you did certify for that quarter that the service had been performed in full?—A. That you will have to go to the books for.

Q. Were you not in charge of the desk at that time?—A. I may have been, and I may have been absent.

Q. I will ask you if it is true that for the quarter ending June 30, 1873, by the registers and proof on file, the deductions and fines should have been $24.04, and that nevertheless you certified that the service had been performed in full?—A. I cannot answer those questions without reference to the books.

Q. I will ask you whether it is true that for the quarter ending December 31, 1873, by the registers and proof on file, the fines and deductions should have been $96.16, and that you certified that the service had been performed in full?—A. That I cannot answer.

Q. I will ask you whether it is true that for the quarter ending March 31, 1874, by the registers and proof on file, the deductions should have been $24.04, and that still you certified to its performance?—A. It is very probable that I did.

Q. I will now ask you whether it is true that for the quarter ending June 30, 1874, by the registers returned, the deductions and fines should have been $144.24, and notwithstanding you certified that the service had been performed on that route in full?—A. I do not think there should have been any deductions that quarter, but it is impossible for me to say.

Q. I will ask you whether it is true that for the quarter ending September 30, 1874, by the registers on file, the deductions should have been $144.24, and yet you certified that the service had been performed in full?—A. I certified to that service.

Q. I will ask you again whether it is true that for the quarter ending September 30, 1874, by the registers and proof on file, the deductions and fines should have been $144.24, and yet you certified that the service had been performed in full?—A. No; it is not true, because the proof of there being sufficient excuses ought to be on file.

Q. Was it on file?—A. It was.

Q. I will ask you again, is it not true that, though the registers and proofs on file showed that for the quarter ending September 30, 1874, the deductions and fines should have been $144.24, in the teeth of the proof you certified that the service had been performed in full?—A. To enable you to pass on that question, I will say yes.

Q. Colonel Routt ordered you to do that?—A. I do not remember.

Q. Who did order you?—A. I do not know anything about it.

Q. I will ask you if it is true that for the quarter ending December 31, 1874, though the registers and proofs showed that the fines and deductions should have been $576.96, you nevertheless certified that the service had been performed in full?—A. Probably I did.

Q. Did Colonel Routt instruct you to do so?—A. I do not remember.

Q. Who did?—A. I do not know that anybody did.

But to remove all room for doubt, Samuel M. Lake, chief of the inspection division, Post-Office Department, on pages 552–554, shows, by producing the records of the Department, that O'Brien for a great number of quarters deliberately swindled the Government, by certifying to full service on the Evansville and Cairo route, out of thousands of dollars, when the proof showed, quarter after quarter, that the service was not full. Yet the suspicions of this witness, who had been forced out of the Department long before this investigation for his fraudulent practices and downright swindling, given under the influence of hate and malice against those who had detected and exposed him, were telegraphed, day by day, all over the country, and heralded in a partisan press as conclusive evidence of the fraud and corruption of officials high in authority and position.

Another witness is one Theodore L. Holbrook, also an ex-employé in the Post-Office Department, whose resignation was demanded by Governor Jewell. He, too, suspects many things, and by the introduction of his suspicions, grounded on hearsay, seeks to blacken and smirch many persons connected with the Department, when, on eliciting the truth, the truth does not smirch anybody. For example, this witness, while a clerk in the Department, claims to be cognizant of many irregularities and frauds, and, instead of reporting them, if they existed, to his superior officers in the Department, or giving them to the public, and assuming the responsibility therefor, he makes his statement privately to Hon. Messrs. Stone, of Missouri, and Luttrell, of California, then members of Congress, for the purpose of instigating them to prefer charges against the Department and set on foot investigations.

As a specimen of the animus of Holbrook, and to show how little reliance is to be placed upon the character of testimony given by him, we refer to an affidavit that he made in 1874 to cause the charges to be preferred by Stone and Luttrell. Although the affidavit in full was not made public as coming from him until during the present investigation, its statements have been telegraphed time and again all over the country as evidence of the frauds existing in the Department. The affidavit is as follows, and is to be found in Holbrook's evidence on page 110, with the comments of Holbrook concerning it:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

City of Washington, ss:

On this the 16th day of May, 1874, personally appeared before me Theodore L. Holbrook, who, being by me duly sworn, deposes and says: That he is a fourth-class clerk in the money-order bureau of the Post-Office Department, receiving a salary of $1,800 per annum, and that on the 5th day of February, 1874, J. B. Underwood, a special agent of the Post-Office Department, whose headquarters are at Eugene City, Oreg., made the following statement to him in room 57 of the Post-Office Department, in the presence of J. H. Whitaker, a third-class clerk in the money-order bureau of the Post-Office Department, namely, that he (Underwood) had inspected the mail-service on route No. 15414, from Missoula, Mont., to Walla Walla, Wash., and had reported to the Post-Office Department that the service was unnecessary, and that in consequence of such report the service was reduced, but was afterward restored; that his (Underwood's) pay was reduced, and that he came near being removed, since which time he had minded his own business. He also stated that Charles Moore, late postmaster at Walla Walla, Wash., was one of the best postmasters in the Territory; but that he kept a record of all the letters that passed over route No. 15414 from or to his office for six months, and reported to the Department that the service was unnecessary, and that it cost the Department at or near the rate of a thousand dollars for every letter carried over the said route. That the service on the route was continued; that the said Charles Moore was removed from office, and one James M. Gorman, the agent of the contractors upon said route, was appointed postmaster in his place; that the people of Walla Walla made such a fuss that the said Gorman did not take the office.

The deponent further says that from the records of the Post-Office Department he has taken the following statement, namely:

Route No. 15414 was let in March, 1870, under advertisement of September 30, 1869, for once-a-week service to L. L. Blake for $15,100 per annum; (failed to contract.)
Contract for once-a-week service, made with C. C. Huntley, at.....	$22, 900
July 29, 1870, one additional trip, ordered on side supply	2, 022
August 23, 1870, service extended on side supply to Gird's Creek, forty-five miles, increasing pay	4, 550
December 22, 1870, two additional trips ordered between Missoula and Walla Walla, increasing pay	41 754
Pay per annum	71, 226

Advertised in 1873 as route 43127, three times a week, mail.

Charles Moore appointed postmaster Walla Walla, Washington, March 17, 1869. Re-appointed (office made presidential) July 13, 1870.

James M. Gorman appointed postmaster Walla Walla, January 29, 1873; (failed to bond.)

Samuel D. Smith appointed postmaster Walla Walla, March 18, 1873.

JAMES LAWRENSON,
Justice of the Peace.

Now, the object of the affidavit and its introduction as evidence, and of its being hawked about the halls of Congress, and of its statements being published by the democratic partisan press all over the country, is patent.

It will also be noticed that the damaging matter in the affidavit is hearsay in the second degree; that is, Holbrook heard Underwood say what he, Underwood, said he heard Moore say. Now, let us see what the testimony shows the fact to be about the increase of service upon this route, the amount of service performed thereon, and the removal of Moore, the postmaster at Walla Walla. Huntley, the contractor for carrying the mails, testifies that the route was an important one and carried a large mail, he having personal knowledge of it. It is true that Postmaster-General Creswell, when he was appointed in 1869, (see page 589,) found this route in operation, with tri-weekly service, at $65,000 per annum, and that he cut down the service to one trip a week, decreasing the pay $42,000 per annum, on September 25, 1869; but it is also true that the almost universal demand of citizens of the Territory and the recommendations of every public officer in the Territory, as well as of Senator Williams, of Oregon, made out so strong a case that the Postmaster-General felt it to be his duty to restore the service to the condition in which he found it; and no sane man can read the record shown in the testimony on pages 588, 589, 591-593, without saying that the Postmaster-General was not only justified in restoring the service, but would have been justly censurable if he had refused to do so.

Again, it appears on pages 593-595, and in the same connection, that Moore was removed as postmaster at Walla Walla, not for any recommendations he made in favor of discontinuing the service, but upon charges and proofs of grave misconduct in office, and that he had a full hearing before the Postmaster-General in person; and after his removal he wrote a letter to the Postmaster-General, which is on the files of the Department, and in evidence to be found on page 594, under date November 5, 1873, in which he in effect admits that the Postmaster-General, on the case as presented to him, and the hearing when he was present, was justified in removing him. And while it is true that one James M. Gorman, agent for the contractors, was appointed postmaster at Walla Walla in place of Moore, removed, yet it appears that as soon as the knowledge of that fact came to the Postmaster-General he reported the same to the President (page 595) and asked his removal, which was had, and another man appointed, against whom no objection was urged.

The testimony subsequently shows that Gorman never did qualify or take charge of the office. On the same pages it also appears from the record that the contract was let to Huntley, strictly according to law, and that if the Postmaster-General had refused to let it to him, he would have acted in violation of law and been open to censure. Yet while this slander has been dispatched on the wings of lightning to all points of the compass, to be again fulminated by the democratic press, the truth of the matter has not been given by a single paper in the whole country.

What can be said sufficiently strong in condemnation of a man who, as an old employé, had easy access to the records of the Department containing all these facts, and who, in order to make the affidavit, must have at least partially examined the records, yet makes an affidavit like this; has it hawked about the halls of Congress for the purpose of smirching his superiors in office, and finally gets it into his evidence in this investigation; when he must have known that its statements, instead of making a truthful impression, tended only to obscure the truth and make the parties to whom it was exhibited, and the country, believe a falsehood?

Yet this man Holbrook, who, after O'Brien, is the most important witness in this investigation, after he had been compelled to resign by Postmaster-General Jewell, is at the commencement of this Congress made clerk of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, Hon. Mr. Stone, of Missouri, being the chairman of said committee—the same gentleman to whom this affidavit was exhibited in the Forty-third Congress. This appointment, however, appears to be in the line of precedent; for one Ford, who was compelled to quit a clerkship in the Department by Postmaster-General Jewell, for complicity in the Kittle frauds, over a year ago, is honored by the position of Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, under appointment from the present democratic Sergeant-at-Arms, and in fine style serves the process of the House in this investigation upon the witnesses. So it looks as if the surest passport to position and honor under the present House, in some of these smaller places, is to be guilty of fraud or misconduct under republican appointment, to be forced out of office, and to tender service to the democratic majority to smirch somebody, by any means, however questionable. With these prerequisites, a position of some kind is at once provided for the candidate. And we submit that the offering of these appointments to such characters, as a consideration for testimony against the administration of the Department in which they were formerly employed, is not calculated to inspire confidence in evidence so induced.

We now come to speak of the res gestæ surrounding the investigation of 1872, as shown by the evidence taken during this investigation. And let us inquire by whom and for what purpose the investigation of 1872 was brought about; what means were used to bring it about; and what public good was accomplished by it; and what private ends were served.

This investigation was held during the Forty-second Congress, the Hon. J. F. Farnsworth then being chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Randall) being a member of the committee. We have no knowledge of this investigation except as we get it from the report of the committee, both majority and minority, in the Congressional Record, and the evidence taken during the investigation at the present session of Congress; but we have examined the proceedings of that committee with great care, as well as the action of the House and Senate touching the same, and we append a complete history thereof as it appears of record, including the reports, marked "Exhibit A." We also append a complete history of the two investigations, marked "Exhibit B," made during the first session of the Forty-third Congress, showing the reports of the committee and the action of the House and Senate, in full, touching legislation proposed by the committee.

We purpose now, however, to speak of the evidence taken during the present session by the committee.

The evidence shows that Bradley, Barlow & Co., at the lettings made in the year 1871, under the law, obtained the contracts for carrying the mails on the Oroville and Portland route, the Mesilla and San Diego route, and several other routes in the Territories and on the Pacific; that most of these routes to a great extent passed through an unsettled country, reaching from one settlement to another of pioneers and miners, as they had with accustomed American energy launched out into the great West; and that stations were to build, roads to construct, and Indians to fight and guard against, demanding an outlay of over half a million of dollars from this company alone in that kind of property that was almost wholly worthless for any other purpose than for service upon these routes; and that in this new country there was only business enough in transportation of passengers and freight, with the mail service added, to justify one line of coaches upon all of these routes, and that no company could run these coaches without the mail contract, nor could any company do the mail service without coupling with it the transportation of passengers and freight. It took the profits of both to sustain the service, as testified to by all the witnesses.

The regulation of the Department, based upon the law, (page 194, section 263, Postal Code,) is as follows:

SEC. 263. The Postmaster-General may order an increase or extension of service on a route, by allowing therefor a pro rata increase on the contract pay. He may change schedules of departures and arrivals in all cases, and particularly to make them conform to connections with railroads, without increase of pay, providing the running time be not abridged. He may also order an increase of speed, allowing within the restrictions of the law a pro rata increase of pay for the additional stock of carriers, if any. The contractor may, however, in the case of increase of speed, relinquish the contract by giving prompt notice to the Department that he prefers doing so to carrying the order into effect. The Postmaster-General may also discontinue or curtail the service, in whole or in part, in order to place on the route a greater degree of service, or whenever the public interests, in his judgment, shall require such discontinuance or curtailment for any other cause; he allowing as a full indemnity to the contractor one month's extra pay on the amount of service dispensed with, and a pro rata compensation for the amount of service retained and continued.

It will be readily conceded that while the authority to curtail or discontinue the mail-service under any contract is necessary for the protection of Government, yet it is a great power given to the Postmaster-General, and, if exercised with caprice or without sufficient cause, would necessarily, after such large amounts of money are expended in stocking one of these long and difficult mail-routes, ruin the contractor financially, and render his property comparatively worthless. Perhaps the greatest danger that a mail-contractor in the western service has to apprehend is the curtailment or discontinuance of his service after he has made the outlay necessary to perform it, and before he has received any considerable return therefor. Not that there is any great danger of a Postmaster-General arbitrarily and wrongfully exercising such power upon his own motion; but, as the service is necessarily distant from the Department, and rival interests are always upon the alert to gain some advantage, fair or unfair, by making war upon any service that may be established, designing men, for the purpose of levying black-mail upon a contractor thus situated, may seek to manufacture a public opinion by the help of the venal or strongly partisan portion of the press, and thus cause the Postmaster-General to curtail or cancel such contracts, or so affect the House or Senate that a resolution may be passed directing the Postmaster-General to curtail or cancel them. It will be seen at once that persons having investments in property in the kind of service spoken of do not repose upon downy beds of ease.

This was the condition of affairs as to Barlow & Co. with their western contracts, Sawyer & Co. with their Texas contracts, and the Huntleys with their northwestern contracts, as well as with many other mail-contractors, in the winter of 1871 and 1872, the contracts having been made in 1870 and 1871. The testimony of Col. J. C. McKibben, Barlow, Judge Paschal, and others, also shows that at the lettings of 1871, McKibben and Lockwood were bidders upon a number of routes in the State of Texas for the transportation of the mails, but, not being the lowest bidders, did not get the contracts. McKibben was formerly a member of Congress from the State of California—a man of fine ability and presence, a zealous member of the democratic party, in good standing, and, by his own statement, without money, “not worth a dollar in the world,” out of business, and no doubt, speaking from a financial stand-point, desperate.

At this same letting a large amount of straw-bidding had been done, and contracts let to the lowest bidders had been commenced and then thrown up, or not commenced at all, so that between the failure of the contractor and a re-advertisement temporary service would have to be let to any person the Department could get to do the service. On the routes above spoken of no one could do immediate service except the former contractor, who had the stock upon the routes and owned the stations, and he could for such service exact his own price, not, however, exceeding the former contract-price under regular lettings. When the Department would re-advertise frequently the same same thing would be gone through with again in spite of the best efforts of the Postmaster-General, who was tied down in his action by positive law, Congress having failed to give the necessary remedial legislation.

With the law but imperfectly understood by the country, and for that matter, with Congress but imperfectly realizing the defects in the law; with desperate and unscrupulous adventurers resorting to straw-bidding for the purpose of compelling those who were bidders in good faith to give them a bonus, their straw-bids costing nothing; with the regular contractors countermining by purchasing these bids, and procuring others to put in bids for them, and not in the names of the contractors, for the purpose of checkmating straw-bidders or so handling their bids under the law as in the end to get the service either temporarily or permanently at a large figure, a fine field was opened to unscrupulous contractors to impose upon the Government, and in turn a fine field was opened to this soldier of fortune to enlist a partisan press and the partisan democratic minority of the House of Representatives of the Forty-second Congress in a war upon the contractors for mail-service and upon the Postmaster-General. McKibben's object, as he states himself in substance on page 427, was not to promote the public good, but to better his condition, while, of course, the object of democratic members, with whom he consulted and worked, was no doubt to make political capital by discrediting and, if possible, dishonoring the Postmaster-General.

The first thing McKibben did, as he himself testifies, and for that matter as fully appears from facts and circumstances outside the evidence of McKibben, was to enter into a combination with Lockwood and W. H. Farrar (for the purpose of bettering the condition of the three) to make war on the Department and the contractors. The war was opened in December, 1871, by several articles in the papers, written by McKibben, in effect accusing the Postmaster-General of favoritism and unfair, if not fraudulent, action in letting these contracts to Barlow & Co., to Sawyer, Peterson, and others, and calling for an investigation by Congress. At the same time McKibben, as he testifies, was in frequent communication with democratic members of Congress, urging upon them to offer resolutions for investigation, and sometimes resolutions were offered, but, under objection, failed. Meantime Lockwood, as shown by the evidence, was professing to play the part of a disinterested friend with Barlow, representing to him that a formidable combination was formed, the object of which was to make war on him and curtail or discontinue his contracts, either by creating a public opinion that would force the Postmaster-General to cut off his contracts, or, at the end of an investigation, procure the passage of a resolution by the House of Representatives directing his contracts to be canceled, and urging him to stop the war that was being made upon him by payment of money. Barlow, however, as the testimony shows, from time to time, refused to "come down."

Finally, on the 8th day of January, McKibben caused to be published in the Washington Patriot an article in which he attacked the Postmaster-General, Barlow, Sawyer, and others, at great length and with great bitterness, and called for an investigation by Congress; which article was published generally throughout the country, and has been at various times since substantially republished, furnishing the basis for three if not four investigations, and which can be found on pages 400 to 409, inclusive, of the evidence.

Immediately after the publication of these articles, containing grave charges against the management of the Department in letting mail-contracts in the West and South, and their dissemination throughout the whole country, the then Postmaster-General, Mr. Creswell, met the issue squarely and demanded an investigation at the hands of the House, which was ordered on motion of the then chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, General Farnsworth. Pending this investigation, Farrar and Lockwood again approached Barlow, representing that it was better he should pay money to this combination that had worked up this furor than to risk their further unfriendliness in manufacturing a public opinion that might cause the Postmaster-

General to discontinue the service upon his routes, or operate upon the House so as to cause the passage of a resolution directing the canceling of his contracts, the effect of which would have been to render comparatively without value over five hundred thousand dollars' worth of property. We will now quote from Barlow's testimony, on pages 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, and 392, giving his own story, as follows:

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. How long have you been a contractor for mail-service?—A. About sixteen or seventeen years, commencing before the war.

Q. That was under Buchanan's administration?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you speak of contracting for mail-service that length of time, do you mean in the Territories in the West?—A. In our first service we purchased stock and contracts of a party in Missouri for a hundred-mile service from Sedalia to Kansas City. Then at the next lettings some parties obtained some contracts that they were unable to furnish the capital to carry out, and among them the Santa Fé route, from Independence, Mo., to Santa Fé, and from Santa Fé to El Paso, and we purchased that. We purchased the stock of the old contractors. There were quite a number of other routes also.

Q. You have been a pretty heavy mail-contractor since prior to 1860 up to the present time?—A. I have.

Q. Have you been about Washington a good deal since that time?—A. I have, a great deal.

Q. Commencing in Buchanan's time and coming up to the present time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. For what purpose were you about Washington in the first place? Was it for the same purpose that you have been about here subsequently?—A. Yes, sir; just the same.

Q. When did you commence making the acquaintance of members of Congress in position in the Post-Office Department and other Departments? Was it prior to 1860?—A. Yes, sir; I have always been cultivating the acquaintance of the class of men of whom you speak.

Q. Then your practice has been uniformly to render yourself pleasant from the time that you commenced prior to 1860 to the present time?—A. Yes, sir; I have endeavored to. I used to be a politician and learned that then.

Q. Who was the Postmaster-General when you first commenced contracting?—A. I do not remember; it was the Postmaster-General under Buchanan.

Q. Did you ever make the acquaintance of Buchanan's Postmaster-General?—A. Horatio King was the last one under Buchanan. I was very well acquainted with him.

Q. Were you acquainted with him while he was in the Department?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you frequently see him to have conversation with him?—A. Yes, sir; I have ever since.

Q. Were you acquainted with the First and Second Assistant Postmasters-General during that time, whoever they may have been?—A. I had not as much intercourse at that time with them, because my business was not as large; after we got those contracts in the Territories my business led me to be here more.

Q. Were you ever in the Post-Office Department building prior to 1860?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you business about there, such as drawing your pay, &c.?—A. Yes, sir; as I have done since.

Q. Were you acquainted with some of the clerks?—A. Yes, sir; always.

Q. Did you make it a point to become acquainted with them?—A. Yes, sir; and to try to make myself agreeable to them, as I always do with all men with whom I have done business. I have always been pretty successful, too, in that respect.

Q. Did you ever pay any money to any post-office official prior to 1860?—A. No, sir; I do not think I did.

Q. Have you ever paid any money or valuable thing to any post-office official since 1860, directly or indirectly?—A. No, sir, I have not.

Q. Then I understand from you that, so far as the payment of money or the giving of presents or other valuable things from the time that you commenced contracting under James Buchanan's administration to the present time to parties holding official position, or any person for them inside of the Post-Office Department, that you have not done it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Nor any of your firm to your knowledge?—A. No, sir; none of my firm have to my knowledge.

Q. In your experience as a contractor and as a business man, as I understand that you have done a great deal of this business, amounting to many millions of dollars, state if you have noticed that public opinion is manufactured by newspapers which are largely controlled by correspondents at Washington and by parties, some of them meritorious and some of them soldiers of fortune, who are lobbyists about Washington—as to whether or not they have much to do with the manufacture of public opinion?—A. I think that they pretty much control it.

Q. State, as to the moneys you have spent in Washington from the time you commenced contracting to the present time, as a matter of fact, whether they were spent upon these parties and for the purpose of controlling them, to manufacture public opinion, or whether they were spent for the purpose of directly influencing the action of some person or persons in the Post-Office Department?—A. I never have spent much money on the newspapers, for my business was not of such a character as to require it.

Q. I am not speaking of newspapers alone, but I am speaking of parties who are about Washington?—A. Yes, sir; it was.

Q. It was spent to affect them in their attacks upon you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Or was it spent to affect the officers of the Post-Office Department improperly; which was it?—A. I never spent any money to produce any improper influence upon any officers of the Post-Office Department, and it never was necessary; but I was subject to constant attacks, and often controversies with rival contractors, and sometimes mail-service necessarily conflicts with others who have mail-service; people are trying to shift routes in order to accommodate their own purposes; try to get them curtailed or to get their service improved, or to change in some way, so as to affect somebody else's routes. I have had that to contend with, and I have been obliged to expend a great deal of money in warding off the attempts which were made to injure my business. I have been obliged to spend a good deal of money in that way, and have done it. It commenced long ago.

Q. Now, to come down to the investigation of 1872, under what is known as the McKibben resolution, have you ever examined the evidence that was given on that occasion?—A. Colonel McKibben this morning gave me a copy of the report. I never have examined the evidence. I knew, of course, what the evidence must necessarily have been in all the cases where I was interested myself, as I knew it was not possible for anybody to find any evidence that there was any fraud or wrong about my service which I was connected with, and that was sufficient for me.

Q. State what it was that you feared from the result of that investigation and which you attempted to ward off?—A. I had what I thought was good reason to believe that there was a conspiracy formed by some parties who were at the time in the Post-Office Department, and some who had been in the Post-Office Department and were out, and some parties who had never had anything to do with the Post-Office Department and were outside, but who had been in the habit of bidding. There was a conspiracy formed to levy black-mail upon me and to break up my contracts if they possibly could. I had legal advice in reference to the situation as to whether I was liable to receive any injury or whether any legal injury could possibly result—whether I was in any legal danger. I got Judge Paschal to examine the whole subject and give me his written opinion about it, which he did. That opinion was that I was not in danger of their accomplishing any injury; but he said it was a mere question of policy whether I should silence these fellows by giving them some money or whether I should go in and have a fight.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State the names of those parties.—A. I do not know the names. I gave the names as well as I could the other day. Mr. McKibben could probably tell you more about who the parties were than I could. I never asked him who they were.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Who in the Post-Office Department was in this conspiracy?—A. I do not really know. I have no knowledge of anybody who was in the Post-Office Department who was in it, but it was represented to me that there were parties in the Department in it.

Q. Who made that representation? Did Farrar?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have it from anybody in the Post-Office Department?—A. No, sir; I did not; it was parties pretty low down, anyhow, I supposed from his representations.

Q. What do you mean by that?—A. I mean low in position.

Q. Do you mean clerks?—A. Yes, sir; clerks.

Q. Do you know whether Farrar told you the truth about this, or told you a lie for the purpose of making an impression upon your mind that the conspiracy was formidable, to get money out of you?—A. I had the impression, because he showed me statements which were transcripts of the records of the Department, which satisfied me they had some means of getting them which was rather unusual.

Q. Were they not public records?—A. Yes, sir; they were public records. Anybody could go and get them, but I could not find out who did get them.

Q. Yet anybody had a right to them, had they not?—A. Yes, sir; there was nothing there but what anybody had a right to, but they were picking up the same information which was disclosed here before the committee.

Q. I understand from your evidence you had just bought the stock upon the Oroville and Portland route of a man named Jesse D. Carr?—A. I bought the stock on the Kelton and Dalles route and some others, of a man named Lockwood.

Q. How much did you have in the stocks of those roads?—A. We bought at over $380,000—somewhere between $350,000 and $400,000 for the stock.

XXXII MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Q. What was the value of your stock on the western routes in the Territories at that time, as near as you can remember? Lump it.—A. Probably over $500,000

Q. I suppose for anything else except for the mail-service that the stock, and coaches and stations, and all matters connected therewith are not of any great value?—A. They are of very little value if your contracts are taken from you.

Q. The Postmaster-General had a discretion, under the law, at that time to cut down the service or even to annul contracts, did he not?—A. Yes, sir; by allowing one month's pay he had power to annul contracts.

Q. The cutting down of the service materially or the annulling of contracts, I gather from your evidence, would have been disastrous to contractors holding this large amount of stock?—A. It would have been ruinous to us.

Q. Colonel McKibben had some knowledge about mail-contracts, had he not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He had some experience, and knew something of the magnitude of your operations?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. This man Farrar also had some knowledge?—A. Yes, sir; I think they were both bidders on the routes in Sawyer's section.

Q. They had knowledge enough to understand the effect that the decrease or the cutting off would have upon you after you had invested your capital in the stock?—A. Yes, sir. This man Lockwood, I learned afterward, was one of the principal managers of the conspiracy.

Q. Lockwood was representing himself as your friend in this matter?—A. Yes, sir; I thought he was.

Q. He was advising you to accede to Farrar's terms?—A. Yes, sir; and I have no doubt he received some of the money.

Q. You subsequently ascertained that he was in the combination?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. As to the $40,000 in round numbers that was paid to Farrar, state whether it was for the purpose of bribing any member of Congress or anybody in the Post-Office Department, or whether it was not paid to him for the purpose of shutting the mouths of these men who were making war upon you, from the fear that they might manufacture that kind of a case in Congress, or that kind of public opinion, that would cause unfavorable action to you by the Department in cutting off your routes and decreasing your service?—A. It was paid for that purpose. I never supposed a dollar of it would go to anybody except to these fellows who were manufacturing this public opinion, stimulating these newspaper articles which were published all over the country. I never expected a dollar of it would go to anybody in any official position, and never had the least idea that it did, and they never pretended that it did.

Q. Were all the facts in reference to your bids upon the contracts and the recommendations upon which service was increased matters of record in the Post-Office Department?—A. They were all matters of record. There never was anything brought to bear by me, or those interested with me, that I know of or believe, except what is a matter of record.

Q. State whether you had any conversation yourself with McKibben prior to the investigation, or pending the same, touching the pressing of this charge by him before the committee or otherwise.—A. I do not think that I did. I had considerable talk with Mr. Farrar, and, I think, with Mr. Huntley, and I think that Mr. Huntley went to see McKibben to ascertain if he could not employ him; and he declined, as I understood, to be employed, saying that he had made the charges, and he felt in honor bound to sustain them. He went to him to employ him.

Q. What did you understand from Mr. Farrar as to Mr. McKibben being in this combination and making this war upon you, and as to his being affected in any way by the payment of this money? I am asking you now as to Farrar's representations; I am not asking you as to what McKibben did or did not do.—A. He thought he could influence and to some extent control McKibben, but I do not know that he did. I guess he tried to do the best he could.

Q. That is one of the representations upon which you paid the $40,000?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. At the time that you paid the $40,000 you supposed that McKibben was in the ring, so to speak, for the purpose of getting a portion of the money; that is, you supposed so from Farrar's reports?—A. Mr. McKibben has been my counsel ever since.

Q. Yes, I know that; but judging from Farrar's reports, state whether you supposed that McKibben along with Farrar and others would let up?—A. I expected from Farrar's representations that the investigation would not be pushed in any direction—that is, that they would not push it if they could prevent it—he would not, if it could be prevented, push it in any direction which would annoy or disturb me or give me any trouble or vexation, or that would render it necessary for me to expend any time about it.

Q. Did you expect by that, or did Mr. Farrar represent by that, that he would suppress any facts that were in existence in reference to this matter?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then from your stand-point, if I get it correctly, and from Farrar's representations, the only effect, as you understood it, of the use of this $40,000 was to call off this combination which was hounding you, and which, according to your theory, got up this thing for the purpose of black-mailing you?—A. That is what I expected from it. I never expected that they would influence the committee at all. I expected to call off the hounds. It was blood-money, as we call it, and if they got that they would be satisfied.

Q. I believe you have already stated that Farrar represented that he was satisfied that he could affect McKibben as well as others?—A. He thought he could. I do not know whether he could or not. McKibben took his own course about the business.

Q. There was a lull in the war after you paid the money, was there not?—A. Yes; they were always happy; there were no more patriotic outbursts about the frauds in the Post-Office Department.

Q. Newspaper articles were not quite so plenty, were they, afterward?—A. No, sir; they were not at all; I did not hear anything more of it.

Q. Is Mr. McKibben a lawyer?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is he a pretty good lawyer?—A. Yes, sir; a good lawyer.

Q. Had you ever employed him before?—A. No, sir; I never saw him before.

Q. Then these charges that he fathered, and which were published in the Patriot, upon which this resolution of investigation was founded, resulted in your becoming acquainted with McKibben and employing him as your attorney?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What has been the nature of the duties which he has performed for you from that time to this?—A. Well, not very arduous.

Q. What has been his pay?—A. It has been pretty good pay.

Q. About how much?—A. He is not a cheap man. I have paid him more than I have anybody else.

Q. How much a year?—A. I guess he has received from it, one way and another, $40,000 or $50,000.

Q. From that time to the present time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many lawsuits has he ever brought for you?—A. None at all.

Q. How many legal opinions has he ever given you?—A. Not a great many.

Q. Do you think he has given you five hundred dollars' worth?—A. I do not know; that was not exactly what he was employed for. He was to attend to my business as mail-contractor. I thought he was a pretty good hand to keep those fellows off.

Q. Is not this the truth about it, that he had been pretty successful, by writing and procuring to be published the article in the Washington Patriot, in raising this furore?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Which has cost you $40,000 to suppress; and you concluded that you had better have him in your pay now, and have no more of that kind of thing, so far as he was concerned?—A. That is exactly it.

Q. In other words, it was hush-money to him more than anything else?—A. Mr. McKibben has been of some service to me in my business. He has been of considerable service to me.

Q. But the principal matter was to keep him from making war?—A. I was satisfied that Mr. McKibben would not be unfaithful to any employment that he had, and I thought that he was a pretty good man to have to checkmate that class of men who had been, as I thought, black-mailing me.

Q. He has not been engaged in getting up any investigation against you to your knowledge since that time, has he?—A. No, sir; I always thought that Farrar did not distribute his money to all conspirators. There was an investigation attempted the very last year.

Q. That was two years ago, was it not?—A. Yes, sir; two years ago. The usual signs that preceded a storm of that kind were all out, and I made up my mind that I would fight.

Q. What do you mean by the usual signs?—A. I mean the articles, attacks in the newspapers, upon the service and upon ourselves and upon the Post-Office Department. Then came the intimations.

Q. What intimations?—A. Intimations that this man or that some man could be stopped if it was desirable to stop it.

Q. Did these intimations come before this McKibben article was written?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who came to you and gave intimation of that kind before the McKibben article was written?—A. Lockwood did.

Q. What did Lockwood say to you?—A. He said they were getting up a combination to break up our contracts.

Q. Who, did he say?—A. He said that certain parties were.

Q. Did he speak of McKibben in that regard?—A. No, sir; I do not think he spoke of McKibben.

Q. Did he speak of Farrar?—A. He spoke of Farrar. He said that there were several other parties engaged with them, and that I had better settle with them and stop it.

Q. What did you do? I now speak of the first case.—A. Of course I did not pay much attention to it at first.

Q. You did not settle?—A. I did not settle. It would be about the next Monday that I would be notified sure that there was going to be a resolution introduced to investigate, and generally on Monday it would come up; somebody would introduce it, and then somebody would object.

Q. Did this intimation come from Lockwood that this conspiracy was being formed by these parties prior to the publication of the article in the Patriot?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You refused to give anything?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did it come to you more than once prior to that time?—A. Yes, sir; frequently.

Q. About how frequently?—A. It seemed to be industriously circulated, so that it was a general rumor that there was going to be an investigation.

Q. About how frequently did Lockwood come to you and want money?—A. Lockwood never asked me for any money; he was a friend of mine.

Q. He recommended that you should give money?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About how frequently did he come recommending that you should give money to Farrar and this combination before the article in the Patriot?—A. I could not state.

Q. More than once?—A. Yes, sir; we had talked about it several times, and I had telegrams sent to me after I had started to go home. I would make up my mind that I would go home, and would have started, and would receive them on the train.

Q. Telegrams from whom?—A. Some parties here saying that I had better come back; that there was trouble brewing.

Q. From Lockwood?—A. I do not remember whom I had them from.

Q. So that you refused prior to the publication of the article in the paper, or up to that time, at least, to pay anything to buy your peace to these men who were engaged in this conspiracy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And even after it was published I understand that you refused to pay anything until the resolution was actually introduced and the investigation commenced?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And in the mean time the effect of the article in the Patriot, which I suppose was published all over the country, and the introduction of the resolution in the House, and the investigation, made enough thunder and lightning, so that you thought you had better come down with $40,000?—A. I thought I had better do it as a matter of policy; it was cheaper to do it than it was to fight it.

Q. State whether it was a part of this understanding with Farrar when it was settled that about $40,000 was to be paid that McKibben should be employed as your attorney. State whether that was spoken of, or whether Farrar had authority to represent that he should be employed.—A. I do not know that there was any understanding with McKibben.

Q. But I am speaking as to Farrar.—A. I think I told Farrar that we should be very glad to employ McKibben.

Q. That was about the time that you agreed to pay the $40,000 was it?—A. Yes, sir; about that time.

Q. Did you authorize him to say that to McKibben?—A. I think I did.

Q. What report did he bring to you?—A. I think Mr. Farrar said that McKibben declined to make any arrangement about it as long as the investigation was pending; that is my impression.

Q. Was it understood between you and Farrar, during this investigation or after this investigation was over, you were to employ Mr. McKibben as your attorney?—A. Farrar certainly understood that I would employ him.

Q. How soon after the investigation was over was it before you did, in fact, employ him?—A. It was immediately or very soon after; right off, I think.

Q. And from that time to this you have probably paid McKibben $50,000?—A. No, sir; I do not think that I have from that time to this.

Q. About how much as near as you can tell; is it $40,000?—A. No, sir; I think, probably, I paid him $25,000. That payment would extend over the last four years. I think it was rather more than that; in fact, I think I have paid him $30,000. He will be able to state, because he is not, probably, having so many transactions as I am.

Q. Did you pay him in money generally, or in checks?—A. I paid him in money sometimes, and sometimes in checks; sometimes I would give him my note.

Q. There has been no secret since that time that he was your attorney?—A. O, no; there has been no secret about that. Sometimes I would give him my note; he has my note now. He said he wanted some money. I had none to give him, and gave my note for $2,500.

Q. Have you thought of anybody else who was in the combination besides Farrar and Lockwood?—A. I do not remember anybody now. In fact, I never took much pains to find out who was. I did not think it was of very much consequence.

Q. I now desire to come down to the investigation of two years ago in the Forty-third Congress. I understood you to say a moment ago that prior to the offering of the resolution in that case for an investigation these same kind of intimations came up?—A. Yes, sir; the same premonitory symptoms that there were before; I could tell just as well.

Q. Who suggested to you, if anybody, that some money ought to be paid?—A. I do not remember now who did. I made up my mind that I would not pay any, and publicly proclaimed it.

Q. Did somebody make such suggestions?—A. Yes, sir; the suggestion was made.

Q. Before the resolution was offered?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know who furnished the information upon which this resolution was offered?—A. It was the same old article of two years before; they had got pretty well stereotyped. They have been published as many as half a dozen times, I think.

Q. They have done duty frequently, then?—A. Yes, sir; they have done duty frequently; and two years ago they took the same old documents and published them again.

Q. Who was in the conspiracy the last time, if it was a conspiracy?—A. I do not know of anybody. I took but little pains about it. I made up my mind that I should not pay any more money any way in that manner.

Q. Did you pay any money during that investigation?—A. Yes, sir; I employed counsel. I employed Judge Black and Judge Paschal. I gave them each a retainer of $1,000.

Q. Did you pay any more money pending that investigation?—A. Yes, sir; I think very likely I did.

Q. To whom?—A. I do not think I disbursed any money myself, but I gave McKibben money to do what he chose with.

Q. How much did you give to McKibben?—A. I do not know; I guess I gave him several thousand dollars.

Q. Several thousand dollars during the investigation of 1874?—A. Yes, sir; perhaps $2,000.

Q. Why was that? As a fee to him, or money to use?—A. It was money to use.

Q. Do you know how he used it?—A. I do not.

Q. Did he ever report to you how he used it?—A. Yes, sir; I think he told me that he had used it.

Q. Did he say whom he had used it with?—A. I think he did.

Q. Who was it?—A. I could not state; I do not recollect. He did not use it in any improper manner, and never represented that he did. I do not know that I can tell how he used any of it; he can state that himself. It was used to fight; it was not used to pay anybody.

In this manner Barlow bought his peace from this combination of sharks, lobbyists, and soldiers of fortune, for $40,000. But here let us do McKibben the justice to say that he claims—and there is no evidence to contradict it—that he received no portion of the $40,000. Having, as he states, in effect, brought about the investigation, he felt in honor bound not to enlist upon the side of the contractors until the investigation was closed. It is nevertheless true that having, as he frankly admits, entered into a combination with Farrar and Lockwood to make war upon the Department and the contractors, (pages 409, 422, and 423,) he would, if upon trial under indictment, be held liable for the declarations and acts of his confederates made or done in carrying out the common object. But, admitting that he received no part of the $40,000 paid by Barlow, (blood-money, as it is called by some of the witnesses,) still the fact remains that Barlow understood, as a part of the arrangement, that he was to employ McKibben as his attorney, at the rate of about $7,000 per annum; not to try cases and give advice as attorneys ordinarily do, but to work for his interest touching mail-contracts, &c., and help ward off adventurers, black-mailers, and soldiers of fortune that might attack him in the future.

While Mr. McKibben testifies (in which he is corroborated by Barlow) that he refused a fee pending the investigation, yet the fact that immediately upon its close he entered the service of Barlow, ceased to bid for mail-contracts, and has received since that time $30,000 in round numbers, not for the trial of cases nor for legal advice, but for services in keeping at bay soldiers of fortune who attempted to levy black-mail, and for the use of his influence in preventing legislation that might be deemed against Barlow's interest, is, to say the least, suggestive of the inference that this was a part of the fruits reaped as a reward by this reformer for his zeal in behalf of a pure public service. However, McKibben tells his object in attacking the service and the Department, in referring to the efforts of Holbrook and Pendleton to promote an investigation touching the same matters in 1874, in the following words :

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. Have you read the evidence in the case of the investigation of 1874 ?—A. I have ; but the impression that it has made on my memory is very slight. When the evidence was furnished me I ran over it casually to see what was in it, and I set the whole thing down as amounting to nothing ; that is, that the character of the evidence brought there had no particular point. One point I would like to make in explanation of the question I was asked, why I did not attend its sessions. I did not, because at my own request I preferred remaining away. That was a request made to Mr. Barlow.

Q. I believe you stated that these charges originated with Mr. Holbrook and Mr. Pendleton ?—A. I have only the general impression and belief in regard to that ; I do not know positively ; I have heard, particularly Holbrook, through a number of years—for the last two or three years—speaking about these things ; about ripping up that and ripping up other things, and my impression is that they originated there. I do not know but what in conversation with some of the committee I may have heard so.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Holbrook was before the committee and his name given to the committee as a witness in the investigation of 1874 ?—A. I am under the impression that it was, although I may be wrong ; not being in the committee and not charging my memory with what I did not consider of any importance, I do not remember. I cared nothing about these investigations so far as my clients were concerned.

Q. Why did you care nothing about them ?—A. I never thought they would amount to anything.

Q. Were they about the same matters, so far as your clients were concerned, which were investigated in 1872 ?—A. The contracts had all expired. They had all gone out of existence, and all that these gentlemen proposed to do was simply to bring up matters that could not at that time be corrected, and if they established everything they wanted to, all that they said they could establish, I would have said just the same thing.

Q. They were the same matters brought up in the investigation of 1872 ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And about which this evidence of which you have spoken was taken ?—A. Yes, sir ; after that investigation there was, as I know from my connection with Mr. Barlow, constant efforts made to get the thing up again and again. It was for no public good. I do not know that I myself started this investigation for any public good. If that was the result of it, I was perfectly satisfied. I was angry, disappointed, and anxious to get to work in Texas. I was anxious to go there to live, and I did not think that I had a fair chance in the Post-Office Department, and I went to work to make it.

Again, it appears from McKibben's evidence, on page 409, that he, Lockwood, and Farrar were acting together making common cause in the matter. On page 423, McKibben admits that they three, during this investigation of 1872, were making common cause in seeking to have Barlow's contracts canceled, while on page 410 McKibben testifies that at the same time and in and about this same investigation he knew Farrar was also acting as Barlow's attorney.

McKibben also testifies that he is and has been attorney for other contractors besides Barlow, but their names are not given in the testimony. The testimony, however, of Mr. Taylor and Judge Paschal shows that Sawyer & Co., the Texas contractors, holding routes upon which McKibben and Lockwood were bidders at the letting of 1871, expended, about the time of the investigation of 1872, from $50,000 to $60,000. The seal of death has been placed upon the lips of Farrar, Lockwood, and Sawyer, and hence we have no word from them informing us to whom this money was paid. It is shown, however, that Farrar, Lockwood, and McKibben were operating together, and this circumstance, when taken in connection with the statement of McKibben that at the time of the investigation in 1872 he was not worth a dollar, and the further evidence that from that time he has not been engaged in business as a mail-contractor, the evidence of Charles E. Clark, the book-keeper of Sawyer, in which he produces the notes of Sawyer to Farrar and McKibben, and checks to McKibben, amounting to a great many thousands of dollars, is both suggestive and important. It can be found on pages 508, 509, 510, and 511, and is as follows:

CHARLES E. CLARK recalled. Examination continued.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. You stated that you desired to make some corrections in your testimony.—
Answer. Yes; with the permission of the committee, I would state that the other day I could not name any of the parties to whom this money was given; not knowing what questions were to be asked me, I was led into that statement, but upon refreshing my memory I can make some corrections in that respect. I have also some checks which aid my recollection. These are checks, drafts, &c., to various parties which were to make the sum of $73,000, (or whatever sum it was,) on the books, which was charged as attorneys' fees. I will state here that those checks and drafts were handed to me by Mr. Sawyer himself, for the purpose of making up that account preparatory to his making his trip to Texas, to have them recorded upon the books of the different divisions there in their proportion.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. What year was that?—A. It was 1872, sir; that is, these checks were of that date. I prepared the statement last spring.

Q. Last spring before Sawyer's death?—A. Yes, sir; before his death.

Q. That was the preparation of the statement of the account that he claimed against the company shortly before his death, and which was not allowed by the company—by the other partners?—A. They objected to it. Mr. Scott and Mr. Taylor both objected to it.

The CHAIRMAN. They objected, but it was allowed.

Mr. CANNON. No, they allowed in 1872; but the last lot of $73,000 they objected to, and it was not allowed, as I understand from the evidence.

The WITNESS. My evidence did not go to that effect, but Mr. Taylor said it. I know that Mr. Taylor and Mr. Scott, when here last summer, did object to their portion of that amount; not that they objected to the gross amount; they objected to the division of it; and I doubt very much if it has been settled.

Q. What we want to do is to distinguish these items from the amount allowed in 1872. These went to make up the $73,000 that was not settled at the time of Sawyer's death, was it?—A. These went to make up the $73,000 that was not settled at the time of Sawyer's death.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Which of those drafts came into your possession, and how did you make up the account?—A. Mr. Sawyer handed me these drafts, requesting me to make up the account for the entire amount of these drafts and checks, as being the amount paid by him as attorney's fees. The same was to be divided and charged against the different divisions, as, for instance, his own. There were only three at that time; his own, Mr. Taylor's, and Mr. Scott's.

Q. Pro rata, I suppose?—A. Yes, pro rata, in proportion to the mail pay.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. They were handed to you in 1875, were they, in the spring?—A. Yes; in the spring of 1875. The first draft or check that I have got in my hands (I do not know that they come in regular order, but I suppose that makes no difference) is a draft drawn June 27, 1872, by F. P. Sawyer, for El Paso Mail Company. The amount is $2,500. It is drawn on C. M. Lockwood, in favor of George W. Cook; the same was accepted by Lockwood on the 2d of June, 1872, and was paid in full on November 2, 1874, the amount being $2,970, which includes interest.

Q. The interest makes how much?—A. I do not know exactly, but the whole is $2,970.

Q. When was that draft due?—A. That draft was due on the 29th of June, 1872; it is a sight draft, accepted on that day by Mr. Lockwood. As evidence of that being the amount, here is a check dated November 3, drawn by Mr. Sawyer on the National Bank of the Republic for $2,970, payable to Frank W. Hackett, who was the attorney for Mr. Lockwood, as I understood it, the amounts corresponding. I did, under Mr. Sawyer's supervision, attach these checks to the different drafts, and in some instances they were attached before I got hold of them. That draft is indorsed on the back, "Pay to C. M. Lockwood. (Signed) George W. Cook." It is indorsed on the face, "Paid in full, November 2, 1874, $2,970. F. W. Hackett, for Lockwood estate." The next paper that I have here is a note dated the same day, at one hundred days from date, for $2,500, in favor of George W. Cook, receipted on the face as follows: "Received February 9, 1875, $3,154 in full. (Signed) Estate of C. M. Lockwood, by F. W. Hackett." Accompanying this is a draft of Mr. Sawyer's on E. A. Abbott, of Boston, for $3,154, a sight draft.

XXXVIII MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Q. George W. Cook indorses to Lockwood on that, does he?—A. Yes; indorses to Lockwood, the same as the other. I have also a promissory note here, dated May 1, 1872, reading as follows: "On demand, I promise to pay C. M. Lockwood $5,000 and interest until paid. (Signed) F. P. Sawyer," and indorsed "Estate of C. M. Lockwood, by Frank W. Hackett, attorney," and indorsed also by Mr. Sawyer, he guaranteeing the indorsement of Hackett. Accompanying that is Mr. Hackett's receipt for $5,378.90, which is the principal and interest. I produce, also, Sawyer's note, dated July 1, 1873, payable to "Frank W. Hackett, attorney," on the 10th day of January, 1874, with interest from date at 7 per cent. on the amount of the note.

Q. Hackett was attorney for whom?—A. This note does not state; but he was attorney for Lockwood. The amount of the note is $3,333.33. There is an indorsement in Mr. Hackett's writing, without being signed, however, in the shape of a receipt, "January 10, 1864, $300." That was the date, you will observe, that the note matured, and on the 14th day of February, 1874, a check of F. P. Sawyer on the National Bank of the Republic, in favor of Hackett, and by him indorsed, for $3,177.22, was drawn, covering, with the $300, the interest. I produce another note of F. P. Sawyer's in favor of F. W. Hackett, attorney, payable on the 10th of October, proximo, for $3,333.33. On the 11th day of October, 1873, Mr. Hackett, as attorney, receipts for draft on E. A. Abbott, Boston: "In full for the above;" and on that same date, 11th October, 1873, accompanying this is a draft of F. P. Sawyer on E. A. Abbott for $3,333.33, the receipt for which is there.

Q. Have you a third note of the same date, July 1, 1873, given by Sawyer to Frank W. Hackett, the attorney?—A. I have no recollection of any.

Q. You did not find it among the papers?—A. I did not find it among the papers; no, sir. I produce a sight-draft, dated June 26, 1872, drawn by F. P. Sawyer on C. M. Lockwood, Washington, D. C., in favor of W. H. Farrar, for $20,000. Mr. Farrar receipted on the back as follows: "Received on the within draft, June 27, 1872, $20,000, from C. M. Lockwood."

Q. There is no acceptance of Sawyer on it?—A. It is accepted by Lockwood. I produce another note, dated July 15, 1873, drawn by F. P. Sawyer, at twelve months' time, in favor of Farrar and McKibben; amount, $3,166.66. Accompanying this is a check, dated July 25, 1874. I might state that this note carries interest at the rate of 7 per cent. I produce a check, dated July 25, 1874, drawn by F. P. Sawyer on the National Bank of the Republic, to the order of Joseph C. McKibben, for $3,394.32. The check is indorsed by Joseph C. McKibben.

Q. Do you know McKibben's handwriting?—A. Only from having seen the same thing several times; I never saw him write.

Q. Did you ever see anything that he acknowledged to be his handwriting?—A. Never saw him acknowledge anything; do not know the man at all.

Q. Is that in the same handwriting as the checks you have ordinarily seen indorsed by him?—A. Yes, sir. Here is a note of F. P. Sawyer's dated July 15, 1873, six months after date payable to Farrar and McKibben, $3,166.66, with interest. The note bears the following indorsement and receipt on the back: "Received, January 20, 1874, from F. P. Sawyer, $2,410 on the within note. (Signed) Joseph C. McKibben."

Q. The same handwriting as on the check?—A. I will look at them and see. [The witness compares the handwritings.] It is a little smaller writing, but it is characteristic. The signature is a little different, though it is evidently written by the same party.

Q. You have no doubt about that being the same signature?—A. I have no doubt at all. There is another indorsement, as follows: "Received February 19, from F. P. Sawyer, $250, on the within note. (Signed) Joseph C. McKibben." To correspond with that last receipt there is a check here to McKibben's order for $250, and by him indorsed, and also indorsed by Daniel Munn. Here is also a check dated February 21, 1874, drawn by F. P. Sawyer to the order of Joseph C. McKibben for $622.49; that is indorsed by McKibben, also by Tenney & Co., the men, I believe, who keep the National Hotel. Those, I think, go to make up that note with interest. Here is a note—I give it to you for what it is worth; I do not know anything about it; I think it was put in by Sawyer after I made up the statement, but I will not be positive about it. It is dated July 1, 1872, drawn by F. P. Sawyer, at ninety days, in favor of Capt. J. J. Hinds, for $7,500, payable at the First National Bank of Washington. This is indorsed by J. J. Hinds, A. McDonald, J. T. Chidester, H. C. Swain. Attached to this is a memorandum in Sawyer's handwriting, and signed by him, reading, "This Hinds party got of the El Paso Company $15,000, $7,500 besides this note. The other note is not taken up yet. F. P. Sawyer."

Q. Is the signature of J. D. Chidester on that paper the genuine signature of J. D. Chidester?—A. I recognize it as his handwriting.

Q. You know his signature?—A. I know his signature; I have seen it frequently. I have another note dated July 15, 1873, at ninety days, in favor of Farrar & McKibben, for $3,166.66. The following receipts are indorsed on the back of that note:

"Received October 14, 1873, the sum of $500 on the within note. (Signed) Farrar & McKibben."

Q. Whose signature is it?—A. I should say it was Farrar's signature for the firm of Farrar & McKibben. It goes on: "Received November 10, 1873, the sum of $1,000 on within note. (Signed) Farrar & McKibben."

Accompanying that is also a check dated June 1, 1874, payable to the order of Frank W. Hackett, for $1,772.30. It is indorsed by Frank W. Hackett, not as attorney, but for himself.

Q. It is not payable to him as attorney, is it?—A. No, sir.

I produce another note dated June 26, 1872, signed by F. P. Sawyer, for El Paso Mail Company, with C. M. Lockwood surety, in favor of W. H. Farrar, for $10,000, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum.

Q. Is there any indorsement on that note?—A. Yes; "Without recourse to me. (Signed) W. H. Farrar." It goes on: "Received, Washington, D. C., October 31, 1872, $4,000 on the within note. (Signed) W. H. Farrar."

Q. Is there anything to show that it is paid in full, this $10,000 note?—A. No, sir; there appears to be but $7,000 paid on that. If you look at the second receipt you will see it is dated 1863, but it should be 1873. It is for $3,000. Those checks are of the same date and the same amount, so that it was evidently what was given for the note.

Q. He might have paid cash?—A. Yes; he might have paid cash; or here is a check which was given to cover it, probably: "July 3, 1873. Pay to Farrar & McKibben, or order, $3,333.33." You will observe this note carries interest at the rate of 10 per cent., and would just be about that amount. I produce another note, dated July 15, 1873, drawn by F. P. Sawyer, at nine months, in favor of Farrar & McKibben, for $3,166.66 with interest. This does not appear to be indorsed by anybody, but McKibben receipts for some money as of April 21, for it says: "Received April 21, of F. P. Sawyer, $1,500 on within note. (Signed) Joseph C. McKibben;" and further: "Received May 4, 1874, $100 on within note. Joseph C. McKibben."

There is also a transfer of a portion of Farrar's interest to Mrs. Cora Farrar. I produce two checks given to Joseph C. McKibben, and indorsed by him, which checks correspond with these two amounts, which I have just given you, as indorsements or receipts. Also, a check dated May 28, 1874, on the National Bank of the Republic, in favor of Joseph C. McKibben, for $1,746.90, which goes, I believe, to make up that note with interest. Those make all the notes. I now come to the checks. I produce a check dated July 3, 1873, drawn by F. P. Sawyer on the First National Bank of Washington, District of Columbia, in favor of Farrar & McKibben, and by them indorsed, for $3,333.33. There is a lead-pencil name on the back of this that looks like Kiskaden. I have another check dated July 29, 1872, drawn by F. P. Sawyer on the First National Bank of Washington in favor of Col. W. H. Farrar for $1,500, and indorsed by Farrar. Also, a check dated August 10, 1872, drawn by F. P. Sawyer on the First National Bank of Washington in favor of Col. William H. Farrar for $1,000, and indorsed by Mr. Farrar. I produce also a check dated September 6, 1872, drawn by F. P. Sawyer on the First National Bank of Washington, District of Columbia, in favor of Col. William H. Farrar for $2,500, indorsed "W. H. Farrar, and Fant, Washington & Co.," who are bankers here. I have now gotten through with all the checks, drafts, and notes. I produce a memorandum of which I personally know nothing, but it goes to swell up that amount of $73,000 or $74,000. Sawyer made a memorandum here, or a statement in blue-penciled figures, reading "Swindle; but chargeable to El Paso Mail Company, this amount, $3,846." Then there are figures attached in ink swelling that amount up to $3,892.75. I suppose it is interest added.

Those comprise the papers that I have, excepting these, [indicating a package in his hand.] I do not think, however, that these can be of any use. There does not appear to be anything paid for them; but still they are here, and you are welcome to them. I could find no checks to correspond with the payments of them, but I brought those along. They do not enter at all into that $73,000. I have here a note dated June 26, 1872, reading as follows: "On the 1st day of January, 1873, the El Paso Stage Company promises to pay W. H. Farrar or order $10,000, with interest at 10 per cent. per year. (Signed) F. P. Sawyer, for the El Paso Mail Company; C. M. Lockwood, surety," and indorsed: "Without recourse. W. H. Farrar." Also note of F. P. Sawyer, dated June 26, 1872, for $10,000, in favor of W. H. Farrar, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, indorsed: "Without recourse to me. W. H. Farrar." Also another note of F. P. Sawyer's, dated June 26, 1872, favor of W. H. Farrar, payable on the 1st day of July, 1873, for $5,000, with interest at 10 per cent. This also is indorsed "Without recourse. W. H. Farrar."

Q. I will get you to state if it does not appear that there are no receipts or indorsements of payments on such notes, nor indications of cancellation, nor are there any checks corresponding to the last three notes.—A. I will state that there does not appear to be any payments by checks or otherwise on those last three notes.

Q. And no evidence of payment except the possession of these notes among his papers?—A. Precisely; there is no evidence at all that we have that they have been paid, excepting the possession of them.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Can you tell the committee who has attended to Mr. Farrar's business ?—A. I cannot ; I do not know at all about that.

Q. Who was Mr. Farrar's partner ?—A. Mr. McKibben, I suppose. These notes are given to Farrar & McKibben.

This evidence throws a flood of light upon the disposition of a large portion of the money used by Sawyer. The relations existing between Farrar, McKibben, and Lockwood are further illustrated by the evidence of Judge Paschal, who was the attorney for Sawyer in his lifetime, a part of which, on pages 497 to 504, inclusive, and which tells its own story, shows conclusively, with other evidence that time will not permit us to cite, that Lockwood contracted with Sawyer to enter into copartnership with him in the El Paso Stage Company, which was performing this mail-service in Texas, agreeing to pay for his interest in the future, but entering upon the copartnership at once, and that, acting as such copartner, he contracted for the company, in consideration that his confederate, Farrar, would not bid upon mail-routes ; that the company should pay Farrar $60,000, having at the same time a private contract with Farrar that Lockwood should receive for himself $40,000 of the $60,000 from Farrar.

Lockwood fails to pay, as he agreed to do, for his interest in the stage company, and ceases to be a partner and dies. The executrix of Lockwood brings forward this agreement, made between Farrar and Lockwood, and by her attorney Hackett, with Farrar by his attorney McKibben, presents the obligations for $60,000 to Sawyer, represented by Judge Paschal. Paschal points out the fraud and pleads no consideration. McKibben and Hackett reply that Sawyer has been free from assaults upon his business by Farrar, and claims that as the consideration. Sawyer, by the advice of Paschal, offers $10,000 to get rid of the fraudulent $60,000 indebtedness. McKibben threatens that he will seek the interposition of the Postmaster-General as to the mail-pay on the routes unless more than $10,000 is paid. Paschal, in reply, informs McKibben that this is dangerous ground, and to McKibben's bluffing threat quietly replies that there is danger of the penitentiary on account of that swindling transaction. McKibben winks Sawyer out of the room, and with Hackett they retire ; and after consultation the sum of $10,000 is accepted for the $60,000 obligations of Sawyer, and paid over to the representative of Lockwood. What division was made among the conspirators does not appear from the testimony.

McKibben is the Mephistopheles who gives life and direction to every scene in this black-mailing drama. He is the man who submits his newspaper articles to Mr. Beck and other prominent members of the democratic side of the then House (see page 409) before he publishes them, charging fraud on the Post-Office Department. He is the man that uses his influence with his democratic friends in Congress to work up an investigation, and who finally, after consultation with the minority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, (his party friends,) writes the minority report, reads it to and consults with the minority of the committee, including the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Randall,) and they adopt it. When Mr. Carroll objects that it is too strong in its condemnation of the Postmaster-General, McKibben replies that if they want a sugar-coated report they must write it themselves. Yet two years after, when substantially this same matter of straw-bidding was investigated a second time, and Mr. Creswell was not only justified but commended for his administration of the Department, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Randall) and the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Atkins) agree with the finding of facts made by the committee in its report.

The evidence also shows that McKibben used the democratic minority in the Forty-second Congress to assist him in making this unjust war against the Department, he no doubt having profit in view and they desiring political capital even at the expense of justice and right; and after the Postmaster-General had, time and again, in his reports called upon Congress to give legislation under which he would have power to cut up by the roots this whole system of straw-bidding, and successfully and legally bid defiance to greedy contractors and soldiers of fortune that were plundering the Government under the mandatory forms of law, Colonel McKibben, as shown by his own evidence, in the pay of this unscrupulous ring of contractors, and in his own interest, continued to use, from time to time, his whole knowledge, ability, and political influence, especially with his democratic friends, to prevent any legislation under which straw-bidding could be broken up. His own testimony shows how successful he has been up to this time.

The majority seek to condemn Ex-Postmaster-General Jewell in connection with the prosecution of Hinds in the courts over a year ago. This they cannot do successfully. The clerks in the Department who were dismissed by the Postmaster-General were only detected by their own confessions, which, so far as the evidence discloses, were made upon the understanding that they were to be used as witnesses by the Government. The charge against Governor Jewell for not withholding a larger amount of pay on the Kittle contract is not well made, for the reason that it does appear from the statement of witnesses, but that all the pay was withheld that the evidence warranted, and, strange to say, the majority of the committee pronounce judgment against Governor Jewell without ever having examined the proofs of record in the case or put them in evidence. How do they know that his action was not proper? As against such an attack, without any foundation whatever, Governor Jewell's efficient public service and character is sufficient answer. We desire to say, however, so far as it is proper to say of any matter that is not in evidence, that when the record is put in evidence the matters therein stated will be found to fully justify Governor Jewell in his action. Indeed, the evidence shows that the administration of the Department by Governor Jewell has been thorough, vigilant, efficient, and honest in every respect.

The majority attempt to cast an imputation upon Mr. Creswell in connection with what is styled the straw-bid system. Nothing can be more unjust to that laborious and vigilant officer. His action in regard to straw-bidding is fully stated in his own testimony, (see printed testimony, page 587,) as follows:

Q. What do you know, or what did you observe while you were Postmaster-General as to an alleged system of "straw-bidding" that was practiced by contractors in getting contracts for the mail-service on the western or southern routes?—A. The first year I was Postmaster-General, 1869, there was scarcely any, if any, straw-bidding; none that came to my attention. That was for the letting of the New England States and New York. When the next year came round, it was reported to me, after the opening of bids, that there had been what was called straw-bidding. It was a new thing to me. I examined, so far as I could, into the bids, and found that some of them were manifestly disproportioned to the necessary expenditure in the performance of the contract, and I came to the conclusion that the persons who had made those very small bids were not bidding in good faith, and I prepared a law, which I thought would protect the Department, and brought it to Congress and urged its passage. That law was taken up in the Senate and was amended, against my protest, so as to strike out the very features that I desired to have inserted, and to insert a feature which above all others I was anxious to exclude. I desired that the Postmaster-General should have discretion, first, when satisfied, upon notice given to parties to appear, to exclude a manifestly fictitious bid ; and, secondly, that the Postmaster-General, after the failure of the lowest bidder to enter into contract, should have authority to make a contract with any person, whether a bidder or not ; being willing, however, to give a preference to the bidder on his bid, whatever that might be, and resorting to outsiders only when he failed to make a contract with the bidder at a fair price. Both those features were stricken from the bill, and the second and third sections were consolidated into one section, which provided expressly that the Postmaster-General should be confined to the line of bidders, and gave him power only to award the contract to the lowest of the bidders, in the language of the act, "who would do so," (that is, who would enter into contract,) "for the performance of the service." When the business for 1870 was entered upon, we found that act to work very badly. It limited the Department at almost every turn, and the result was that contracts were awarded first to the lowest bidder, who failed, and then there would be a combination or arrangement, as we supposed ; indeed, it was manifest that such was the case. Of course, we had no positive knowledge of it, but every lower bidder would retire, leaving the Department to choose between some bidder higher up the list, and a continuance of the old contract, in the nature of temporary service, at a still higher figure. There was nothing left under the law but to accept the bidder who tendered himself to perform the contract, he being the lowest of the bidders. So it continued that year. When the next came I made a fight on the whole thing, and determined to break it up. I called for the opinion of the Attorney-General as to whether the Department (independent of this law, which applied only to one year, 1870) had the power under the general law to run up the line of bidders and award the contract to some other than the lowest bidder, or whether we were obliged to advertise. The Attorney-General decided that I was obliged to re-advertise ; that all I could do in the mean time was to let temporary service ; and that course was followed in every case. Never, to my knowledge, was there one case in which the lowest bidder was not accepted, or, if the Department was obliged to employ temporary service, in which we did not employ the very cheapest service we could secure. In many cases we chaffered with these people for days, often revoking the contract made with the postmasters at the head of the route, and insisting on lower rates, and in every case we made the best terms for the Government we could. I am speaking now of the letting of 1871. Then, in 1872, Congress passed another law directing the Postmaster-General, where the lowest bidder failed, to take the next lowest bidder in the line who would proffer himself for the performance of the service, and, after advertising two or three times, as I did during that year, I was obliged, under the act of April, 1872, to pursue that policy and make contracts on the best terms I could.

From this it appears that as early as the month of May, 1870, Mr. Creswell saw the danger to which the Department would be exposed from the vicious system of straw-bidding, and asked of Congress such legislation as would have completely destroyed it.

But the vital provisions of the act were stricken out, and the objectionable feature of confining the Postmaster-General to the line of bidders was adopted against his protest. That change was made, as was admitted by Senator Edmunds in debate in the Senate, for the very purpose of depriving the Postmaster-General of all discretion in the selection of a bidder. It further appears that, in his report of 1871, Mr. Creswell called the attention of Congress forcibly and at length to the same evil, pointed out the defects in the law, and recommended legislation that would have provided an effective remedy. The following extract from that report will show the recommendations which he then made :

Hoping to frustrate like attempts to defraud the Government in the future, I respectfully recommend that the laws regulating mail-contracts be so amended as to make it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any person who, after bidding for mail-service and receiving an award thereof, shall fail to make a contract in due form and perform the service described in his bid or proposal, and also so as to declare it to be a misdemeanor, punishable in like manner, for any person to withdraw or attempt to withdraw, after the day appointed for the opening thereof, any bid he may make for such service, until a contract therefor shall have been duly signed and accepted and the contractor shall have proceeded to perform his duties thereunder to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General.

I furthermore recommend that additional power be given to the Postmaster-General to reject manifestly fraudulent or fictitious bids, and, after a regular bidder or contractor shall have failed to enter into contract, or to fulfill his contract when made, to proceed to contract on the best terms obtainable from any responsible party, whether a bidder or not, for the performance of the service for the residue of the contract term. If it be deemed advisable to continue in force the provision requiring certified checks or drafts to accompany the bids, then I recommend that the amount of the check or draft in each case be fixed at five per cent. of the last regular contract price, where said contract price exceeded $5,000. This would compel bidders to make deposits in support of their proposals on all the more important routes, and would not leave open, as now, an opportunity to the fraudulent bidder to defeat the law by simply reducing his bid below five thousand dollars.

At every subsequent session of Congress, and notably in 1872 and 1874, he urged the passage of the same measures, but with only partial success. Never until the present session has the law been so amended as to give to the Postmaster-General the essential power of making contracts outside the line of bidders. Experience has thus shown that Postmaster-General Creswell, from the beginning, was sound upon this question, and that he never lost an opportunity of urging upon Congress the action required to enable the Department to overthrow the system of straw-bidding.

So far from being censurable for sympathy with men who perpetrated frauds upon the Department by straw-bids, and for indifference to the interests of the Government in that connection, it is established beyond all controversy that he commenced the war upon the straw-bidding frauds, and carried it on with vigor and without intermission until he resigned his position. To him, more than to any other person, is due the credit of finding and securing the adoption of an efficient remedy for that evil. And this Congress has virtually declared its approval of his course by adopting the very measures which he proposed six years ago, and for which he has never ceased to contend.

The majority, in reckless disregard of the facts, state that there was a positive violation of law upon the part of Mr. Creswell in the instance of the contracts given to Peterson, and designate section 264 of the Postal Code passed June 8, 1872, as the provision of law which he disregarded. Section 264 reads as follows:

That the Postmaster-General may contract with the owner or master of any steamboat plying upon the waters of the United States, or of any steamship or other vessel plying between ports of the United States, for carrying the mail for any length of time less than four years, and without advertising for proposals therefor, whenever the public interest and convenience will thereby be promoted; but the price paid for such service shall in no case be greater than the average price paid under the last preceding or then existing regular contract on the same route.

This provision was embodied in the code in lieu of the fourteenth section of the act of March 3, 1845, (5 Stats. at L., p. 737,) as follows:

SEC. 14. The Postmaster-General shall have power, and he is hereby authorized, to contract with the owners or commanders of any steamboat plying upon the western or other waters of the United States, for the transportation of the mail for any length of time or number of trips, less than the time for which contracts for transporting the mail of the United States are now usually made under existing laws, and without the previous advertisements now required before entering into such contracts, whenever, in his opinion, the public interest and convenience will be promoted thereby: Provided, That the price to be paid for such service shall in no case be greater than the average rate paid for such service under the last preceding or then existing regular contract for transporting the mail upon the route he may so for a less time contract for the transportation of the mail upon.

After reading the original act of 1845, it is clear that this section was intended to confer upon the Postmaster-General an additional power with reference to the employment of steamboats for transporting the mails, and was not designed to withdraw the steamboat-service from the operation of the general provisions of law regulating the advertising and the letting of mail-contracts. It will be observed that the act of 1845 and section 264 of the Postal Code are limited in their operation by a proviso that the price to be paid for such service shall in no case be greater than the average price paid under the last preceding or then existing regular contract on the same route. No such limitation is imposed upon the letting of regular contract after advertisement, or upon the letting of temporary contracts when necessary to prevent a failure of service. In the regular or temporary lettings, no person can be excluded under the law from competing for steamboat-service because he may not be the owner or commander of a steamboat; nor is the Postmaster-General bound to exclude the lowest bidder, although his bid may exceed the price of the last preceding contract. The proviso of the act of 1845 prevented the Postmaster-General from contracting with Peterson for the employment of any steamboats under that act, for the reason that his bids were always in excess of the then existing or last preceding contract-price. So far from disregarding the law, the Postmaster-General lived up to its very letter, and refused to let any contract thereunder to Peterson because he did not bring himself within its provisions.

Failing to secure service by this special authority, the Postmaster-General was compelled to resort again to the general law requiring him to re-advertise, but which did not restrict him to the masters or owners of steamboats, or confine him to the last contract-price, and meanwhile to avail himself of the only expedient left—a temporary supply. No contract was ever granted by Postmaster-General Creswell, under the provisions of section 264, to Peterson, or any other person, at a higher price than the average paid under the preceding or then existing contract on the same route. After a careful examination of the testimony and the record, we have been unable to discover that any contracts were granted to Peterson otherwise than after advertisement, or under the law authorizing temporary service. But, be that as it may, the majority are challenged to name one case wherein service was let to Peterson at any time, in any form, or under any device, for one dollar more than the very lowest figure that could be obtained from him or any other person. This explanation makes it immaterial whether Peterson may or may not be considered in law as the “owner or commander” of a steamboat.

On that point, however, we have no doubt, as the evidence discloses that he had such an interest, both by direct ownership and by powers of attorney, as entitled him to a contract under section 264, if he had brought himself by his proposition within the proviso thereof as to price. It may be well, however, before leaving this topic, to say that the insinuation of the majority, based upon their assertion that Peterson was a friend of Creswell, is altogether groundless. The truth is, as appears from Creswell’s own testimony in response to questions propounded by the chairman of the committee, that Peterson was absolutely unknown to the Postmaster-General prior to his application for service in 1869.

The testimony reads:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Peterson and you were well acquainted, were you?—A. No; I never knew him before.

Q. Who introduced you to Peterson; do you remember?—A. That I don’t remember. I think Peterson came here himself, as any other person would come, with an application, first for that Red River service.

In this connection, the majority call attention to section 250 of the postal code, in the following words:

That no contract for carrying the mail shall be made with any person who has entered, or proposed to enter, into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mail, or who has made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract; and if any person so offending is a contractor for carrying the mail, his contract may be annulled; and for the first offense the person so offending shall be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail for five years, and for the second offense shall be forever disqualified.

This section, in its present form, did not become a law until June 8, 1872.

All the combinations by Peterson, if any there were, "to prevent the making of any bid," were entered into previously to that date, and could only be punished under the provisions of the 28th section of the act of July 2, 1836, (5 Stats. at L., p. 87,) which reads as follows:

No contract for the transportation of the mail shall knowingly be made by the Postmaster-General with any person who shall have entered into any combination, or proposed to enter into any combination, to prevent the making of any bid for a mail-contract by any other person or persons, or who shall have made any agreement, or shall have given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever, or to do or not to do anything whatever, in order to induce any other person or persons not to bid for a mail-contract. And if any person so offending be a mail-contractor, he may be forthwith dismissed from the service of the Department: Provided, That whenever the Postmaster-General shall exercise the power conferred on him by this section, he shall transmit a copy or statement of the evidence on which he acts to Congress at its next session.

The act of 1836 differs from section 250 of the postal code both as to the penalty prescribed and as to the duty enjoined upon the Postmaster-General to transmit a copy or statement of the evidence under which he acts to Congress at its next session in case he should exercise the power conferred upon him. The Postmaster-General was held to a strict accountability by Congress, and was required to set out at length the evidence which justified him in a resort to the extreme power of dismissing a contractor from the service of the Department. We have carefully considered the provisions of this statute, and have reached the conclusion that nothing short of proof sufficient to convict in a court of law would justify the Postmaster-General in such action. To dismiss a contractor on important routes from the service would frequently work his pecuniary ruin, and as the law secured to him an appeal to Congress, it was but right and proper that the Department should be careful not to implicate the Government by any act which could not be sustained. Although the proof shows that special agents and other officers of the Department were directed to investigate diligently into the mail-contracts on the Mississippi, and that the persons from whom Peterson derived his authority were requested to appear before the Department, and every effort was made to deal with them directly, and to ascertain whether there had been any unlawful combinations falling within the terms of the statute, yet it does not appear that the Department was ever placed in possession of any facts which justified Peterson's dismissal as a contractor, and which could be held as sufficient evidence to submit to Congress in support of such action.

It is to be noted that the acts charged upon Peterson as a violation of section 250 of the postal code were all done and committed previously to the adoption of the code, and, if punishable at all, could only have been punished under the old law.

Again, the majority cite section 247 of the postal code in the following words:

That any postmaster or other officer of the Post-Office Department who shall affix his signature to the certificate of sufficiency of guarantors or sureties before the guarantee or contract is signed by the guarantors or sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or illusory certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

They charge that, notwithstanding the stringency of this act, "postmasters have, with utter recklessness, ignored, or with corrupt design, in multitudes of instances, given certificates of sufficiency of guarantors or sureties that were false and illusory, so that probably a majority of the bonds accompanying bids for contracts are insufficient and worthless;" and "that the guilt and negligence of postmasters in this connection must have been known to Mr. Creswell and Mr. Smith, if they are credited with even ordinary fidelity and intelligence of the duties of their position."

The ignorance which could permit such an accusation becomes inexcusable when the facts are made known. Section 247 of the Postal Code is the codification of section 3 of the act of April 27, 1872, and never had any sanction of law until the passage of the last-named act.

This provision was inserted in the act of April 27, 1872, to prevent fraudulent certificates by postmasters and other officers of the Department, and until its passage there was no law by which such fraudulent acts could be punished. Previously to that time every precaution had been taken to obtain proper and truthful certificates.

In the advertisement of the great letting of 1871, and the several re-advertisements thereof, it was required that all the great routes should be certified only by postmasters in charge of the most important offices, in the hope that they would be deterred by fear of losing their offices from making false certificates. This was found to be insufficient, and thereupon the third section of the act of April 27, 1872, already referred to, was enacted. The resignation of General Giles A. Smith took effect on October 16, 1871; long before the passage of the act last named. Furthermore, all the false certificates during the lettings of the years 1870 and 1871 were also made before the passage of this law.

The lettings of 1872 and 1873 were for the middle and eastern sections, where there are but few routes which are let after advertisement, service being mainly by railroad, and but little trouble was had with the certificates of those years. Mr. Creswell resigned on June 24, 1874, and surrendered the Department to his successor on July 6, following. It is, then, difficult to conceive how either he or General Smith can be held responsible for the execution of a law which was not in force until after the latter had resigned his office, and until after all the false certificates complained of in connection with the lettings of 1870 and 1871 had been made.

The next allegation on the part of the majority against Postmaster-General Creswell is that he "established service at great expense over unnecessary routes without sufficient reason," and that "at great cost he increased the service on routes already established, profiting thereby not the people whose money was consumed, but simply the contractor and his friends."

As to the first branch of this allegation, it may be said that the Post-Office Department does not establish any new route. All routes are established by law. The testimony does not show that service was put upon any established route by Mr. Creswell that the public interest did not require.

The routes from Washington to Norfolk, and from Baltimore to Fredericksburgh were, when established, deemed of sufficient importance to justify the small expenditures made thereon; and at least one of them, to wit, that from Baltimore to Fredericksburgh, is still in operation and growing in importance.

Direct issue is taken with the assertion of the majority that Mr. Creswell increased the service at great cost on routes already established, in the interest of the contractors, and not in the interest of the people. The majority seem to think that an avaricious and disappointed contractor in the person of Reeside, and the unsupported testimony of James L. Fiske and Special Agent Underwood, who, it is manifest, were at least sympathizers with disappointed contractors, are sufficient to outweigh the great mass of testimony from the people and their representatives, which the Department requires before increasing the service on any route.

Reeside is discredited out of his own mouth; for he admits that he was a speculator in mail-contracts, and actually sold his bids and influence as he would sell any other marketable commodity. Underwood, on oath, asserts, in his superserviceable zeal, that no steps were ever taken by the Department to engage the services of the Oregon and California Railroad Company, and is afterward obliged, with humiliation, to retract when confronted with his own letter, wherein he confessed that he had been directed, as the representative of the Department, to make proper application to the company, and that, having done so, no less a personage than himself had met with a flat refusal. And again, when he assumes the role of censor upon his superior officers, and criticises their action, asserting that he knew of no law to justify it, he is once more obliged to bow himself with shame when the broad page of the statute granting an express authority is spread before his obfuscated vision.

Witnesses who are thus self-contradicted of venality, ignorance, and inexcusable loss of memory, and who are, besides, contradicted on material points by the other witnesses and by the record, cannot be relied upon to overthrow the voice of the people and their representatives as to the wants of the public service.

The majority have referred to certain routes as sustaining their assertion. To these we will refer in detail, so far as we may have authentic information at hand.

ROUTE 15414—WALLA WALLA TO MISSOULA.

When Mr. Creswell came into office he found this route operated three times a week by L. H. Hirshfield, contractor, at a cost of $65,000. On September 25, 1869, he reduced the service to once a week, and the pay to $23,000. The service was in due time advertised for once a week, and was let regularly, under the law, on July 26, 1870, to C. C. Huntley, at his bid of $22,900. On December 22, 1870, an order was passed restoring the service to three times a week, and increasing the compensation $41,754. This was not done, however, until after a spirited contest between the people of that section and the Department. The increase was urged by petitions representing 1,293 citizens of Oregon and the Territories of Montana and Washington, and by strong letters from the following-named gentlemen: H. D. Washburn, surveyor-general Montana Territory; G. G. Synes, associate justice supreme court; William B. Cutter, postmaster and post-trader, Fort Shaw, Mont.; William F. Wheeler, United States marshal, Montana Territory; L. B. Lyman, registrar United States land-office, Helena, Mont.; R. F. May, receiver United States land-office, Helena, Mont.; L. B. Church, assessor internal revenue; Hiram Knowles, associate justice supreme court; A. J. Simmons, chairman republican central territorial committee; E. S. Stackpole, postmaster, Deer Lodge City; Ben R. Dilles, postmaster, Louisville, Mont.; M. M. McCauley, agent for the Blackfeet; B. F. Potts, governor of Montana; James M. Cavanaugh, Delegate from Montana; George H. Williams, Senator from Oregon, and S. Garfielde, Delegate from Washington Territory. And when the Department was again about to reduce the service, it was retained upon the urgent request of G. A. Cass, president of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company; William Windom, Senator from Minnesota; S. Garfielde, Delegate from Washington Territory; and William H. Clagitt, Delegate from Montana Territory, all of whom united in representing to the Department that the Northern Pacific Railroad had actually placed under contract and entered upon the construction of more than two hundred miles of its track over the line of this route.

ROUTE 16622—KELTON TO THE DALLES.

This route was let on July 26, 1870, in strict accordance with law, to J. W. Parker, Owen Tuller, and L. Smalley Barlow, for six times a week, at $192,000 per annum. On June 17, 1871, the service was increased one trip a week, at an additional cost of $32,000. It was warmly advocated by S. Garfielde, Delegate from Washington Territory; George H. Williams, Senator from Oregon; James L. Reynolds, editor Statesman, Boise City, Idaho; John R. McBride, member of Congress from Oregon; H. W. Corbett, Senator from Oregon; and J. K. Shafer, Delegate from Washington Territory. The increase of service was recommended by S. A. Merritt, Delegate from Idaho Territory; James K. Kelly, Senator from Oregon; James H. Slater, member of Congress from Oregon; and S. Garfielde, Delegate from Washington Territory.

ROUTES 17032, KIT CARSON TO SANTA FÉ; 17401, SANTA FÉ TO EL PASO; 17404, MESILLA TO LOS ANGELES.

This is the great southern overland route, and upon it depended entirely the supply of mail-matter for New Mexico and Arizona from both east and west. Mr. Creswell found the service to be six times a week from Phil Sheridan to Santa Fé; three times a week from Santa Fé to El Paso; and three times a week from Mesilla to Los Angeles. In the advertisement of 1869 he endeavored to reduce the service from Mesilla to Los Angeles to twice a week, and the original letting of 1870 was for that number of trips. As the Kansas Pacific Railroad was extended westward, the importance of this route increased, and upon the urgent demand of the Delegates, Representatives, and Senators from that entire section the service was increased to seven times a week from Kit Carson to El Paso, and was restored to three times a week from Mesilla to Los Angeles. This action was taken upon the recommendation of John Taffe, M. C. from Kansas; D. P. Lowe, M. C. from Kansas; Erastus Wells, M. C. from Missouri; R. C. McCormick, Delegate from Arizona; C. Schurz and Frank P. Blair, Senators from Missouri; P. W. Hitchcock and T. W. Tipton, Senators from Nebraska; J. Frank Chaves, Delegate from New Mexico; J. B. Chaffee, Delegate from Colorado; H. E. Havens, M. C. from Missouri; Andrew King, M. C. from Missouri; J. R. McCormick; E. M. McCook, governor of Colorado; J. C. Parker, M. C. from Missouri; G. A. Finkelnburg, M. C. from Missouri; S. S. Burdette, M. C. from Missouri; J. G. Blair, M. C. from Missouri; S. C. Pomeroy and A. Caldwell, Senators from Kansas; J. R. West, Senator from Louisiana; George E. Spencer, Senator from Alabama; E. G. Ross, Ex-Senator from Kansas; James W. Nye and William M. Stewart, Senators from Nevada; J. W. Flanagan, Senator from Texas; R. T. Van Horn, M. C. from Missouri; William T. Clark, M. C. from Texas; E. Degener, M. C. from Texas; G. W. Whitmore, M. C. from Arkansas; C. Cole, Senator from California; E. Casserly, Senator from California; S. B. Axtell, M. C. from California; James A. Johnson, M. C. from California; and A. A. Sargent, M. C. from California; also by numerous petitioners residing at San Diego, Cal., and along the line of the route, and by George J. Clark, postmaster at San Diego, and by C. F. Baldwin, assistant superintendent railway mail service of the Post-Office Department.

ROUTE 14773—OROVILLE TO PORTLAND, OREGON.

After a long contest and many ineffectual efforts to secure a contract at a lower price, this route was finally, on October 13, 1870, let to Bradley Barlow, at $134,000 per annum for daily service. A question has been raised as to the action of the Postmaster-General in letting this contract at the price named rather than to a higher bidder (Charles M. Cartwright) at $170,000. The Postmaster-General claimed to act under the joint resolution of Congress of May 5, 1870, and by his decision saved to the Government, during the four years the contract was to run, the sum of $144,000. We have reviewed his action, and do not hesitate to say that his course is not only justifiable but commendable. On May 3, 1871, this service was changed to a new line up the valley of the Sacramento River at a net increase of $8,861; and on the 8th June, 1872, was expedited at an additional cost of $45,945 per annum.

This action was taken upon the recommendations of A. M. Rosborough, district judge; A. E. Raynes, postmaster at Yreka; W. H. Bahney, postmaster at Red Bluffs; L. M. Foulke, superintendent internal revenue; A. N. Towne, general superintendent Central Pacific Railroad; Governor Leland Stanford, president of same; H. W. Corbett, Senator from Oregon; James K. Kelly, Senator from Oregon; S. Garfielde, Delegate from Washington; C. Cole and E. Casserly, Senators from California; James H. Slater, member of Congress from Oregon; S. O. Houghton, member of Congress from California; A. A. Sargent, member of Congress from California, and J. M. Coghlin, member of Congress from California. It was also requested by joint resolution of the legislature of California, formally presented to both houses of Congress, and transmitted officially to the Department, and by many petitions of private individuals. The foregoing list, it is believed, includes every Delegate, Representative, and Senator from the Pacific coast, of both political parties.

These routes illustrate how exacting the Department was in the way of recommendations before increasing the service; and from the examinations that we have been able to make we have not discovered any case in which an increase of service was ordered without an array of recommendations equally as strong. Indeed, there is no alleged irregularity in letting contracts, changing routes, accelerating the speed, or increasing the number of trips, spoken of by any of the witnesses, that is not completely justified by the facts, when fully developed, and the law, as will appear from the record in the various cases from page 587 to 631, inclusive. If the Department is to be administered with a due regard to the desires and interests of the people, it is impossible that any clearer demonstration of those desires and interests can be given than in the cases already cited. Although the increase of service in these cases involved a considerable expenditure of money, in our opinion the Department would have been censurable under the circumstances if it had longer persisted in its refusal.

Again, the majority complain that payments were made to Contractors Sawyer, Peterson, and Kittle without full formal proof and on fraudulent certificates. There is no law or regulation of the Department which forbids the payment of moneys at any time after the same may have been earned. The Department, to be sure, reserves to itself the right to postpone payment until the second month of the subsequent quarter, but has never in practice demanded so long a delay where the proof could be made up. In some cases, and especially after the panic of 1873, the Department made partial payments to contractors who were executing a continuous contract (and only to such) without waiting for full proof for the third month of the quarter, full proof for the first and second months being in. Payment was made for the quarter, and delinquencies, if any, were charged against the next quarter.

This was done at a time when the contractors were unable to procure money to carry on the service from the banks or any other source, and seemed to be necessary in order to prevent a disastrous interruption in the transmission of the mails. The practice was discontinued as soon as the embarrassments resulting from the crisis of 1873 had passed away. In the spring of 1874, Postmaster-General Creswell passed an order forbidding thenceforth any payments without full proof for the entire quarter; and since then there has been no departure from the terms of that order. No case has been shown where the Government has lost one dollar by any such payment, or where any money was paid before it was fully earned.

If, on the other hand, Sawyer, Peterson, and Kittle perpetrated frauds upon the Department by obtaining false certificates from postmasters when the service had not been performed, and the facts could be made to appear by satisfactory proof, the Government has always been in position not only to secure indemnity by retaining a sufficient amount of their mail-pay, but also to punish them to the extent of the law. It does not appear that any evidence of such frauds was ever at the command of Mr. Creswell, nor, indeed, does it appear that any such frauds were ever perpetrated during his term of office. We cannot doubt that just punishment would have been meted out by him to all offenders if their guilt had been duly established.

The undersigned dissent most decidedly from the conclusion of the majority of the committee, that Postmaster-General Creswell either violated the law or was extravagant in his expenditures, or negligent in the supervision of the affairs of the Department, or failed to expose or prosecute violations of law during his administration. On the contrary, they are satisfied that his administration was marked by a laborious and faithful discharge of his duties, by a due economy in expenditures, and by a notable vigilance in the exposure and prosecution of violations of the law. Mr. Creswell inaugurated the opposition to straw-bids which, after six years, has just culminated in their final overthrow. The victory has not been gained by a single effort, but by repeated attempts, resulting in successes from time to time more or less signal. That his administration was not extravagant is conclusively established by the facts that, during the whole time he was in office, he always kept within the limit of his appropriations; and when he retired from the Department he left on hand a balance, after settlement of all liabilities to June 30, 1874, of $1,834,067.81; and this after covering into the Treasury unexpended balances for the years 1870, 1871, and 1872 amounting to $4,376,556.01. In our opinion, the censure proposed by the majority upon the administration of Mr. Creswell is wholly without justification by anything appearing in the testimony or in the records or files of the Department. Nothing short of the most embittered partisanship, totally blind to all sense of justice toward a political opponent, can prompt such a suggestion.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have so abandoned themselves to the accomplishment of political ends, under cover of this investigation, that they have neglected their legitimate business of preparing and presenting to the House appropriate and necessary legislation touching the postal service. In the matter of compensation to railways for transporting the mails, legislation is needed that, we are satisfied, would save the Government millions of dollars. Not one moment of time has been given by the committee to this question, and but little to any other question of legislation; but day after day and week after week and month after month the committee have been taking testimony, nominally to ascertain if a system of straw-bidding existed, when the Department has been asking for legislation to prevent it for six years past, but really, by fair means or foul, to gather sufficient poison from the slanderous tongues of an army of disappointed and malignant men wherewith to taint the good name of some one who has held, or now holds, a position in the Department. We congratulate ourselves and the country that this investigation is drawing to a close, and we venture to hope that the substantial and vital interests of a patient though suffering people may no longer be sacrificed to the electioneering devices of the democratic party.

This investigation, by the testimony which it has developed, has justified those whom the majority, by their words, would fain condemn. While we would gladly forget the spirit which instigated and carried it on, we rejoice that the record of its proceedings must stand and abide the judgment of an impartial public. No fair man of any party will refuse, after the heat of the present political contest shall have passed away, to admit that the Department has been vindicated for the fourth time, in spite of all its enemies; and if hereafter the historian shall be curious enough to travel through the volume of testimony submitted by the committee and gather therefrom the animus of the majority, he will be struck with wonder and amazement, not to say indignation, when he sees how unfair have been the methods of investigation to which they have resorted, and with what premeditated malice they have sought to blacken and destroy the reputations of honorable men to serve the base uses of party.

EXHIBIT A.

[H. R. 609.—42d Congress, 2d Session.—In the House of Representatives, December 11, 1871; read twice, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH, on leave, introduced the following bill:

A BILL relating to proposals and contracts for the transportation of the mails, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person or persons bidding for the transportation of the mails upon any route which may be advertised to be let, and receiving an award of the contract for such service, who shall refuse or fail to enter into contract with the Postmaster-General, in due form, and perform the service described in his or their bid or proposal; or who shall withdraw, or attempt to withdraw, after the day appointed for the opening thereof, any bid or proposal he or they may have made for such service, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding ——— dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding ——— months.

SEC. 2. That no bidder for carrying the mails shall be released from his obligation under his bid or proposal, notwithstanding an award made to a lower bidder, until a contract for the designated service shall have been duly signed by such lower bidder and accepted, and the service entered upon and performed by the contractor, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 3. That the Postmaster-General shall have power to reject bids for mail-service which shall appear to him, upon due investigation, to be fraudulent or fictitious.

SEC. 4. That after a regular bidder or contractor shall have failed, either to enter into contract, or to fulfill his contract when made, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract, on the best obtainable terms, with any responsible party, whether a bidder or not, for the performance of the service for the residue of the contract term or any part thereof.

SEC. 5. That the provision of the fourth section of the act of March third, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, requiring certified checks or drafts to accompany bids, be so amended as to fix the amount of the certified check or draft to accompany bids for service on each route at five per centum of the last regular contract price per annum on said route where the contract price exceeded five thousand dollars.

SEC. 6. That in case of the sickness, or unavoidable absence from his office, of the postmaster of any money-order post-office, he may, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such postmaster: Provided, That the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases: And provided further, That such acting officer shall, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct, in like cases, of the postmaster for whom he shall act.

SEC. 7. That the postmaster of every city where branch post-offices or stations are established and in operation, subject to his supervision, is hereby authorized, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, to issue, or cause to be issued, by any of his assistants or clerks in charge of branch post-offices or stations, postal money-orders payable at his own or at any other money-order office, or at any branch post-office or station of his own, or of any other money-order office, as the remitters thereof may direct; and that the postmaster and his sureties shall in every case be held accountable upon his official bond for all moneys received by him or his designated assistants or clerks in charge of stations from the issue of money-orders under the provisions of this act, and for all moneys which may come into his or their hands, or be placed in his or their custody by reason of the transaction by them of money-order business. And all the provisions of law now in force respecting the issue and the payment of money-orders, and the disposal of money-order funds in the custody of postmasters, shall apply to all money-orders issued under the authority given by this act, and to all moneys received from the issue thereof.

SEC. 8. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to cause to be placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, for the service of the Post-Office Department, the net proceeds of the money-order business, and that the receipts of the Post-Office Department, derived from this source, during each quarter, shall be entered by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, in the accounts of said Department, under the head of "Revenue from money-order business."

SEC. 9. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

MAIL-CONTRACTS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are hereby directed to inquire into the matter of contracts recently made by the Post-Office Department for the transportation of the mails in the United States and Territories, and report the facts to the House, the committee having power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses under oath.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to say that the Postmaster-General requests that this investigation shall be made in justice to himself.

The resolution was adopted.

[42d Congress, 2d Session.—House of Representatives, March 11, 1872.—Globe, pp. 1584-5.]

POST-OFFICE CONTRACTS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a bill in reference to contracts for carrying the United States mails. I desire permission to say to the House that it is very important to the Post-Office Department and to the Treasury that this bill may be passed now, in order that the Department may have the benefit of it at its lettings of the 1st of next month. The bill has been agreed to unanimously by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I ask that it may now be received for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill was read. The first section provides that any person or persons bidding for the transportation of the mails upon any route which may be advertised to be let, and receiving an award of the contract for such service, who shall willfully refuse or fail to enter into a contract with the Postmaster-General in due form to perform the service described in his or their bid or proposal, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months.

The second section provides that each bid for carrying the mail shall hereafter have affixed to it an oath of the bidder, taken before a person qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability pecuniarily to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into a contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted, and that the signatures of his guarantors are genuine, and that he believes said guarantors pecuniarily responsible for and able to pay all damages the United States shall suffer by reason of the bidder's failing to perform his obligation as such bidder.

The third section provides that any postmaster who shall affix his signature to a certificate of sufficiency of guarantors before the guarantee is signed by the guarantors shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, and shall be forthwith dismissed from office.

Section 4 provides that no bidder for carrying the mails shall be released from his obligation under his bid or proposition, notwithstanding an award be made to a lower bidder, until a contract for the designated service shall have been duly signed by such bidder, and accepted, and the service entered upon by the contractor to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General.

The fifth section empowers the Postmaster-General to reject bids for mail-service which shall appear to him upon due investigation to be exorbitant, fraudulent, or fictitious; but in all such cases he is to report his action, with the reasons therefor, to Congress at its next session thereafter.

The sixth section provides that after any regular bidder or contractor for the transportation of the mails upon any route shall have failed to enter into contract and commence the performance thereof as herein provided, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service, who shall enter into a contract and perform the same unless the Postmaster-General can contract upon better terms for the Government with some other responsible party, in which case he is authorized so to do.

The seventh section repeals the provision of the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1871, requiring certified checks or drafts to accompany bids.

The eighth section provides that in case of the sickness or unavoidable absence from his office of the postmaster of any money-order post-office, he may, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such postmaster; provided that the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases; and provided further, that such acting officer shall for the time being be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct in like cases of the postmaster for whom he shall act.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered as passed.

Mr. POTTER. Before the bill is passed, I desire to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, [Mr. Farnsworth.] The existing law provides that for sufficient reasons the Postmaster-General may release the sureties of a postmaster and accept new sureties; but there is no such provision in respect to the sureties of persons who have contracted to carry the mails. I desire, therefore, to suggest to the gentleman that the following provision be added to this bill as a new section:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster-General, whenever he may deem it consistent with the public interest, may accept new surety upon any contract existing or hereafter made for carrying the mails, in substitution for, and release of, any existing surety.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Potter] has shown me this amendment, and I think it eminently proper. I have no authority from the committee to accept it as a part of this bill, but I certainly shall not object to it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York will be considered as incorporated in the bill, and the bill so amended passed.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 1930) was passed.

[H. R. 1930.—42d Congress, 2d session.—In the Senate of the United States, March 13, 1872. Read twice and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.]

AN ACT relating to proposals and contracts for transportation of the mails, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person or persons bidding for the transportation of the mails upon any route which may be advertised to be let, and receiving an award of the contract for such service, who shall wilfully refuse or fail to enter into contract with the Postmaster-General, in due form, and perform the service described in his or their bid or proposal, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months.

SEC. 2. SEC. 3. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the certificate of sufficiency of guarantors before the guaranty is signed by the guarantors shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, and shall be forthwith dismissed from office.

SEC. 4. That no bidder for carrying the mails shall be released from his obligation under his bid or proposal, notwithstanding an award made to a lower bidder, until a contract for the designated service shall have been duly signed by such lower bidder and accepted, and the service entered upon by the contractor to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 3. That any postmaster or other officer who shall affix his signature to the certificate of sufficiency of guarantors or sureties before the guaranty or contract is signed by the guarantors or sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or illusory certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, [and shall be forthwith dismissed from office.]

SEC. 4. That no bidder for carrying the mails shall be released from his obligation under his bid or proposal, notwithstanding an award made to a lower bidder, until a contract for the designated service shall have been duly [signed] executed by such lower bidder and his sureties and accepted, and the service entered upon by the contractor to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General.

[SEC. 5. That the Postmaster General shall have power to reject bids for mail service which shall appear to him, upon due investigation, to be exorbitant, fraudulent, or fictitious; but in all such cases he shall report his action, and the reasons therefor, to Congress at its next session thereafter.]

SEC. [6] 5. That after any regular bidder or contractor for the transportation of the mail upon any route shall have failed to enter into contract, and commence the performance thereof as herein provided, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service who will enter into a contract and perform the same, unless the Postmaster-General [can contract upon better terms for the Government with some other responsible party, in which case he is hereby authorized so to do.] shall consider such bid too high; in which case he shall re-advertise such service.

[SEC. 7. That the provision of the fourth section of the act of March third, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, requiring certified checks or drafts to accompany bids, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.]

SEC. 6. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per centum on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, nor less than five per centum of the amount of one year's pay proposed in such bid if the bid be for new service. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to enter into the same with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, such bidder shall forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury; but if such contract shall be duly and seasonably entered into as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder.

SEC. [8] 7. That in case of the sickness, or unavoidable absence from his office, of the postmaster of any money-order post-office, he may, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, authorize the chief clerk or some other clerk employed therein to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such postmaster: Provided, That the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases: And provided further, That such acting officer shall, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct, in like cases, of the postmaster for whom he shall act.

SEC. [9] 8. That the Postmaster-General, whenever he may deem it consistent with the public interest, may accept new surety upon any contract existing, or hereafter made, for carrying the mails, in substitution for and release of any existing surety.

EDWARD McPHERSON, Clerk.

Amendment proposed by Mr. Ramsey, viz: Insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to cause to be placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, for the service of the Post-Office Department, the net proceeds of the money-order business; and that the receipts of the Post-Office Department, derived from this source, during each quarter, shall be entered, by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, in the accounts of said Department, under the head of "Revenue from money-order business."

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Casserly, viz: At the end of section six add the following:

And in all cases of regular contracts hereafter made for a sum exceeding five thousand dollars per annum, the contract shall, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be continued in force beyond its express terms for a period not exceeding six months, until a new contract, with the same or other contractors, shall be made by the Postmaster-General.

[42d Congress, 2d Session.—Senate, April 3, 1872.]

MAIL-CONTRACTS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I now renew the request that I made a moment since, that the Senate take up House bill No. 1930, on the subject of straw-bidding. It was up some days ago.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1930) relating to proposals and contracts for transportation of the mails, and for other purposes. It provides that any person or persons bidding for the transportation of the mails upon any route which may be advertised to be let, and receiving an award of the contract for such service, who shall willfully refuse or fail to enter into contract with the Postmaster-General, in due form, and perform the service described in his or their bid or proposals, is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months.

Each bid for carrying the mail is hereafter to have affixed to it the oath of the bidder, taken before a person qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability pecuniarily to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid shall be accepted; and that the signatures of his guarantors are genuine, and that he believes the guarantors pecuniarily responsible for and able to pay all damages the United States shall suffer by reason of the bidder's failing to perform his obligation as such bidder.

Any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the certificate of sufficiency of guarantors before the guarantee is signed by the guarantors is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, and be forthwith dismissed from office.

No bidder for carrying the mails is to be released from his obligation under his bid or proposal, notwithstanding an award made to a lower bidder, until a contract for the designated service shall have been duly signed by such lower bidder and accepted and the service entered upon by the contractor to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General.

The Postmaster-General is to have power to reject bids for mail-service which shall appear to him, upon due investigation, to be exorbitant, fraudulent, or fictitious; but in all such cases he shall report his action and the reasons therefor to Congress at its next session thereafter.

After any regular bidder or contractor for the transportation of the mail upon any route shall have failed to enter into contract and commence its performance, the Postmaster-General is to proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service who will enter into a contract and perform it, unless the Postmaster-General can contract upon better terms for the Government with some other responsible party, in which case he is authorized so to do.

The seventh section repeals the provision of the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1871, requiring certified checks or drafts to accompany bids.

In case of the sickness or unavoidable absence from his office of the postmaster of any money-order post-office, he may, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such postmaster; but the official bond given by the principal of the office is to be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases; and such acting officer is, for the time being, to be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct in like cases of the postmaster for whom he shall act.

The Postmaster-General, whenever he may deem it consistent with the public interest, may accept new surety upon any contract existing, or hereafter made, for carrying the mails, in substitution for and release of any existing surety.

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads report the bill with two amendments. The amendments were in section 6, line 3, to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or," and in line 6, after the word "unless," to insert the words "such bid being exorbitant."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, these amendments will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope they will be rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I propose to offer several amendments to perfect the bill, which will take the place of these amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then, if there be no objection, these amendments will be rejected, and they are rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the assent of my friend from Minnesota, I move to amend the bill in section 1, line 6, by striking out the word "willfully" and inserting the word "wrongfully."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In section 2, line 3, I move to strike out the words "a person," at the beginning of the line, and to insert the words "an officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In section 3, line 1, I move to amend by inserting after the word "postmaster" the words "or other officer," so as to impose this penalty upon any certifying officer of the United States, requiring fidelity from him, instead of merely having it apply to the postmaster.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads does not object to these amendments, and they will be regarded as agreed to, unless a division is demanded. This amendment is agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the second line of the same section, after the word "guarantors," I move to insert the words "or sureties," which is merely a verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the third line of the same section, after the word "guarantee," I move to insert the words "or contract."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After the word "guarantors" in the third line of the same section, I move to insert the words—which may possibly have more than a mere verbal application—"or shall knowingly make any false or illusory certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and;" so that the section will read:

"That any postmaster or other officer who shall affix his signature to the certificate of sufficiency of guarantors or sureties before the guarantee or contract is signed by the guarantors, or shall knowingly make any false or illusory certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After the word "guarantors," in the third line, if I have not already suggested it, the words "or sureties" should be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then in the sixth and seventh lines of the same section the words "and shall be forthwith dismissed from office" should be stricken out, as they are transposed to a more appropriate place in the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the fourth section, fourth line, I move to amend by striking out the word "signed," as applied to the Contract Office, and insert the word "executed," which has a broader definition.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the fifth line of the same section, after the word "bidder," I move to insert the words "and his sureties," which is also merely verbal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to strike out the fifth section altogether, to which there was considerable opposition, which provides that the Postmaster-General shall have power to reject any bids for mail-service which appear to him on investigation to be exorbitant, fraudulent, or fictitious; which seems to leave him a discretion that the law has never designed to repose in him.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire if he would not have that power anyhow. If he supposed the bids to be fraudulent, he certainly would not be justified in acting upon them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If he supposed them to be fraudulent, that would be a doubtful question. If they were in fact fraudulent or forged—

Mr. TRUMBULL. If they should "appear to him to be fraudulent;" and that is the language of the act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He does exercise the power now, but under pretty strong limitations, as he ought to, where he finds a bid is clearly and plainly a fictitious one, made by no person, merely put in in order to produce difficulty. He treats that as an entire nullity now; but if you provide by express provision of law to make him the final judge upon all these questions, then when you have a Postmaster-General, or any of his assistants who are connected with the Contract Office, who are not as attentive to their duties as the present administration, there will be constant suspicion and complaint that under cover of bids not being exactly what they ought to be, they will be rejected as fraudulent and contracts given to other persons; whereas when we make another amendment to the seventh section of the bill, which will take the place of this section in reality, we provide means by which every bid is subjected to an actual test almost as soon as made, and when made is subjected to the test of a deposit in a better form than the law now provides of guarantee for realty. So I think it altogether better that the fifth section should go out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not object to the striking out of the fifth section, but I wish to make one remark. It seems to me it would be clearly the duty of any officer connected with the making of a contract or the settlement of a claim, when it appeared to him to be a fraudulent contract or a fraudulent claim, to withhold the execution of it, and bring it, if necessary, to the notice of Congress. I think it would be the duty of an officer to take that responsibility, and not allow what appeared to him to be a fraudulent contract or claim to be consummated while he had that evidence before him, and think he would do that at any rate without this section; therefore I have no objection to its going out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The section is stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the sixth section of the bill by striking out in lines 7, 8, and 9, after the words "Postmaster-General," the words, "can contract upon better terms for the Government with some other responsible party, in which case he is hereby authorized so to do," and to insert "shall consider such bid too high, in which case he shall re-advertise such service;" so that instead of reading as it does now, that he may contract upon better terms with any responsible party without an advertisement, it enables him, if a bid is exorbitant—in other words, if it is going to tax the public too heavily—to reject that bid, it being the one next above the lowest under this section, and to advertise the service again. I presume there is no objection to that on the part of anybody.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move to strike out the seventh section of the bill, in the following words:

"That the provision of the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1871, requiring certified checks or drafts to accompany bids, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

And to insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The chief clerk read the substitute, as follows:

"That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per cent. of the amount of year's pay proposed in such bid if the bid be for new service. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to enter into the same with good and sufficient securities, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, such bidder shall forfeit the amount so deposited to the Government, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury; but when such contract shall be duly and seasonably entered into as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That ought to be 5 per cent. instead of 10, the chairman tells me, and I modify the amendment by changing 10 per cent. to 5, where it occurs.

Mr. CORBETT. I think that that 10 per cent. should be stricken out entirely, for this reason: If the service amounts to $50,000 this year, a man can bid to carry it for $5,000 next year, and deposit the amount of 5 or 10 per cent. upon what he bids instead of on the contract of the year before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; my friend is mistaken.

Mr. CORBETT. I understood that the amendment as to the 10 per cent. provides that it shall be 10 per cent. upon his present bid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken. It provides, as I now modify it, as it is said that 10 per cent. is too high, that it shall be 5 per cent. of the service of the current year, and it shall also be 5 per cent. of his new bid, so that if he bids high above the last year's service he must put up the whole margin.

Mr. CORBETT. In addition?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In addition; but if he bids below he must put up 5 per cent. on the last year's service.

Mr. CORBETT. I did not understand the amendment, if that is the way it reads.

The amendment was agreed to.

[42d Congress, 2d Session, House of Representatives, April 4, 1872.]

POSTAL CONTRACTS AND STRAW-BIDS.

Mr. Farnsworth, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the evidence taken before the committee in reference to postal contracts and straw-bids, and moved that the report be printed, and that the testimony be laid upon the table. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I also ask permission that the minority of the committee on this question have the opportunity at some future time to present their views.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

[House of Representatives, Report No. 38, 42d Congress, 2d Session.]

CONTRACTS FOR TRANSPORTATION OF THE MAILS.

APRIL 4, 1872.—Laid on the table and ordered to be printed, with leave of the minority to submit their views.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, made the following report:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, who were instructed by resolution of the House of Representatives "to inquire into the matter of contracts recently made by the Post-Office Department for the transportation of the mails in the United States and Territories, and report the facts to the House, the committee having power to send for persons and papers, and examine witnesses under oath," respectfully report:

That, in obedience to said resolution, they have taken a large amount of testimony, having examined all persons as witnesses who were supposed to possess any knowledge of facts material and relating to the subject-matter of investigation. The committee have also procured copies from the Post-Office Department of all papers, bids, advertisements, &c., necessary to a full understanding and elucidation of the subject. The evidence thus taken covers and embraces nearly the whole period since the present Postmaster-General has occupied that position, and is herewith reported to the House.

From all the testimony the committee find the following facts and conclusions, viz:

For a number of years the Post-Office Department has been greatly plagued and embarrassed by a method of circumvention, or cheating, in bids or proposals for carrying the mails, known as "straw-bids." It is a modern invention, not extending back more than three or four administrations, but to such extent has the system come into use, that of late it has become almost impossible for the Department to obtain a contract for carrying the mail upon any of the most important stage-lines in the regular manner, i. e., in pursuance of advertisement, bids, acceptance, &c., except at very exorbitant rates.

"Straw-bidding" consists in procuring some worthless or irresponsible person to make a proposal in due form for the service, for so small a sum as to insure the acceptance of the "bid" by the Department, it being the lowest. It is so low that the service cannot be rendered for it, and therefore it is certain to be below the bid of any responsible bona-fide bidder.

This "straw-bid" is usually procured by or in the interest of the party who is then performing the service, or of some party who desires to obtain the contract at a speculative rate, and who procures this "straw" or sham bid to prevent some genuine and responsible bidder, lower than himself, from obtaining it. And as the law makes it the duty of the Postmaster-General to "award the contract to the lowest bidder," (whose bid is in due and proper form,) and as the acceptance of the one bid or proposal releases all the others, the result is that no contract is obtained for the service, and the Postmaster-General is then obliged, either to make the best bargain he can for the service without re-advertising, or make provision for the temporary service until he can re-advertise and let the contract for the term, (four years.)

An attempt to relieve the Department and cure the evil was made by Congress in 1870, by the adoption of the following joint resolution:

“[PUBLIC RESOLUTION—No. 31.]

“ A RESOLUTION authorizing the Postmaster-General to prescribe an earlier time for the execution of contracts by accepted bidders, and for other purposes.

“ Whereas in the instructions appended to an advertisement issued by the Postmaster-General on the thirtieth day of September, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, inviting proposals for carrying the mails of the United States for four years, from the first July, eighteen hundred and seventy, in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, and in the Territories of Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, and Arizona, it is stipulated that the contracts are to be executed by or before the first day of July, eighteen hundred and seventy; and whereas, in view of the importance of the service to be performed and the damage to the public interests which would result from failure to put said service in operation at the proper time, it is desirable to fix an earlier period than the first of July for the execution of the contracts, and to adopt such other precautions as may seem necessary to guard against the failure of bidders or contractors to fulfill their obligations: Therefore,

“Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized, in any case in which he may deem it necessary, to require accepted bidders under the advertisement of September thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, inviting proposals for carrying the mails of the United States in the States and Territories above mentioned, to execute contracts and return them to the Department at an earlier period than the first day of July, and, at the discretion of the Postmaster-General, as early as the first day of June, eighteen hundred and seventy.

“ SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That in any case arising under the aforementioned advertisement, in which the Postmaster-General shall have good reason to believe that any bid for carrying the mail on any route has not been made in good faith, he shall be authorized to summon the bidder or bidders to appear before him and show cause why such bid should not be set aside, or immediately executed by entering into contract with sufficient sureties; and the failure of the bidder or bidders to appear in response to such a summons and satisfy the Postmaster-General that said bid has been made in good faith, and that the guarantors thereof are duly responsible, or to enter into such contract, shall be deemed to be sufficient cause for setting such bid aside and entering into contract with the lowest of the bidders who will do so for the performance of the service. And all the bidders shall be seasonably notified that such summons has been issued, and that they may be required to enter into such contract.

“ Approved May 5, 1870.”

And again in 1871 by the enactment of a provision requiring that all bids of $5,000 or upward should be accompanied by a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, for an amount not less than 5 per cent. of the bid, the same to be forfeited to the Department in case the bid should be accepted and the bidder fail to enter into contract and perform the service.

Both these acts failed to reach the difficulty. Under the first one the bidders were enabled to combine, and, by the withdrawal of the low bids, (after a “straw” had been accepted and failed,) force the Department up the line of bidders to any height, however exorbitant; and under the provision of the act of March, 1871, the “straw” had only to make his bid less than $5,000, and thus avoid the necessity of putting up the 5 per cent. Of course he did so.

At all the regular “lettings” of the Department the routes or lines for which proposals are invited are very numerous, and there are usually a great many bids for each route. All the long and important routes, too, are in remote sections of the country or on the frontier, and it is very evident to the committee that the Postmaster-General cannot, with the agencies at his disposal, ascertain as to the good faith and responsibility of all parties sending in proposals, and the law would not justify him in refusing a bid upon his suspicion of the irresponsibility of the bidder, especially if such suspicion is based solely upon the fact that the bid is a low one.

On the 30th of September, 1870, the Post-Office Department issued regular advertisements for contracts for carrying the mail in the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas, the contracts to begin on the 1st of July, 1871. Many proposals were received, opened, and examined, and in every case contracts were awarded to the lowest bidder whose bid was in due form; but when the time arrived for the making the contracts and entering upon the service, it was found that upon one hundred and ninety-five of the most important and expensive routes the accepted bidders failed to come forward and enter into contracts and perform the service. These routes are scattered through all the above States, but most of them are in Alabama, Texas, and Arkansas. As the joint resolution above quoted, of May 5, 1870, did not apply to lettings in these States, the Postmaster General was in some doubt as to the true and proper construction of the laws touching the course to be pursued in the premises, particularly inasmuch as upon inquiry he found that there had been no established or uniform practice of the Department in such cases, and no settled construction of the statutes for his guidance, as appears from the following letters of Messrs. E. L. Childs and James N. Davis, experienced and reliable officers of the Department:

"Letter of E. L. Childs, of the Post-Office Department, to the Postmaster-General, submitting his recollection of the practice of the Department in reletting contracts for conveying the mail."

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1872.

"SIR: In compliance with your verbal order, I submit my recollection of the practice of the Post-Office Department during my (nearly) twenty years' connection with the contract office in reletting contracts for conveying the mail in cases where the lowest bidders under an advertisement inviting proposals failed, either willfully or from inability, to fulfill their engagements, as was often the case, to execute contracts or perform service.

"The practice has been different under different heads of the Department, and according to the construction given by each to the laws of Congress applicable to the subject. In a majority of cases, and particularly when the service was for the whole four years' term, and the compensation large, the routes have been re-advertised and relet as soon as practicable after the failure was known to be absolute, a temporary contract to keep the service in operation being in the mean time made, as authorized by the 23d section of the act of July 2, 1836. In other instances, where the period of service was for one or two years only, when the fact of failure or inability was definitely ascertained before the time for beginning the service, or when the next lowest bid was reasonable in amount, or was by a former contractor in good standing, and time and expense would be saved by contracting with him, offers have been made to such second bidder, and even to a third, and contracts secured. This has been done by officers of the Department, who held that when routes were once advertised and proposals received, the law was complied with and the duty of the Department discharged in that respect, giving a discretionary power to act for the best interests of the Government without inviting further competition. Under the same views of law, instances have occurred of contracts entered into with parties whose names did not appear on the books as bidders on the vacant route, but who were contractors on other routes, were well recommended to the Department, or were otherwise known to be responsible and in all respects fit and competent for the duty.

"That the practice of offering the service to the bidders second or third in amount above the lowest, in cases of the failure of the latter, was not in accordance with the legislative will, is to be inferred from the passage of the resolution of Congress approved May 5, 1870, the 2d section of which gives authority to pursue that course in regard to the letting of contracts in the Pacific States and Territories under the advertisement of September 30, 1869, and limits the exercise of the power to that letting only.

"Respectfully, your obedient servant,

"E. L. CHILDS.

"Hon. JOHN A. J. CRESWELL,
"Postmaster-General."

"Letter of J. N. Davis, of the contract office, to the Postmaster-General, as to the usage of the Department under the laws requiring contracts to be let to the lowest bidders, and as to the practice in case of the failure of accepted bidders."

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, CONTRACT OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1872.

"SIR: The usage of this Department in letting contracts for mail-service, under public advertisement, according to my observation as a corresponding clerk in the contract office from September, 1853, to June, 1866, has been to let the contract in every case to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guarantees for the faithful performance of the service; and a bid in due form, signed by two guarantors, with the certificate of a proper postmaster or other officer appended, setting forth the sufficiency of the guarantors, has uniformly been considered as tendering such sufficient guarantees. No case has ever come under my notice, so far as my recollection serves, in which the Department rejected such a bid upon the ground that it was a 'straw' or fraudulent bid. In case of the failure of the lowest bidder to execute contracts or perform the required service, the usage has been sometimes to offer the contract to the next lowest bidder, and, on his refusal, to the next lowest, and so on; sometimes to enter into contract, without re-advertisement, with parties not bidders; and sometimes to employ temporary service on the most favorable terms until the route could be re-advertised and re-let.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"JAMES N. DAVIS.

"Hon. JOHN A. J. CRESWELL,
"Postmaster-General."

These letters were corroborated by the sworn testimony of Messrs. Childs and Davis, before the committee; and also by the Postmaster-General and others, who have been identified with that Department.

Feeling the necessity of a correct, authoritative, and established construction of the law, the Postmaster-General had the following correspondence with the then Attorney-General of the United States:

"POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, July 19, 1871.

"SIR: The law limits the duration of contracts for carrying the mail to four years, act of March 3, 1825, Statutes, vol. 4, page 104.) The Union is divided for this purpose into four sections, so that the contracts for a section expire and are relet each year. At each of these annual lettings more or less bids of a fictitious character, or at inadequate compensation, or from bidders without means or knowledge of business, have been received, and when lowest, have been accepted, as required by law, (section 24, act of July 5, 1836, Statutes at Large, volume 5, page 80.) It thus often happens that failures occur to execute contracts to perform service, rendering it necessary to re-let the service at the expense of the failing bidder, as enjoined by the 44th section of the act of March 3, 1825, (Statutes at Large, volume 4, page 114,) and the 27th section of the act of July 2, 1836, (Statutes at Large, volume 5, page 86.) The section last referred to says that, in case of failure, the Postmaster-General 'shall proceed to contract with some other person or persons,' &c.

"The question then arises, how or in what manner shall the Postmaster-General 'proceed' to obtain this contract? Usage in such cases has varied according to circumstances and the differing views of the different heads of the Department. In some cases, when a failure has occurred from the simple inability of a bidder to go on with the service, the next lowest bidder has been taken, if his figures were reasonable; and, if he declined, a second and even a third offer made to bidders standing on the books. This course was pursued to save trouble, time, and expense in re-advertising.

"In other instances, and perhaps in a majority of cases, the routes have been re-advertised. The result of the last annual letting of routes in the Southern States for service from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875, shows a much larger number of failures than usual, and the indications are that a great number of the bids are 'straw,' or fictitious; not the lowest only, but others running from low to high rates, as if intended to accomplish ulterior and sinister purposes.

"One of the duties of the Postmaster-General, as prescribed by the first section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1825, 'to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post-Office Department,' (Statutes at Large, volume 4, page 102,) is that 'he shall provide for the carriage of the mail on all post-roads that are or may be established by law,' &c. To this end section 10 of the same act (volume 4, page 104) makes it his duty to give public notice 'in one newspaper published in the State or States or Territory where the contract is to be performed, for at least twelve weeks before entering into contract for carrying the mail, that such contract is intended to be made, and the day on which it is to be concluded,' &c.

"By act of March 3, 1865, the insertion in papers published in the States is limited to six weeks instead of twelve.

"In the 23d section of the act 'to change the organization of the Post-Office Department,' &c., approved July 2, 1836, (Statutes at Large, volume 5, page 85,) this language is used:

"It shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General, before advertising for proposals for the transportation of the mail, to form the best judgment practicable as to the mode, time, and frequency of transportation on each route, and to advertise accordingly."

"And then follow the words:

"Whenever it shall become necessary to change the terms of any existing contract,
* * * * * or to enter into a contract at any other time than at the annual letting, the Postmaster-General shall give notice, in one newspaper published * * * * as near as may be to the route on which the services are to be performed, for at least four weeks before * * * * making such contract, inviting proposals therefor, which proposals shall be received and opened, and such proceedings thereon had in all things as at the annual lettings: Provided, however, That the Postmaster-General may make temporary contracts until a regular letting can take place.

"The 'proceedings thereon' are those described in the 24th section of the same act, (volume 5, page 86,) viz:

"That proposals for mail-contracts shall be delivered to the Department sealed, and shall be kept sealed until the biddings are closed, and shall then be opened and marked in the presence of the Postmaster-General and one of the Assistant Postmasters-General, or in the presence of two of the Assistant Postmasters-General."

"The 'annual letting' mentioned in the section of the act of 1836, quoted above, is understood at the Department to mean the lettings of contracts for four years' service, as directed by the act of 1825.

"To obtain your opinion as to the true interpretation of the laws bearing on this subject, and the proper course for the Department to pursue to protect not only the interests of the United States, but the rights of honest and bona-fide bidders, is the object of this communication.

"First. Is the Postmaster-General authorized to make any contracts for the conveyance of mails, other than for 'temporary' service, except under or in pursuance of bids received after inviting them by advertisement; or, more particularly, if the lowest bidder at an 'annual letting' fails to enter into contract and perform service, can the Postmaster-General legally contract with the next lowest bidder who will agree to perform the service at his bid for the whole term without re-advertising; or, is it lawful, after once advertising and failing to secure a contractor, to contract with a party who has not been a bidder, on a proposition informally submitted, for the contract term?"

"Second. What meaning is to be attached to the word 'temporary,' as used in the proviso to the 23d section of the act of July 2, 1836? Can it be made to authorize a period of one year, so as to terminate a contract at the next annual letting; or is it limited to the time actually necessary to advertise—four weeks—and go through the process of opening, deciding, and awarding, as detailed in the laws?"

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. A. J. CRESWELL,
"Postmaster-General.

"Hon. A. T. AKERMAN,
"Attorney-General."

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
"July 22, 1871.

"SIR: Your letter of the 19th instant, after stating the difficulties which have arisen in your Department in consequence of fictitious or 'straw' bids for contracts for carrying the mails, propounds to me certain questions, as follows:

"First. Is the Postmaster-General authorized to make any contracts for the conveyance of mails, other than for temporary service, except under or in pursuance of bids received after inviting them by advertisement; or, more particularly, if the lowest bidder at an 'annual letting' fails to enter into contract and perform service, can the Postmaster-General legally contract with the next lowest bidder who will agree to perform the service at his bid for the whole term without re-advertising; or is it lawful, after once advertising, and failing to secure a contractor, to contract with a party who has not been a bidder, on a proposition informally submitted, for the contract term?"

"When an accepted bidder fails to enter into an obligation with sufficient sureties for the performance of the service, the 27th section of the act of July 2, 1836, (5 U. S. Stat., 86,) requires the Postmaster-General 'to contract with some other person or persons for the performance of the service.'

"What authority has the Postmaster-General in contracting under such circumstances? Three answers have been suggested: first, that he must contract with the next lowest bidder; second, that he has an unlimited discretion as to the contractor and the terms; third, that he must advertise anew, and award the contract to the lowest bidder under the new advertisement.

"The act of July 2, 1836, section 24, (5 U. S. Stat., 86,) and the act of March 3, 1845, section 18, (5 U. S. Stat., 738,) give the contract to the lowest bidder. No statute authorizes an alternative acceptance of the next lowest or of any other bid. The contract is offered to the lowest bidder. The bids are tendered for acceptance only in the event that they shall prove to be the lowest, and by the acceptance of one as the lowest the others are discharged. Thenceforth the law looks only to the successful bidder, and while it holds him and his guarantors responsible for his failure to complete the contract for the performance of the service, (act of March 3, 1825, section 44, 4 U. S. Stat., p. 114; act of July 2, 1836, section 27, 5 U. S. Stat., p. 86,) it does not hold the other bidders in waiting to supply his default. These others have no further claim upon the Government, and the Government has no further claim upon them.

"The construction that gives to the Postmaster-General an unlimited discretion upon the failure of the accepted bidder to complete the contract, leaves in operation much of the mischief which the laws on the subject of advertisements and bids were designed to suppress. It was the policy of those statutes to subject the Postmaster-General to a rigid rule in the matter of contracts for the carrying of the mail; and that policy is practically overturned, if a single fictitious bid remits the contract to his discretion.

"An unqualified direction that he shall contract must be taken to signify that he shall contract according to the general rule of mail-contracts, to wit, after advertisement and with the lowest bidder, (act of March 3, 1825, section 10, 4 U. S. Stat., 104.) The 23d section of the act of July 2, 1836, (5 U. S. Stat., 85,) especially provides for advertisement whenever it becomes necessary 'to enter into a contract for the transportation of the mail at any other time than the annual letting,' (temporary contracts alone excepted,) a provision which seems to have been contrived for such cases as that now under consideration. From an early period the law has required advertisements for mail-contracts. (See act of February 20, 1792, section 6, 1 U. S. Stat., 234; act of May 8, 1794, section 6, ibid., p. 358; act of April 30, 1810, section 8, 2 U. S. Stat., 595, and the acts above cited.) The object is manifest, to get for the Government the benefit of competition. From necessity, an exception is allowed in the case of temporary contracts, (act of July 2, 1836, section 23;) but a construction which admits the fewest exceptions, and leaves the least to the discretion of the Postmaster-General, is most in accordance with the general policy of the law.

"I am thus brought to the third of the suggested answers, and adopt it as the most conformable both to the letter and general policy of the law. The most plausible objection to it is that it exposes the Department to the vexation of a second fictitious bid. But I do not feel authorized to reject a conclusion, otherwise satisfactory, for the reason that it places a second effort to effect the contract in the same danger as the first.

"On account of the loss of time in the first effort, the second offer of the contract must frequently be for less than a full term, and it could not have been the intention of Congress to guard the less by precautions not thrown around the greater. The failing bidder and his guarantors are made liable for the whole difference between his bid and the amount for which, on his failure, the Postmaster-General contracts, (act of July 2, 1836, section 27.) It is not probable that Congress intended that the amount of this liability should depend on the mere discretion of the Postmaster-General.

"There would be no inconvenience under present legislation if the Department could make sure of the responsibility of the guarantors; but I am informed that no precautions yet devised have been found effectual to this end. Congress can easily provide a remedy; and until that shall be done, I see no way to protect the Department from any occasional imposition through fictitious bids.

"Hence, by way of specific answers to your questions, I am of opinion that you are not authorized to make any contracts for the conveyance of mails, other than for 'temporary' service, except under or in pursuance of bids received after inviting them by advertisement. If the lowest bidder at an 'annual letting' fails to enter into contract and perform service, you cannot legally contract with the next lowest bidder who will agree to perform the service at his bid for the whole term without re-advertising. It is not lawful, after once advertising and failing to secure a contractor, to contract with a party who has not been a bidder on a proposition informally submitted for the contract term.

"Your letter also contains the following inquiries:

"Second. What meaning is to be attached to the word 'temporary,' as used in the proviso to the 23d section of the act of July 2, 1836? Can it be made to authorize a period of one year, so as to terminate a contract at the next annual letting; or is it limited to the time actually necessary to advertise—four weeks—and go through the process of opening, deciding, and awarding, as detailed in the law?"

"I am of the opinion that, except in the case hereinafter mentioned, this word should not be construed to authorize a discretionary contract for a term extending beyond the time when the next annual letting will take effect, but the Postmaster-General has a discretion within that limit to advertise immediately or to wait until the time for the usual annual advertisement. The exception to this rule is when the exigency arises too late in the contract year for the advertisement and letting to be completed before the beginning of the next year, in which case the right to make temporary contracts extends through the succeeding year.

"This word must be construed not merely with reference to the class of cases which has occasioned your present call for an opinion, but in reference to any other case of an interruption in the regular mail-service for which a temporary contract must provide. For illustration, in the accidents to which mail-service is liable, an interruption might occur six weeks before the time when the new regular contracts would take effect. Four weeks would be required for advertisement. Congress could not have intended to subject the Postmaster-General to the necessity, in such a case, of increasing the expense of advertising for a service merely of two weeks, and for so brief a service it is not likely that advertisement would produce bids advantageous to the Government.

"When, however, the occasion for a temporary contract arises so long before the annual letting as to justify the expense of advertising and to make it probable that a saving to the Government would be effected by inviting bids, the Postmaster-General would, no doubt, feel disposed to conform as closely as possible to the general policy of the law, which is that mail-service shall be generally performed by the person who will be found to do it for the least money, after public advertisement.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

"A. T. AKERMAN,
"Attorney-General.

"Hon. J. A. J. CRESWELL,
"Postmaster-General."

In accordance with the above opinion of the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General made such contracts for temporary service upon those mail-routes where the persons to whom contracts had been awarded had thus failed, as he could, and proceeded on the 1st of August to re-advertise for proposals, the service to commence the 1st day of January, 1872, and to expire June 30, 1875.

The bids or proposals under this last advertisement, upon about one-half the routes, were no better, or but little better, than before, and the same experience of "straw" or fraudulent bids was realized as before, and very few contracts with responsible parties were obtained. In consequence, the temporary service had to be continued.

It is not disputed that the Postmaster-General made the best terms for the Government for this temporary service which were obtainable. This service is generally being performed by the last regular contractors, who, having the lines or routes already stocked and organized, possess great advantages over other parties in proposals for brief or uncertain periods of service. And the complaint against the Postmaster-General seems to be that he "ought to have taken the responsibility of contracting with the lowest bidder who would take the contract and perform the service for the term," after the lowest or "straw" bidder had failed, and that "he should not have sought the opinion of the Attorney-General, nor observed it when obtained," &c.

The committee failed to arrive at that conclusion, and though it seems pretty certain that the Postmaster-General might have contracted with somebody, in most cases, for the term, at less rates than he contracted for the temporary service, the committee believe that no officer of the Government could be justified in a violation of the law at his own option, because, in his opinion, he might thereby save money to the Government. Such a rule of duty once established for officers of the Government—the license of discretion once substituted for the rule of law—and there would be no such thing as accountability by the public servants.

The committee are therefore of opinion that the course pursued by the Postmaster-General was not only justified by the circumstances and law, but was eminently wise and prudent.

The Attorney-General of the United States is the law expositor and organ of the Government, and until his opinions are overthrown or reversed by the courts, they are regarded as authority by the different Departments of the Government.

The committee have, as the practical result of their labors in this investigation, reported a bill which passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote, and which they believe, if enacted into a law, will in great measure, if not entirely, remedy the evil which is the subject of this report.

MAIL-CONTRACTS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill No. 1930. It can be disposed of in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1930) relating to proposals and contracts for the transportation of the mails, and for other purposes.

H. Rep. 814—V

LXVI MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. RAMSEY. The amendments are all gone through except one offered by myself and one offered by the Senator from California. I hope they will both be accepted.

Mr. RAMSEY. An amendment was proposed by the Senator from California, which I hope will also be adopted.

The chief clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. Casserly; which was at the end of the sixth section to insert the following:

And in all cases of regular contracts hereafter made for a sum exceeding $5,000 per annum, the contract shall, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be continued in force beyond its express terms, for a period not exceeding six months, until a new contract, with the same or other contractors shall be made by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CASSERLY. The word "shall" in the third line should read "may," so as to read "the contract may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be continued in force," &c.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That modification will be made.

Mr. CASSERLY. This should come in at the end of section five, I find, instead of section six.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so incorporated by the enrolling-clerk at the end of section five if the bill should pass and the amendment be agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

[42d Congress, 2d sess., House of Representatives, April 16, 1872.]

POSTAL CONTRACTS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1930) relating to proposals and contracts for transportation of the mails, and for other purposes, in order that there may be a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendments of the Senate will be taken up.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

[42d Congress, 2d session, Senate, April 19, 1872.]

MAIL-BIDDING.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1930) entitled "An act relating to proposals and contracts," &c.

The report was concurred in.

[42d Congress, 2d session, House of Representatives, April 22, 1872.]

MAIL-CONTRACTS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following report from a committee of conference:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1930) entitled "An act relating to proposals and contracts for transportation of the mails, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, and 16, and the house agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to it with an amendment, as follows:

After the word "officer" insert "Post-Office Department."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the twelfth amendment of the Senate, and agree to it with an amendment, as follows:

In lines five and six, strike out "for a sum exceeding five thousand dollars per annum."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the thirteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to it with an amendment, as follows :

In line ten strike out the word "nor," and insert "and in case of new service not ;" in line eleven strike out "before new service," and insert "exceed five thousand dollars per annum ;" in line nineteen strike out "enter into," and insert "execute ;" in line fifteen add "and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General ;" in line nineteen, after the word "Treasury," insert "for the use of the Post-Office Department ;" in line twenty strike out "and seasonably enter into," and insert "executed and the service entered upon."

GINERY TWITCHELL,
J. M. CARROLL,

Managers on the part of the House.

ALEX. RAMSEY,
T. W. FERRY,
E. CASSERLY,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report of the committee was adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted ; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAIL-CONTRACTS.

Mr. Van Trump, by unanimous consent, presented the views of the minority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in relation to the letting of mail-contracts ; which were ordered to be printed:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY

Under the resolution of the House upon the subject of mail contracts, the minority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads submit the following report, in reference to certain charges against the administration of the Post-Office Department, published in the Washington Patriot of January 8, 1872. It appears that the article in question was written by Col. J. C. McKibben, and full authority given to the publishers to use his name in connection with the allegations.

The author and publisher of the article and various other witnesses were summoned before the committee, while others eluded the process of the Sergeant-at-Arms. We will endeavor to group together the more grave charges, and, as briefly as possible, connect them with the evidence elicited during the investigation.

Mr. George W. McLellan, for eight years chief of the contract-office, appointed by President Lincoln and removed by President Grant, testifies "that straw-bidding did not exist to any extent during my term of office, not to be troublesome," (page 45.) General Giles A. Smith, who succeeded Mr. McLellan, testifies, "I think straw-bidding existed in 1849," (page 47.) Again, "We had several consultations, the Postmaster-General and several other parties, with a view to see if we could not provide against the system of straw-bidding, that was annoying us so much in the letting of contracts in the fall of 1870 and 1871," (pages 41 and 42.) He also testifies "that when proposals came for service in California, Oregon, and the Territories, in 1870, for any route, the bids were so wide apart, and some of them so low, it was very evident that some of the bidders did not intend to enter upon the service," (page 47.) The Postmaster-General testifies "that the annual lettings of 1869 were in New England ; straw-bidding did not exist there to the extent it does in the South and West ; the contracts were mostly small," (page 257.) He also states "that there was more straw-bidding in 1870 than in 1869 ;" and in his annual report of 1871 he informs Congress that "on the 30th of September, 1870, advertisements were issued, in regular form, for all mail-contracts in the section comprising the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas. In response to these advertisements, many bids were received and duly entered, and, under the twenty-fourth section of the act of July 2, 1836, contracts were, without exception, awarded to the lowest bidders. On the 1st of July, the time when, agreeably to the advertisement and the usage of the Department, the new contractors were required to commence the discharge of their duties, it was ascertained that the bidders to whom contracts on most of the important routes had been awarded had failed to perform the service. The whole number of failing bidders was one hundred and ninety-five, and the routes thus left without regular contractors were found to be located as follows: Three in West Virginia, eleven in Virginia, two in Georgia, two in Florida, seventy-seven in Alabama, two in Mississippi, eleven in Louisiana, forty-two in Texas, and forty-five in Arkansas. Suspecting that the bidders who had thus failed were not acting in good faith, and that in many cases they were fictitious, and what are called straw-bidders, the Department, on the 19th July last, addressed a letter to the Attorney-General, stating the condition of affairs and asking for an authoritative interpretation of the laws as to the powers of the Postmaster-General in making contracts for the conveyance of the mails. In strict conformity with the opinion of the Attorney-General, dated 22d July last, the Department proceeded to make temporary contracts, on the best terms attainable, for six months, or longer, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and to re-advertise, for the residue of the contract term, all the routes whereon service had failed. The new advertisements, for a reletting from January 1, 1872, to June 30, 1875, were issued on August 4, 1871, and the new awards were made on the 1st of November instant. It was hoped that, under the operation of the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1871, which required all bidders to accompany their bids for $5,000 or over with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, for an amount not less than 5 per cent. of their bids, and which was applied, for the first time, to the bids under the last-named advertisement, a more favorable result would be obtained. I regret, however, to be obliged to say that the bids under the last advertisements are in no respect an improvement on those under the first, and that of all the routes re-advertised, only two were awarded to bidders who bid over $5,000, and who gave evidence of honesty of purpose by accompanying their bids with a check for 5 per cent. of the amount thereof.

It thus fully appears that straw-bidding did not exist to any serious extent during the previous administration of the Post-Office Department, but became the systematized practice under Mr. Creswell on all important land-routes, resulting in a failure to procure service upon the above routes, most of which are now advertised for the third time. The minority of the committee do not pass any positive opinion as to the agencies that have produced this result, but simply submit the fact and the evidence to Congress.

That the Postmaster-General did withhold the information of this and other abuses from Congress is manifest, from an examination of his annual reports for 1869-'70 and 1870-'71, in which there is not the slightest allusion to straw-bidding or any other frauds upon the postal service, although their existence is fully developed in the evidence. It is due to the Postmaster-General that his explanation of this neglect should become a part of this report. He states, "This matter of straw-bids did not come under my observation till after my report for 1870 had been written," (page 267.)

We would remark that the awards of contracts at the annual lettings of 1870 were made in the month of March, and the contracts executed June 1 of that year, ample time to have thoroughly investigated and reported the facts to Congress at its meeting in December. That there did exist a combination to control the mail-lettings in the Northwest and Southwest is apparent from an examination of the records, and sustained by the very sufficient evidence of the Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

The records of the routes from Oroville to Portland, and from Mesilla to Los Angeles, having been put in evidence, exhibit the fact that there were failing, or straw, bidders on each, and that the withdrawals and manipulations in each case secured those important routes to the same contractor. The failures of service in Texas and Arkansas produced the same result in favor of the old contractors. The Postmaster-General testifies, "These bidders are apprised exactly of the line, (of bids) and they get together and arrange among themselves, knowing precisely the time to which the Postmaster-General is limited, and that you are bound to take one of them," (page 141.) Again he says, "The whole system is shown by the action in connection with the Oroville route," (page 143.) Again he says, "I was led to believe that all these men had been induced to withdraw (on the Oroville and Portland route) for a valuable consideration," (page 156.) Again he states that "I did not set forth the facts of withdrawing bids in my reports of 1869 and 1870." Again, "No dismissal of a postmaster for violating his oath of office," (page 259.) The minority of the committee, when they take into consideration that General Smith has testified that these frauds were matters of information, upon which consultation was had; that they were manifest from the record; that the Postmaster-General himself develops the existence of combinations; that a valuable consideration was used to secure the withdrawal of the lower bidders; that no local postmasters have been dismissed for certifying to fraudulent guarantors, (although the awards in the Northwest were made two years ago,) and yet the whole matter withheld from Congress by the excuse that there was no time between March and December to present these abuses to Congress—from all these facts must conclude that there was a deliberate concealment of these abuses, or else that the Postmaster-General has been most derelict in performing his duty. That the practice of straw-bidding could only exist by the permission of the Department admits of easy demonstration and proof. George W. McLellan testifies “that if contracts were made at reasonable prices it would have a tendency to stop straw-bidding.” Mr. McKibben testifies that “straw-bidding has resulted from the fact that contracts have been made at prices far in excess of the cost of transportation, and a fund is thus created to buy out the lower bidders; but if the Postmaster-General will confine himself to a fair compensation, there will be no money to buy them out; it is the Department itself that indirectly furnishes the money to get the lower bidders out of the way.” The minority of the committee fully indorse these views; and if parties, as it has been testified, do put in bids to be bought off, the practice must cease whenever and wherever the Postmaster-General confines contracts, as the law permits him to do, to a compensating price. The remedy for this and all other abuses will be found, not in multiplied legislation, but in an efficient administration of the laws.

We will now advert to the lettings and awards in the Southwest. The Postmaster-General, in his annual report for 1871, states “that under the twenty-fourth section of the act of July 2, 1836, contracts were, without exception, awarded to the lowest bidder.” It is charged that the Postmaster-General attempted to deceive Congress, to justify his closing the contract office to all competition and to pecuniarily benefit special parties, by adhering to a law both obsolete and virtually repealed. Mr. McLellan testifies “that contracts were awarded, not under the law of 1836, but under the act of March 3, 1845; and that the Postmaster-Generals considered the law of 1845 as giving them more discretion,” (page 245.) The Postmaster-General, on his cross-examination, testifies, in regard to awards, “It is made under the law, which says that the contract shall be made with the lowest bidder who will furnish sufficient guarantees,” (page 268,) and that is the law of 1845. The following extract from the postal laws accompanied the advertisement for proposals in the Southwest:

“SEC. 18, act of March 3, 1845. That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General, in all future lettings of contracts for the transportation of the mail, to let the same, in every case, to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guarantees for faithful performance, without other reference to the mode of such transportation than may be necessary to provide for the due celerity, certainty, and security of such transportation; nor shall any new contractor hereafter be required to purchase out or take at a valuation the stock or vehicle of any previous contractor for the same route.”

The minority consider the ignoring of the actual law, and the adherence to an obsolete statute, either tends to sustain the charge that it was for the benefit of the special parties, who continue to hold, under his decision, the service that should have been relet last July, or shows an utter misconception of the postal laws by the Postmaster-General.

The charge that the Postmaster-General violated not only the law but the usage of the Department is sustained by the following testimony: George W. McLellan testifies “that the usage under Judge Blair and Governor Randall’s administration was to go up the scale of bidders; it (the contract) was always offered to a person who put in a reasonable bid, (page 338.) Mr. Childs and Mr. Davis, who are among the oldest clerks in the Department, testify that the usage varied under the different heads of the Department. It thus appears that the Postmaster-General would have been fully justified in letting the service to any of the reasonable bids above the straw. It is in evidence that many of these bids, from known and responsible parties, were one-half lower than the present compensation, but it did not avail either to protect the bidder or the Government. The Postmaster-General, for some unexplained cause, determined to change the practice of the Department, and as early as July 6, 1871, announced, through the contract office, that, where proposals were in regular form, he would not accept of any but the lowest bidders, although it might be a fictitious bid. In his report to Congress, he attempts to justify his action by the opinion of the Attorney-General of a subsequent date. That the grave charge of having procured an ex post facto opinion may be fully shown, we give full extracts from the evidence. The Postmaster-General testifies as follows, without giving any date: “I went to Mr. Akerman, taking my papers and the law, and laid the whole matter before him, and we had a long conference. Mr. Akerman said there was great doubt about the power, but there was no doubt about the power to re-advertise; that I could do that and throw the routes open to competition,” (page 147.) George H. Williams, Attorney-General, testifies: “I have to state in regard to that (Mr. McKibben’s published statement) that I was employed to accompany General McKibben and Colonel Farrar to the office of the Postmaster-General, to convince him, if I could, that under the law, after a straw bid had been accepted and had proved to be a failure, he had a right to proceed then and take the next highest bidder, until he found some responsible party who would contract with the Government to carry the mails. I submitted some views as to the law on that subject to the Postmaster-General. He signified that he had a conference with the then Attorney-General, in which the Attorney-General advised him either that he had no power to pursue that course, or that he ought not to pursue that course. I am not very positive as to the language of the Postmaster-General. I then accompanied the same gentleman to the office of the Attorney-General, and, on inquiring, he stated that he had some conversation with the Postmaster-General on that subject; that no call had been made on him for an official opinion, but that he expected a formal call, and that when the call was made he would be willing to hear my argument as to the proper construction of the law," (page 316.) Again, Mr. Williams says: "He (the Attorney-General) did intimate that his opinions were not fixed on the subject; that he was ready to hear argument to change his views or adopt any new views that might be submitted as to the proper construction of the laws," (page 318.) Col. W. H. Farrar, after stating that his recollection was in accordance with the statement of Mr. Williams, adds: "Mr. Akerman stated that the Postmaster-General had called his attention to certain statutes, and he opened one or more volumes and called our attention to them. He then made the remark that he expected Mr. Creswell would, early in the ensuing week, call upon him for an official interpretation of the statutes; and he made this distinct arrangement, that he should send to Judge Williams notice when Mr. Creswell's letter should reach him, and that he would give us all an opportunity to be heard," (page 353.) Again, Mr. Farrar states: "I was present with Mr. Williams about the 5th or 6th of July." Mr. McKibben testifies "that about the 5th or 6th of July, in company with the present Attorney-General, George H. Williams, and Col. W. H. Farrar, we visited the Post-Office Department. Mr. French, of the contract-office, stated that the Postmaster-General had determined not to ascend the scale, as had been the custom, but that temporary contracts would be made and the service re-advertised. We went immediately to the Attorney-General's Office. Mr. Williams was spokesman of the party, who told the Attorney-General that we had come to talk about certain postal matters, viz, the decision of the contract-office. The Attorney-General stated that he had a casual conversation with the Postmaster-General on the subject-matter, but had given no opinion, and that he would notify Mr. Williams and hear counsel before he did," (page 282.)

The report of the Postmaster-General states that on the 19th of July last he addressed a letter to the Attorney-General, asking "an authoritative interpretation of the law as to the power of the Postmaster-General in making contracts for the conveyance of the mails;" and in strict conformity with the opinion of the Attorney-General, dated July 22, he proceeded to make temporary contracts and re-advertise the routes whereon service had failed. The opinion of the Attorney-General was obtained sixteen days after the Post-Office Department had determined upon and officially announced the course of action it subsequently pursued; and it was obtained, too, without notice or opportunity to be heard on the part of Mr. Williams and his associates, as had been promised by Mr. Akerman. Special attention is directed to the following letter of the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General. The letter simply asks the opinion of the law-officer of the Government as to the duty of the Postmaster-General where failure to put on service occurs under the obsolete section 24 of the act of 1836, utterly ignoring the more recent law of 1845, under which law it is proven and admitted by the Postmaster-General that awards must be made:

"Letter of the Postmaster-General, under date of the 19th July, 1871, to Hon. A. T. Akerman, Attorney-General, asking his opinion as to the true interpretation of the laws bearing on the subject of making temporary contracts for the transportation of the mails.

"POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, July 19, 1871.

"SIR: The law limits the duration of contracts for carrying the mail to four years, (act of March 3, 1825, Statutes, volume 4, page 104.) The Union is divided for this purpose into four sections, so that the contracts for a section expire and are re-let each year. At each of these annual lettings more or less bids of a fictitious character, or at inadequate compensation, or from bidders without means or knowledge of business, have been received, and, when lowest, have been accepted, as required by law, (section 24, act of July 2, 1836, Statutes at Large, volume 5, page 80.) It thus often happens that failures occur to execute contracts and perform service, rendering it necessary to re-let the service at the expense of the failing bidder, as enjoined by the forty-fourth section of the act of March 3, 1825, (Statutes at Large, volume 4, page 114,) and the twenty-seventh section of the act of July 2, 1836, (Statutes at Large, volume 5, page 86.) The section last referred to says that in case of failure the Postmaster-General 'shall proceed to contract with some other person or persons,' &c.

"The question then arises, how or in what manner shall the Postmaster-General 'proceed' to obtain this contract? Usage in such cases has varied according to circumstances and the differing views of the different heads of the Department. In some cases, when a failure has occurred from the simple inability of a bidder to go on with the service, the next lowest bidder has been taken, if his figures were reasonable, and if he declined, a second, and even a third, offer made to bidders standing on the books. This course was pursued to save trouble, time, and expense in re-advertising.

"In other instances, and perhaps in a majority of cases, the routes have been re-advertised. The result of the last annual letting of routes in the Southern States for service from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875, shows a much larger number of failures than usual, and the indications are that a great number of the bids are 'straw' or fictitious; not the lowest only, but others running from low to high rates, as if intended to accomplish ulterior and sinister purposes.

"One of the duties of the Postmaster-General, as prescribed by the first section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1825, 'to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post-Office Department,' (Statutes at Large, vol. 4, page 102,) is that 'he shall provide for the carriage of the mail on all post-roads that are or may be established by law,' &c. To this end section 10 of the same act (vol. 4, page 104) makes it his duty to give public notice, 'in one newspaper published in the State or States, or Territory, where the contract is to be performed, for at least twelve weeks before entering into contract for carrying the mail, that such contract is intended to be made, and the day on which it is to be concluded,' &c.

"By act of March 3, 1865, the insertion in papers published in the States is limited to six weeks instead of twelve.

"In the twenty-third section of the act 'to change the organization of the Post-Office Department,' &c., approved July 2, 1836, (Statutes at Large, vol. 5, page 85,) this language is used:

"It shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General, before advertising for proposals for the transportation of the mail, to form the best judgment practicable as to the mode, time and frequency of transportation on each route, and to advertise accordingly."

"And then follow the words:

"Whenever it shall become necessary to change the terms of any existing contract, * * * or to enter into a contract at any other time than at the annual letting, the Postmaster General shall give notice, in one newspaper published * * * as near as may be to the route on which the services are to be performed, for at least four weeks before * * * making such contract, inviting proposals therefor, which proposals shall be received and opened, and such proceedings thereon had in all things as at the annual lettings: Provided, however, That the Postmaster-General may make temporary contracts until a regular letting can take place."

"The 'proceedings thereon' are those described in the twenty-fourth section of the same act, (vol. 5, page 86,) viz:

"That proposals for mail-contracts shall be delivered to the Department sealed, and shall be kept sealed until the biddings are closed, and shall then be opened and marked in the presence of the Postmaster-General and one of the Assistant Postmasters-General, or in the presence of two of the Assistant Postmasters-General."

"The 'annual letting' mentioned in the section of the act of 1836 quoted above is understood at the Department to mean the lettings of contracts for four years' service, as directed by the act of 1825.

"To obtain your opinion as to the true interpretation of the laws bearing on this subject, and the proper course for the Department to pursue to protect, not only the interests of the United States, but the rights of honest and bona-fide bidders, is the object of this communication.

"First. Is the Postmaster-General authorized to make any contracts for the conveyance of mails, other than for 'temporary' service, except under or in pursuance of bids received after inviting them by advertisement; or, more particularly, if the lowest bidder at an 'annual letting' fails to enter into contract and perform service, can the Postmaster-General legally contract with the next lowest bidder who will agree to perform the service at his bid for the whole term without re-advertising; or is it lawful, after once advertising and failing to secure a contractor, to contract with a party who has not been a bidder, on a proposition informally submitted, for the contract-term?"

"Second. What meaning is to be attached to the word 'temporary,' as used in the proviso to the twenty-third section of the act of July 2, 1836? Can it be made to authorize a period of one year, so as to terminate a contract at the next annual letting, or is it limited to the time actually necessary to advertise—four weeks—and go through the process of opening, deciding, and awarding, as detailed in the laws?"

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. A. J. CRESWELL,
"Postmaster-General."

"Hon. A. T. AKERMAN,
"Attorney-General."

It is important to notice in this connection that the charge of having procured an ex post facto opinion was published while Mr. Akerman was in Washington and held the position of Attorney-General. Why he did not come to Mr. Creswell's relief upon so grave an accusation is a question not easily answered. The minority of the committee must conclude that this charge is fully sustained. The Postmaster-General testifies that "it [the alleged opinion of the Attorney-General] did prevent me from letting these contracts permanently and compelled me to let them temporarily, and in some cases at higher rates," (page 270.) Thus the practical result of the action of the Postmaster-General has destroyed competition for contracts and substituted expensive temporary for the regular and cheaper service, and, as previously stated, notwithstanding the repeated advertisements for service, the Post-Office Department is still forced to continue these temporary lettings for the benefit of the old contractors, whom it is gravely suspected (although not in proof) to have originated the system of fictitious bidding for their own especial benefit. Mr. F. P. Sawyer admits that he is still in possession of the important land-routes in Texas, although he denies any knowledge of the "strawing" of which he is the sole beneficiary.

That the Postmaster-General did twice violate the law in the letting of the route from Oroville, California, to Portland, Oregon, at an unnecessary expense of nearly $200,000, is distinctly proven by the record itself. It exhibits the fact that the advertisement for proposals asked for daily service, or seven times a week. One John Alman bid $95,900 for six times a week, and Gilman and Saulsbury bid $98,400 for seven times a week, and, in strict accordance with the law and the instructions of the Postmaster-General, were entitled to the contract, which they personally demanded from the Postmaster-General. The contract was awarded to Alman, who proved to be a fraudulent bidder, and by reason of his failure the enormous sum of $43,600 in excess of Gilman and Saulsbury's bid was paid in the period of four months for temporary service, and the entire expenditure in excess of the rejected bid will amount to $180,000 at the close of the contract term. It appears from the record that Alman, on the afternoon of the last day for receiving proposals, filed a letter, without date, stating that he intended to bid for seven times a week, and supported it by affidavit. It cannot be contended that Mr. Alman's bid was a bid under the advertisement and instructions, but the Postmaster-General gracefully excuses himself for rejecting the legal bid on the ground that he saved $10,000 for the Government, and that the instructions accompanying proposals can always "bend" to the will of the Postmaster-General. He testifies as follows: "I have always held that a regulation is something within my own control; I would not control a law, but the regulations of the Department can always bend," (page 156.) The insufficiency of this excuse and the gross injustice to bona-fide contractors will appear by reference to the compilation of Postal Laws and Regulations, published by the Postmaster-General for the joint protection of the Department and its employes.

"Regulations of the Post-Office Department.

"SPECIAL NOTICE.

"All instructions and regulations promulgated by the Postmaster-General, conformably to law, for the guidance of persons employed by the Department, are the law of the land, and entitled to the same respect and obedience as acts of Congress. Any disregard or disobedience of such regulations entails upon postmasters, contractors, and other employes of the Post-Office Department the same liabilities and penalties as a violation of any specific law of Congress. The following regulations and instructions are made for the purpose of organizing the business of the Department, and all official acts of the officers of the Department must be done and performed in strict conformity thereto. Every deviation from these instructions and regulations will be followed by appropriate penalties or punishment. (See note c to section 2, Postal Laws.)

"11. Bidders are cautioned to mail their proposals in time to reach the Department by the day and hour named, (3 p. m., October 30, 1871;) for bids received after that time will not be considered in competition with bids of reasonable amount received in time. Neither can bids be considered which are without the guarantee required by law, and a certificate of the sufficiency of such guarantee.

"15. Bidders are requested to use, as far as practicable, the printed proposals furnished by the Department, to write out in full the sum of their bids, and to retain copies of them.

"Altered bids should not be submitted; nor should bids once submitted be withdrawn. No withdrawal of a bidder or guarantor will be allowed unless the withdrawal is dated and received before the last day for receiving proposals.

"Each bid must be guaranteed by two responsible persons. The bid and guarantee should be signed plainly with the full name of each person.

"The Department reserves the right to reject any bid which may be deemed extravagant; and also to disregard the bids of failing contractors and bidders. (Act of July 2, 1836, section 24.)

"19. A modification of a bid in any of its essential terms is tantamount to a new bid and cannot be received, so as to interfere with regular competition. Making a new bid, with guarantee and certificate, is the only way to modify a previous bid."

The positive law and each of the above regulations, which contractors are especially notified "are the law of the land, and entitled to the same respect and obedience as acts of Congress," have been willfully violated. Had the Postmaster-General adhered to the law, instead of making it "bend" to his own inclinations, neither in this nor subsequent lettings would the Government have been the pecuniary sufferer. After Alman's known failure, or before it, it appears that many intermediate bids were withdrawn, and instead of going up the scale of bidders, as enjoined by joint resolution of May 5, 1870, and awarding to the next lowest bidder at $170,000, according to the testimony of Giles A. Smith, the bidders on the ground (Washington) were given to the next morning to put in their proposals, in pursuance of a verbal conversation with the Postmaster-General. The contract was then awarded for the residue of the term, three and one-half years, at $134,000 per annum. This was a private letting, and in direct violation of the joint resolution, and Mr. McLellan testifies: "I do not know of any law authorizing the Postmaster-General to make a contract for three years without advertising for bids, except steamboat routes." It is due to the Postmaster-General to say that it was more economical than if he had followed the letter of the law; but it was nevertheless a distinct violation of the law.

After these repeated and facile violations of the law and regulations, and their justification on the score that it was for the interest and protection of the Government, it is impossible for the minority of the committee to appreciate the tenacity with which the Postmaster-General adheres to what he claims to be the law, when it involves the Government in a vast and unnecessary expenditure of money.

The expenditure of Government money in increasing service is fully illustrated by reference to two routes, out of many that were put in evidence. The service from Mesilla to Los Angeles was let at $124,000 per annum, and increased to $214,000 per annum, equal to an increase of $362,000 for the contract term. The route from Missoula to Walla Walla was let at $22,000 per annum, and increased to $71,000, equal to an increase of $196,000 for the contract term. The steamboat or water route from New Orleans to Shreveport was let to a Mr. Peterson at $30,000 per annum. Mr. McLellan testifies that "Postmaster-General Randall refused to put on the water service, as the other routes were sufficient to supply the service." The present Postmaster-General created a double service, and the compensation for the water route was a mere gratuity to Mr. Peterson. In reference to the additional cost for temporary service, which, it is charged, amounts to $400,000 per annum in the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, Mr. McKibben testifies that "I made an estimate from the principal routes in Texas. I took the bids of the parties who have been certified under oath before this committee to be responsible men, and added up the amounts of their bids. I then added up the amounts paid for temporary service, and it appears that the service in Texas could have been performed for one-half the present compensation."

The following statement of service in Texas was put in evidence:

	Cost of temporary service.	Rejected bids.
Route 8537, from San Antonio to Eagle Pass.....	$17,612	$10,700
Route 8538, from San Antonio to Fort Concho.....	63,730	22,900
Route 8539, from Fort Concho to El Paso.....	81,706	49,500
Route 8540, from Fort Concho to Fort Arbuckle.....	44,225	29,000
	207,273	112,100

In conclusion, the minority of the committee, in presenting this report to Congress, are compelled to state from the evidence that the system of fraudulent or straw-bidding has grown to its full volume under this administration. They believe that it is the direct result of excessive and unreasonable contracts given out by the Post-Office Department. They consider the refutation of the statement of Mr. Creswell, that he acted under the opinion of the Attorney-General, as complete, and they believe that opinion was obtained after the Postmaster-General had determined to change the practice of the Department, and now offered as an excuse and apparent justification therefor. They believe his action without justification in refusing to entertain the bids of reasonable contractors, which he could do under the established usage of the Department. They believe his violation of the law in the Oroville and Portland letting is proven beyond any doubt. They believe unreasonable expenditure in the land-routes to be fully established, and unnecessary and expensive service to have been established between New Orleans and Shreveport. They consider that, if the laws and regulations can be violated to save the money of the Government, the Postmaster-General is estopped from pleading them to justify extravagance in other cases; and while they are necessarily restricted in presenting the evidence, they believe that they have adduced sufficient to satisfy Congress that the Postmaster-General has so administered the affairs of the Post-Office Department as to at least merit their censure.

LXXIV MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

[GENERAL NATURE—No. 50.]

AN ACT relating to proposals and contracts for transportation of the mails, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person or persons bidding for the transportation of the mails upon any route which may be advertised to be let, and receiving an award of the contract for such service, who shall wrongfully refuse or fail to enter into contract with the Postmaster General, in due form, and perform the service described in his or their bid or proposal, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months.

SEC. 2. That each bid for carrying the mail shall hereafter have affixed to it the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability pecuniarily to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service, in case his bid shall be accepted; and that the signatures of his guarantors are genuine, and that he believes said guarantors pecuniarily responsible for and able to pay all damages the United States shall suffer by reason of the bidder's failing to perform his obligations as such bidder.

SEC. 3. That any postmaster or other officer of the Post-Office Department who shall affix his signature to the certificate of sufficiency of guarantors or sureties before the guaranty or contract is signed by the guarantors or sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or illusory certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 4. That no bidder for carrying the mail shall be released from his obligation under his bid or proposal, notwithstanding an award made to a lower bidder, until a contract for the designated service shall have been duly executed by such lower bidder and his sureties, and accepted, and the service entered upon by the contractor to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 5. That after any regular bidder or contractor for the transportation of the mail upon any route shall have failed to enter into contract, and commence the performance thereof as herein provided, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service, who will enter into a contract and perform the same, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high; in which case he shall re-advertise such service. And in all cases of regular contracts hereafter made, the contract may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be continued in force beyond its express terms for a period not exceeding six months, until a new contract with the same or other contractors shall be made by the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 6. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per centum on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and in case of new service not less than five per centum of the amount of one year's pay proposed in such bid if the bid exceed five thousand dollars per annum. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder.

SEC. 7. That in case of the sickness, or unavoidable absence from his office, of the postmaster of any money-order post-office, he may, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such postmaster: Provided, That the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases: And provided further, That such acting officer shall, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct, in like cases, of the postmaster for whom he shall act.

SEC. 8. That the Postmaster-General, whenever he may deem it consistent with the public interest, may accept new surety upon any contract existing, or hereafter made, for carrying the mails, in substitution for and release of any existing surety.

SEC. 9. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to cause to be placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, for the service of the Post-Office Department, the net proceeds of the money-order business; and that the receipts of the Post-Office Department, derived from this source, during each quarter, shall be entered by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, in the accounts of said Department, under the head of "revenue from money-order business."

Approved April 27, 1872.

EXHIBIT B.

FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Monday, April 13, 1874.

MAIL-CONTRACTS.

Mr. STONE. I move that the rules be suspended and the preamble and resolution adopted which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it will be found that gross abuses and irregularities in the matter of mail-contracts existing in the Post-Office Department of the United States, a portion of which will more fully appear by reference to Executive Document No. 322, Forty-second Congress, second session, of date May 17, 1872, and an examination of the bids for mail-service from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1873, and from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875, on mail-routes 7587, 7590, 7592, 7647, 8553, 8536, 8537, 8538, 8539, 8540, 8549, 8550, 8557, 8571, 8572, 8575, 8577, 8590, 8603, 8619, 8620, 8642, and 8646, that the aggregate bids for these mail-routes amount to $48,490 per annum that the lowest bidders failed to execute contracts, and that contracts were made with one F. P. Sawyer, of Washington, District of Columbia, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $439,469; that upon mail-routes 7524, 7612, and 7613 the bids amount to $2,350.01, and contracts were made with one Chidester for the sum of $14,522; that upon mail-routes 8006, 8007, 8010, 8013, and 8014 the bids amount to $25,700, and contracts were made with one Peterson aggregating the sum of $101,500; that upon mail-routes Nos. 7603, 7604, and 7605 the bids amount to $3,892, and contracts were made with one Vaile for the sum of $14,100; that upon mail-routes 8082 and 8083 the bids amount to $1,995, and contracts were made with one Davis for $16,050; that the bids upon mail-routes 7596, 7595, 7523, 7524, 7506, 6631, and 14846 aggregate the sum of $26,395, and that contracts were made with sundry persons named therein amounting to $102,549; that the bids for service on these several routes amount in the aggregate to $108,822.01, and that contracts were made for this service amounting to the sum of $688,190, in violation, as is alleged, of the Postal Laws and Regulations of the Post-Office Department; and whereas it will be found upon examination of the manuscript in possession of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that there has been paid to mail-contractors $1,150,086.09 for services rendered for the quarter ending December 31, 1873, reported by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, and paid by the Postmaster-General, between December 30, 1873, and January 10, 1874, as is alleged, in violation of section 264, page 195, of the Postal Laws and Regulations, and section 508, page 244, of the Postal Laws and Regulations; and whereas it will be found from examination of the manuscript abstract No. 4, in possession of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that the mail-routes established or ordered during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, other than those let to contractors at the annual letting; that the aggregate of the bids for mail-service on routes Nos. 8642, 8646, 7590, 7592, and 10843 amounts to $8,597.74, and that contracts were made with one Sawyer for $40,381.50; that the bids for mail-service on routes 7521, 7612, 7613, 7517, 7521, 7612, 7613, 7624, 7636, 7645, and 7598 amount to $9,544.75, and contracts was awarded to one Chidester for the sum of $42,998; and that bids for mail-service on mail-routes Nos. 14935, 6061, 6781, 6648, 8082, 8526, 7603, 7648, 7524, 7522, 7525, 7594, 7596, 10843, and 14905 amount to $22,298, and that contracts were awarded to sundry persons for the sum of $93,651; that the aggregate bids for the mail-service on the foregoing routes amount to $40,440.49, and that contracts were made for this service for the sum of $177,030.50, as is alleged, in violation of the Postal Laws and Regulations of the Post-Office Department; and whereas it will be found upon examination of manuscript report No. 5, in possession of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that service on mail-route No. 8031 was for twice a week, at an annual sum of $3,900; that the service was expedited to six miles an hour and one additional trip per week, for which the contract-price was increased $12,918.13; that the service on mail-route No. 8067 was for twice a week, at an annual sum of $5,980; that the service was expedited to five miles an hour, for which an additional sum of $7,840.45 is paid: Therefore,

LXXVI MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and are hereby, instructed to make a thorough examination into the operations of the Post-Office Department, and to make to this House at the earliest possible moment a full report of their investigation, together with the testimony taken by them; and to that end the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and, if deemed necessary by them, to employ an additional clerk and short-hand reporter; and that the said investigation shall be held publicly.

During the reading of the preamble

Mr. G. F. HOAR said: I rise to a question of order. How are this preamble and resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. They were introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. Stone,) by consent of the gentleman from Texas, (Mr. Giddings,) who yielded to him for that purpose.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I might as well move "to suspend the rules and make the following speech," and then go on and give the speech.

Mr. STONE. Gentlemen have sent up bills to the Clerk's desk that have taken fifteen or twenty minutes to read. I can read this in five minutes, and yet gentlemen object to a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. TYNER. It is something more than a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. PACKER. The gentleman who offers this has had ample opportunity to make charges of this kind before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The matter is undergoing investigation, and is now being considered by that committee.

Mr. STONE. I object to debate.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object to the further reading of statements and argumentation in this preamble, because it is in the nature of debate, giving reasons why members should vote so and so upon the subject-matter.

Mr. RANDALL. It is immaterial if not true, and very material if true.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not stop the reading on the point of order, although he will not say it is not well taken. The House will observe that this winds up with a resolution instructing the committee to investigate facts which the mover alleges to be true. The Chair cannot admit that the paper is in the ordinary form; it is in very extraordinary form.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a very extraordinary case.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter which the gentleman desires to have investigated. He sets out in the preamble with a statement that the facts are so and so, and then asks that an investigation be had.

Mr. STONE. I will change it from "it will be found" to "it is alleged," if that will make any difference.

The SPEAKER. That makes a great difference.

Mr. STONE. The facts are the same, and will be found so on an investigation. I did not choose to come before the House with a resolution instructing the committee unless I had something to direct the committee to act upon.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be so suspended that it may be read by its title.

The SPEAKER. The shortest way will be to read it through.

The reading was then concluded.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and Mr. Packer and Mr. Stone were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—yeas 72, noes 87.

So the motion was not seconded.

Mr. STOWELL. I desire to state that the Post-Office Committee have given the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Stone] an opportunity to appear before them to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Clerk will record the fact that every democratic vote was given in favor of this inquiry and every republican vote against it. Thank God for that.

Mr. STONE. I now ask that the preamble and resolution be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And I ask that they be printed.

Mr PAGE and others objected.

Mr. PACKER. I desire to say that if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Stone] will strike out the preamble which contains these charges, there will be no objection at all to the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Packer,] chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, suggests that the resolution directing the investigation (without the preamble assuming the charges to be true) may be adopted. Is there objection?

Several MEMBERS. None.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be adopted without the preamble, which assumes the charge to be true.

Mr. BECK. The preamble does not so assume.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I insist on having the preamble and resolution printed.

Several members objected.

Mr. SPEER. I ask that the resolution be read, so that we may see whether, apart from the preamble, it refers anything to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and are hereby, instructed to make a thorough examination into the operations of the Post-Office Department, and to make to this House at the earliest possible moment a full report of their investigation, together with the testimony taken by them; and to that end the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and, if deemed necessary by them, to employ an additional clerk and short-hand reporter; and that the said investigation shall be held publicly.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, I ask that the preamble and resolution may be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. Page] objects.

Mr. LUTTRELL. What gentleman from California objects?

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Were not the preamble and resolution read by consent of the House? and do they not, by virtue of that fact, go into the Record?

The SPEAKER. They do; and also into the Journal.

Several MEMBERS. That is all that is necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declined, upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Hale,] to prohibit the reading of the preamble, but he said he would not have it understood that it might not be ruled out. The Chair sees no such connection between the preamble and the resolution as would have enabled the preamble, on strict construction of the rules, to be introduced; because the resolution does not recite the preamble; it stands as a distinct substantive proposition, having no connection with the preamble. But the Chair did not desire to have it ruled out on the point of order, although his opinion is that it was not properly a part of the resolution.

Mr. DURHAM. I make the point of order that there was no objection—

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order for the gentleman to make. The preamble and resolution will appear in the Record and the Journal. The Chair simply desired to place himself right. He did not rule out the preamble, although, according to strict parliamentary law, he ought to have done so.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to say that information, emanating as I understand from my colleague, [Mr. Luttrell,] has reached my own State through the associated press of the country, that an investigation has been going on for the last two weeks before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in reference to this very subject.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire to say that I know nothing about any such dispatch; and the gentleman has no authority for his assertion. He is very sensitive on these questions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that to make a preamble in order, it must connect itself directly and necessarily with the resolution; and gentlemen will have observed, from the reading of this resolution, that it is a substantive, independent proposition, not reciting the preamble, nor referring to it in any way.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to make an explanation to this House. I think it is the duty of the House to listen to it; and I think that this explanation should be made now.

Over two weeks ago my colleague [Mr. Luttrell] came before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads preferring certain charges. He was requested by the committee to submit his charges in writing and sign them.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Did I not do so?

Mr. PAGE. My colleague must excuse me. He came there at different times when the committee was not in session—when no quorum was present. Immediately telegrams were sent out to California stating that Mr. Luttrell was endeavoring to get an investigation before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and that he could not obtain a hearing; which was false.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is untrue.

Mr. PAGE. About a week ago he was requested to submit those charges to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which he has done. It was then agreed that on Tuesday, that is to-morrow, morning my colleague [Mr. Luttrell] with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Stone] should appear before that committee and make and substantiate the charges contained in their written statements. They have appeared here to-day to ask the House to take cognizance of what the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are prepared to go on with.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I wish to say this to the House: The gentleman is very sensitive on all these questions. I stated to him and to the committee that serious charges had been preferred to me about certain post-office transactions. I was not disposed to, and I did not, implicate the Postmaster-General. I believe he was innocent; but I do believe that a post-office ring has been formed which has defrauded the Government of the United States of thousands and thousands of dollars during the last year. I stated that it was the common talk all around the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I went before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads as LXXVIII MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

I had agreed to, but the gentlemen of the committee did not put in an appearance, and there was no quorum. One member of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Randall,] told me to come back on another occasion, and I have acted strictly in accordance with his request.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Stone] whether he did not send for me. [Cries of "Order."]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not be interrupted.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I acted strictly in accordance with the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Randall,] and appeared before the committee and filed my charges. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Stone] has filed similar charges to-day; and we make these charges, Mr. Speaker, from the post-office books. We have the books to produce. And let me say here that I make these charges on the authority of the very best men in my State. I make them on the authority of the very best republicans in my State—republicans, too, Mr. Speaker, who would be ashamed of the action of my colleague here to-day. I make them in behalf of republicans of California who stand firm to their party—republicans, sir, who are honest in heart and sentiment, who have stood by the country in days gone by and who intend to stand by it in the future.

Mr. PAGE. That is something more than was ever done by my colleague.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is the class of men I am representing. I have stated to the gentleman who they were.

Mr. PAGE. Which political party does my colleague represent on this floor?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I represent the workingmen of California, not the railroad "ring." I am against all the "rings." I represent the honest, hard-working people of California.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask my colleague what political party he represents on this floor?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I represent the democratic party—Newton Booth and the toiling, the hard-working men of California, which my colleague dare not say he does. I do not come here with the Leland Stanford and the Pacific Railroad collar around my neck, labeled with the badge of monopolies. I come here a workingman and as the representative of workingmen, irrespective of party. I tell my colleague and I tell the House that if the republican party here means to put down corruption, then I am for the republican party; but if it does not mean to put down corruption and fraud on the Government, but, on the contrary, to uphold these "rings," then I am against it.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to be heard. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. McNULTA. Hear him.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the regular order of business. Each side has had its chance to be heard.

Mr. SENER. Hear both sides.

Mr. PAGE. I ask to be heard.

Mr. McNULTA. Hear him.

Mr. ATKINS. Both sides have been heard.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to what I believe to be a privileged motion. I move that the preamble be not printed in the Record, and I move to suspend the rules if necessary for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion, as he has already recognized the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. Giddings,] who has the floor on a motion to suspend the rules. The Chair understood the resolution to be unanimously agreed to, the preamble having been withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Was the resolution withdrawn from the Record?

The SPEAKER. Not from the Record, but from action.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It should be withdrawn from the Record.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand the Chair to state that the resolution was agreed to unanimously, but that was not my understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts states it was not his understanding that the resolution was agreed to unanimously. It will be again read.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to be heard for a few minutes.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the gentleman's going on if opportunity be given for reply.

Mr. PAGE. I will endeavor to make it a reply to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I do not object if the gentleman's colleague has an opportunity to reply to his speech.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not yield further.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk to be read a telegram published in one of the California papers.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to say that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Stone] did not withdraw the preamble to the resolution, as the Chair stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen will observe that neither the preamble nor the resolution is before the House, because the House refused to second the motion for the suspension of the rules. Then the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads suggested that the resolution, which was the only thing that proposed action, should be agreed to. And to that the Chair heard no objection.

Mr. DAWES. The resolution was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Packer.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Packer] proposed the resolution himself. The preamble and resolution, so far as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Stone] had offered them, were not before the House, because the House refused to second the motion for suspending the rules.

Mr. POTTER. That is as I understand it. But it is nevertheless true that the gentleman from Missouri did not withdraw the preamble to his resolution, and he desires to have it so understood.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair is not mistaken as to the fact that the gentleman from Missouri indicated his assent to the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. STONE. My proposition was to refer the whole to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I heard no objection to that; but I did not agree to the withdrawal of the preamble.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman object to the resolution being passed without the preamble?

Mr. STONE. I did not.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair furthermore understood the gentleman by a nod of the head to assent to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that the resolution should be agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I did.

The SPEAKER. Then, of course, the gentleman did as the Chair has stated.

Mr. STONE. I do not see it in that light.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee can take cognizance of the preamble, as it will be published in the Congressional Record.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I make no objection to the resolution if it can be limited to the State of California, or such territory as the gentleman may specify. But I should think no gentleman in the House would assent to a resolution so broad as I understand this to be. I ask that it be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and they are hereby, instructed to make a thorough examination into the operations of the Post-Office Department, and to make to this House at the earliest moment a full report of their investigation, together with the testimony taken by them; and, to that end, that said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and, if deemed necessary by them, to employ an additional clerk and short-hand reporter, and that the said investigation shall be held publicly."

Mr. PACKER. The resolution ought to be limited to the mail-letting.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that the whole resolution and preamble be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that they may report on it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be referred, striking out the portion in regard to an additional clerk and short-hand reporter.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order. The Chair announced that the resolution, without the preamble, had been passed by unanimous consent. A debate arose; and I submit that it is now too late for the gentleman to object.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. If the Chair, in the confusion, did not hear the gentleman object, and the gentleman states that he did object, it is not too late.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I am recognized for the purpose, I would move that the rules be suspended, and that the resolution and preamble be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say a word in justice to the committee.

Mr. PAGE. I object. I desire to make a remark in answer to my colleague from California, [Mr. Luttrell,] and it is objected to on that side of the House.

Mr. TYNER. I appeal to the gentleman from California to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall] to make a statement, for the reason that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a member of the committee of the last Congress which had the same question under consideration.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. TYNER. I wish the House to consent that I may be heard for not over two minutes, after the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have been heard.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say but one word in connection with this. I, of course, do not know whether these charges are true or false. It is stated that the proof of them is to be found in official documents. But I do wish to say one word in justice to the committee. I believe there is no man on that committee who is not willing to give this subject a full, fair, and thorough investigation. I was a member also of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads during the last Congress. There was at that time an investigation touching some of these matters, and the committee were divided six to three. Six—the majority of the committee; that is, the republican side of it—rather sustained the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and proposed certain legislation, which was subsequently adopted by Congress. But the three democrats, the minority of the committee, dissented from the conclusion and from the exoneration of the Post-Office Department in that particular.

Mr. BECK. Was the testimony ever printed?

Mr. RANDALL. The testimony was not printed, but the two reports will be found in a public document of last Congress, No. 53.

Mr. TYNER. I desire the attention of the House for but a moment. I was also a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the last Congress, and was present during the entire investigation to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall] has alluded. The charges came from a former member of this House, a gentleman, I believe, of the name of McKibben. A very thorough and searching investigation into nearly all the matters that were stated in the preamble to this resolution was made by that committee. I state, as my recollection of the facts, that the investigation was itself abandoned by the complainant, and that all the gentlemen of the committee agreed to the fact that while there might have been some rascalities and frauds committed on the Treasury of the United States, yet there was no stain whatever upon the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RANDALL. Suppose you read the minority report, and see if there are no reflections on the Post-Office Department.

Mr. TYNER. I have the report here, and I will refer to it in a moment. I only stated my recollection, and, of course, I may be mistaken. But I am satisfied that the investigation did develop the fact that there was a ring, which you may call "the post-office ring," and which did not embrace within it any person connected with the Post-Office Department, who had been committing frauds on the Treasury through the medium and instrumentality of what are known as straw-bids. Gross frauds evidently were committed, but I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will agree with me in saying that the proof before the committee did not show that any gentleman in the Post-Office Department was connected with those frauds.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to be understood as charging that the Postmaster-General was in any manner implicated in corruption; but I do say that the minority report, and I think justly, reflected on his management of the Post-Office Department, and that the whole committee thought that legislation was necessary so as to place it beyond the power of any Postmaster-General in the future to permit such things to be done.

My TYNER. Yes, Mr. Speaker; that investigation satisfied the committee of the necessity of changing the law in relation to the acceptance of bids, and the result was a passage of a law by the last Congress which has to a very considerable extent cut off what is known as straw-bidding.

Now, sir, when the preamble to the resolution was first presented to the House I suggested that it was something more than a resolution of inquiry, and objected to its consideration; and I voted with the majority in refusing to have it considered by the House; not because I did not want an investigation, but simply because I knew that the statements made in the preamble to the resolution were not warranted by the facts. But I was willing that the whole subject should be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I approved of that action, and hope that that committee will thoroughly investigate the facts that may come before it.

One word more. I have here the report that was made during the last Congress upon this subject, and if the House will bear with me I will read it myself. It has reference to the whole subject which is embraced in what is known as the temporary service. Gentlemen suggest that I should send it to the Clerk's desk to be read, and I will do so and ask the Clerk to read the passage which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It is not disputed that the Postmaster-General made the best terms for the Government for this temporary service which were obtainable. This service is generally being performed by the last regular contractors, who, having the lines or routes already stocked and organized, possess great advantages over other parties in proposals for brief or uncertain periods of service. And the complaint against the Postmaster-General seems to be that he 'ought to have taken the responsibility of contracting with the lowest bidder who would take the contract and perform the service for the term,' after the lowest or 'straw' bidder had failed, and that 'he should not have sought the opinion of the Attorney-General, nor observed it when obtained,' &c.

"The committee failed to arrive at that conclusion, and though it seems pretty certain that the Postmaster-General might have contracted with somebody, in most cases, for the term, at less rates than he contracted for the temporary service, the committee believe that no officer of the Government could be justified in a violation of the law at his own option, because in his opinion he might thereby save money to the Government. Such a rule of duty once established for officers of the Government, the license of discretion once substituted for the rule of law, and there would be no such thing as accountability by the public servants.

"The committee are therefore of opinion that the course pursued by the Postmaster-General was not only justified by the circumstances and law, but was eminently wise and prudent.

"The Attorney-General of the United States is the law expositor and organ of the Government, and until his opinions are overthrown or reversed by the courts, they are regarded as authority by the different Departments of the Government.

"The committee have, as the practical result of their labors in this investigation, reported a bill which passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote, and which they believe, if enacted into a law, will in great measure, if not entirely, remedy the evil which is the subject of this report.

"J. F. FARNSWORTH, Chairman.

"JOHN HILL.

"JAS. N. TYNER.

"S. O. HOUGHTON.

"GINERY TWITCHELL.

"CHARLES H. PORTER."

Mr. RANDALL. I ask now that the minority report may be read.

Mr. TYNER. One word more and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. BECK. I want to ask the gentleman a single question, and it is, why was not the testimony taken by the committee of the last Congress printed?

Mr. TYNER. I will answer that by saying to the gentleman that my recollection is that none of the committee thought it worth while to print the testimony. The complaint was abandoned.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the minority report.

Mr. TYNER. A single word more. My recollection is that the only point of difference between the majority and the minority of the committee was simply this: that the minority of the committee did not believe that the Postmaster-General had violated the law in the acceptance of bids; but that he ought to have taken the responsibility of preventing the letting of certain routes.

Mr. RANDALL. He ought to have stopped the plundering of the Treasury which these straw-bids have been the cause of.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman may use that language if he is disposed to do so.

Mr. CONGER. I object to this political quarrel going on any further.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not a political quarrel.

Mr. STONE. I desire to put myself right. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Tyner] has asserted that what was in the preamble to the resolution was untrue. I hurl back that charge, and say that it is true, and I hold in my hand a document which will prove every word of it.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman from Indiana did not make such a statement, or if he did it was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. STONE. You made that assertion.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Indiana said that he opposed the resolution because he knew that the facts stated in the preamble were not established by the investigation during the last Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask, as an act of justice to the minority of the committee, that their conclusion be also read; it is very short.

The Clerk read as follows:

"In conclusion, the minority of the committee, in presenting this report to Congress, are compelled to state from the evidence that the system of fraudulent or straw-bidding has grown to its full volume under this Administration. They believe that it is the direct result of excessive and unreasonable contracts given out by the Post-Office Department. They consider the refutation of the statement of Mr. Creswell, that he acted under the opinion of the Attorney-General, as complete, and they believe that opinion was obtained after the Postmaster-General had determined to change the practice of the Department, and now offered as an excuse and apparent justification therefor. They believe his action without justification in refusing to entertain the bids of reasonable contractors, which he could do under the established usage of the Department. They believe his violation of the law in the Oroville and Portland letting is proven beyond any doubt. They believe unreasonable expenditure in the land-routes to be fully established, and unnecessary and expensive service to have been established between New Orleans and Shreveport. They consider that, if the laws and regulations can be violated to save the money of the Government, the Postmaster-General is estopped from pleading them to justify extravagance in other cases; and while they are necessarily restricted in presenting the evidence, they believe that they have adduced sufficient to satisfy Congress that the Postmaster-General has so administered the affairs of the Post-Office Department as to at least merit their censure.

"P. VAN TRUMP.

"SAML. J. RANDALL.

"JOHN M. CARROLL.

Mr. PACKER. I desire to say, on behalf of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the present House, that they have furnished every facility to the gentlemen preferring these charges to substantiate them by evidence. The committee have shut out nothing which those gentlemen asked to present, and they have given them an attentive hearing every time they appeared before them.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to corroborate that statement.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is so; no one finds fault with the committee in that respect.

Mr. PAGE. I hold in my hand a telegraphic dispatch, sent at the instance of my colleague, [Mr. Luttrell,] in which it is stated that those gentlemen had consulted with the Postmaster-General in reference to these matters; that he acknowledged that the Department had committed a wrong, and at their request he would do no such wrong any more.

Mr. LUTTRELL. You have no right to make the statement that that dispatch was sent at my instance.

Mr. PAGE. That dispatch was sent out before my colleague submitted his charges at all.

Mr. STOWELL. And when he submitted his charges and we asked him to sign them he refused to do so.

Mr. PAGE, (to Mr. Luttrell.) Do you vouch for these charges?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Are you not a contractor, and so recorded here?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That accounts for the milk in the cocoa-nut.

Mr. PAGE. And I have a right to be.

Mr. LUTTRELL. No, sir; you have no right to be.

Mr. PAGE. Whenever the gentleman wants to discuss my right to be so, he can do so before the House. I ask that this dispatch be read.

Mr. BECK. I object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the preamble and resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads without being adopted.

No objection was made.

[H. R. 3603.—Forty-third Congress, first session.]

In the House of Representatives, June 5, 1874. Read twice, recommitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported the following bill:

A BILL to amend sections two hundred and forty-five, two hundred and forty-six, two hundred and forty-seven, and two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section two hundred and forty-five, section two hundred and forty-six, section two hundred and forty-seven, and section two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder with sureties approved by a postmaster, and, in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds five thousand dollars, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and further that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in cases of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages, to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted."

"SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever."

"SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly or without the exercise of due diligence approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both."

"SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per centum on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of new or modified service, not less than five per centum of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds five thousand dollars. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder. And if any regular contractor for the transmission of the mail upon any route shall fail or refuse to perform such service, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service at such regular letting, who will enter into contract, and perform the same, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high; and in case such next lowest bidder shall refuse to enter into contract and perform the same, the Postmaster-General may then award such service and enter into contract with any other person or persons who will duly enter into contract and perform the same at a price not exceeding that bid by such next lowest bidder. And in case of failure thus to secure a contract and the performance of such service as required by law, the Postmaster-General shall proceed in like manner as soon as practicable, to offer the same to the several bidders at such letting, and also to all other persons competent to contract, at a price not exceeding the prices and sums bid at such letting, in the order of such bids, commencing at the next lowest bid and going up the said list of bids upon such route, unless he shall consider all such bids too high, until he shall secure a proper contract and the satisfactory performance of such service, preferring and giving to each of such bidders, respectively, the right, within such time as the Postmaster-General may designate, to accept such service, and enter into contract for the performance thereof at his or their original bid: Provided, however, That whenever a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service under the last preceding regular contract thereon."

LXXXIV MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

[HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 6, 1874.

AMENDMENTS TO POSTAL CODE.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3603) to amend sections 245, 246, 247, and 253 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that section 245, section 246, section 247, and section 253 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and, in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster of the first, second or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and, further, that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages, to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted.

"SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever.

"SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly or without the exercise of due diligence approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

"SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per centum on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of new or modified service, not less than five per centum of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds five thousand dollars. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder. And if any regular contractor for the transmission of the mail upon any route shall fail or refuse to perform such service, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service at such regular letting, who will enter into contract and perform the same, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high; and in case such next lowest bidder shall refuse to enter into contract and perform the same, the Postmaster-General may then award such service and enter into contract with any other person or persons who will duly enter into contract and perform the same at a price not exceeding that bid by such next lowest bidder. And in case of failure thus to secure a contract and the performance of such service as required by law, the Postmaster-General shall proceed in like manner, as soon as practicable, to offer the same to the several bidders at such letting, and also to all other persons competent to contract, at a price not exceeding the prices and sums bid at such letting, in the order of such bids, commencing at the next lowest bid and going up the said list of bids upon such route, unless he shall consider all such bids too high, until he shall secure a proper contract and the satisfactory performance of such service, preferring and giving to each of such bidders, respectively, the right, within such time as the Postmaster-General may designate, to accept such service, and enter into contract for the performance thereof at his or their original bid: Provided, however, That whenever a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service under the last preceding regular contract thereon."

Mr. PACKER. Mr. Speaker, no one who has given any attention to the frauds practiced upon the Government by means of fictitious or "straw" bidding at the lettings of mail-contracts can doubt the propriety, if not the necessity, for some additional legislation to aid the Post-Office Department in its effort to suppress it; and it will require but little explanation to show that the bill proposed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will close the door against very many at least of the abuses and fraudulent practices by which unscrupulous men have preyed upon the Treasury of the Government, and have sought to enrich themselves at the cost of the people.

From the earliest period in the postal history of the country it has been the policy of the Government to invite competition in bidding at all lettings of mail-contracts by advertisement, and to require that the contract should be awarded to the lowest bidder.

Previous to the mail-letting of 1871, the practice of the Department had varied in relation to the allotment of contracts where the lowest or accepted bidder made default, some of the Postmasters-General having held that they had the right, under such circumstances, to accept the next lowest bidder willing to perform the service, and to enter into contract with him without re-advertising the routes. That construction of the law, however, was regarded by others as being more than doubtful, and while it saved the cost of re-advertising, it was found that frequently the Department was met by the allegation that the transportation of the mails could have been secured at lower rates if the route had again been thrown open to competition.

Finding himself thus embarrassed by the conflicting views and variant practice of his predecessors, and confronted by the fact that a considerable number of the bidders for some of the largest mail-routes in the Southwest had failed to execute their contracts, the present vigilant head of the Department asked the opinion of the Attorney-General in relation to his powers and duties in the premises. In response to his inquiries, that officer, upon the 20th day of July, 1871, in an opinion in which he reviewed the several provisions of the acts of 1825, 1836, and 1845, then in force in relation to mail-contracts, decided that the Postmaster-General could only make a regular contract after advertisement in the manner prescribed by law, and with the lowest bidder, and in the event of the failure of such lowest bidder, the Postmaster-General had no discretion under the law, but was bound to re-advertise the route, making temporary contracts to supply the service until a regular letting could take place.

The result and practical operation of this ruling almost necessarily was that upon the large routes, employing a large number of men and stages and hundreds of horses, the other bidders not being bound and almost invariably refusing to accept a contract for less than the regular term of four years, the Department was obliged, in order to continue the service, to make the best terms it could with the former contractor, for he was the only person prepared to perform the work, and no one else would or could afford to purchase the necessary amount of stock for a temporary contract of a few months.

In many cases there is no doubt but these low bids, usually designated as straw-bids, were put in in the interest of the old contractors upon the route, who felt morally certain that the temporary contract could only be performed by them; but the bids being regular in form, and the lowest bidder having performed all the prerequisites prescribed by law, was entitled, as the law thus stood and as construed by the law-officer of the Government, to have his bid accepted and the contract awarded to him.

From time to time Congress has endeavored to break up this system, and has passed numerous enactments to prevent the repetition of these practices. The ingenuity, however, of the parties engaged in it has devised means to elude many of the provisions which it was hoped would successfully check it, and recent experience shows that some additional legislation is necessary to meet contingencies not fully foreseen and not sufficiently provided for.

One of the restrictions imposed upon bidders by section 245 of the Postal Code of June 8, 1872, provided—

“That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by a written guarantee, signed by one or more responsible persons, and undertaking that, within such time after the bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, the bidder will enter into an obligation, with good and sufficient sureties, to perform the service proposed; and no proposals shall be considered unless accompanied by such guarantee.”

But upon this the value of the guarantee is made to depend mainly upon the amount of the bid, and if the bid is small, or, more expressively, if it is “straw,” the guarantee furnishes but little, if any, protection to the Government. Experience has shown, too, that among the thirty-five thousand postmasters scattered all over the country, some can be found who will certify to the sufficiency of guarantors, without exercising due care and diligence in making inquiry into the question of their responsibility.

By the bill just reported we require—

“That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and further that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages, to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted.”

Thus it will be seen that the amount of the bond which is to be substituted in place of the guarantee provided for by the act of 1872 is to be fixed and designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route; that the sureties are to be approved, where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster holding his commission by appointment from the President, and of the first, second, or third class, and that they are to be bound in the whole penalty of the bond, not only for the execution of the contract by the bidder, but that he shall perform the service according to his contract.

By the amendment to the two hundred and forty-seventh section the bill provides:

“That any postmaster who shall affix his signature of the approval of any bond of a bidder or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly or without the exercise of due diligence approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.”

As an additional measure of protection the committee provide by their amendment of the two hundred and forty-sixth section—

“That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate worth in the aggregate a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever.”

Another of the provisions heretofore relied upon as furnishing additional security and protection was the deposit of a certified check along with the bid. By the act of March 3, 1871, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department, (16 Statutes at Large, page 571,) it was provided:

“SEC. 4. That all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of mails upon the same shall hereafter accompany their bids (where they exceed $5,000) with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, of some reliable banking-house or banking-institution, which check or draft shall not be less than 5 per cent. on the amount that they would receive in any one year under such bid. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to enter into good and sufficient bonds to faithfully carry out such contract, such bidder or bidders shall forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States for the use of the Post-Office Department; otherwise such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder to whom it belongs."

Under this section, however, the amount of the certified check or draft was regulated by the amount of the bid, being for but "5 per cent. of the annual pay" designated by their bid; the deposit not being required at all if the bid was lower than $5,000 per annum. The object of the law was therefore practically defeated by the straw-bidder either bidding below the $5,000 or making the sum in addition so small that the 5 per cent. would be of no consequence.

The act of 1872 went one step further, however, and provided that bidders, where the annual compensation for the service on the route at the time exceeds $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank for not less than 5 per cent. on the amount of the annual pay on such route at the time the bid is made, and in case of new service for not less than 5 per cent. of the amount of one year's pay proposed in such bids if the bid exceeds $5,000 per annum.

In all cases of new service, then, it will be seen the act of 1872 was as defective as the act of 1871; and when it is remembered that all changes or alterations in the route itself, or in the kind or manner of service employed thereon, brings it within the classification officially regarded as "new service," it will be seen that in a majority of cases its provisions can be evaded in the same manner and just as effectively as were those of the act of 1871.

The bill now before the House requires, it will be seen, that in case of new or modified service the certified check or draft to be deposited shall not be less than 5 per cent. of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid; and as the amount of the bond is to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement for the letting, the amount of the check will be entirely under the control of the Department. That part of the section provides:

"That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than 5 per cent. on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and in case of new or modified service not less than 5 per cent. of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds $5,000. In case any bidder on being awarded any such contract shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder."

The remaining part of this section supplies an omission in the Postal Code of 1872, by making provision, upon the terms and conditions stated, for making a contract where the contractor, having entered into the contract and commenced the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, afterward fails or refuses to perform such service. It provides that—

"If any regular contractor for the transmission of the mail upon any route shall fail or refuse to perform such service, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service at such regular letting."

These several provisions, it is believed, Mr. Speaker, will render many of the irregularities and practices to which these straw-bidders have resorted to overreach the Government impracticable, if not impossible, and will enable the Postmaster-General so to control the lettings of mail-contracts that honest bidders will not be at the mercy of these men of straw, and so that, being rid of these fraudulent bids, the Post-Office Department will be able to save thousands of dollars annually to the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. PACKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LXXXVIII MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

[H. R. 3603.—43d Congress, 1st session.]

In the Senate of the United States.—June 18, 1874.—Read twice and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads.

AN ACT to amend sections two hundred and forty-five, two hundred and forty-six, two hundred and forty-seven, and two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section two hundred and forty-five, section two hundred and forty-six, section two hundred and forty-seven, and section two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds five thousand dollars, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bill, and, further, that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond, as liquidated damages, to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted."

"SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever."

"SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder, or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly, or without the exercise of due diligence, approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both."

"SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon very mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per centum on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of new or modified service, not less than five per centum of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds five thousand dollars. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder. And if any regular contractor for the transmission of the mail upon any route shall fail or refuse to perform such service, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service, at such regular letting, who will enter into contract and perform the same, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high; and in case such next lowest bidder shall refuse to enter into contract and perform the same, the Postmaster-General may then award such service and enter into contract with any other person or persons who will duly enter into contract and perform the same at a price not exceeding that bid by such next lowest bidder. And in case of failure thus to secure a contract and the performance of such service as required by law, the Postmaster-General shall proceed in like manner, as soon as practicable, to offer the same to the several bidders at such letting, and also to all other persons competent to contract, at a price not exceeding the prices and sums bid at such letting, in the order of such bids, commencing at the next lowest bid and going up the said list of bids upon such route, unless he shall consider all such bids too high, until he shall secure a proper contract and the satisfactory performance of such service, preferring and giving to each of such bidders, respectively, the right, within such time as the Postmaster-General may designate, to accept such service and enter into contract for the performance thereof at his or their original bid: Provided, however, That whenever a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service under the last preceding regular contract thereon."

Passed the House of Representatives June 6, 1874.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JUNE 8, 1874.—Read twice and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

JUNE 12, 1874.—Reported by Mr. Ramsey with amendments, viz: Strike out the part within [brackets] and insert the parts printed in italics.

AN ACT to amend sections two hundred and forty-five, two hundred and forty-six, two hundred and forty-seven, two hundred and fifty-one, and two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section two hundred and forty-five, section two hundred and forty-six, section two hundred and forty-seven, section two hundred and fifty-one, and section two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds five thousand dollars, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and, further, that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service, according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted."

"SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever."

"SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder, or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly, or without the exercise of due diligence, approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both."

"SEC. 251. That after any regular bidder, whose bid has been accepted, shall fail to enter into contract for the transportation of the mails according to his proposal, or, having entered into contract, shall fail to commence the performance of the service stipulated in his or their contract as therein provided, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for the same service, who will enter into a contract for the performance thereof, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high, in which case he shall re-advertise such service. And if any such bidder, whose bid has been accepted, and who has entered into a contract to perform the service according to his proposal, and in pursuance of his contract has entered upon the performance of the service, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, shall subsequently fail or refuse to perform the service according to his contract, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service, under the advertisement thereof, (unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high,) who will enter into contract and give bond, with sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster-General, for the faithful performance thereof, in the same penalty and with the same terms and conditions thereto annexed as were stated and contained in the bond which accompanied his bid; but in case each and every of the next lowest bidders for such service, whose respective bids are not considered too high by the Postmaster-General, shall refuse to enter into contract and give bond as herein required for the faithful performance of his contract, the Postmaster-General shall immediately advertise for proposals to perform the service on said route. Whenever an accepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: Provided, however, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service during the last preceding regular contract-term. And in all cases of regular contracts hereafter made, the contract may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be continued in force beyond its express terms for a period not exceeding six months, until a new contract with the same, or other contractors, shall be made by the Postmaster-General."

"SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per centum on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of new or modified service, not less than five per centum of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds five thousand dollars. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited [shall be returned to the bidder. And if any regular contractor for the transmission of the mail upon any route shall fail or refuse to perform such service, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service, at such regular letting, who will enter into contract and perform the same, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high; and in case such next lowest bidder shall refuse to enter into contract and perform the same, the Postmaster-General may then award such service and enter into contract with any other person or persons who will duly enter into contract and perform the same at a price not exceeding that bid by such next lowest bidder. And in case of failure thus to secure a contract and the performance of such service as required by law, the Postmaster-

General shall proceed in like manner, as soon as practicable, to offer the same to the several bidders at such letting, and also to all other persons competent to contract, at a price not exceeding the prices and sums bid at such letting, in the order of such bids, commencing at the next lowest bid and going up the said list of bids upon such route, unless he shall consider all such bids too high, until he shall secure a proper contract and the satisfactory performance of such service, preferring and giving to each of such bidders, respectively, the right, within such time as the Postmaster-General may designate, to accept such service and enter into contract for the performance thereof at his or their original bid: Provided, however, That whenever a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service under the last preceding regular contract thereon] and the checks or drafts deposited by all other bidders, on the same route, shall be returned to the [respective bidders making such deposits. No proposals for the transportation of the mails where the amount of the bond required to accompany the same shall exceed five thousand dollars, shall be considered, unless accompanied with the check or draft herein required, together with the bond required by a preceding section: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or intended to affect any penalties or forfeitures which have heretofore accrued under the provisions of the sections hereby amended."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

"SEC. —. That section 245, section 246, section 247, section 251, and section 253 of the act entitled 'An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department,' approved June 8, 1872, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and, further, that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service, according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted.

"SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever.

"SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder, or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly, or without the exercise of due diligence, approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

"SEC. 251. That after any regular bidder, whose bid has been accepted, shall fail to enter into contract for the transportation of the mails according to his proposal, or, having entered into contract, shall fail to commence the performance of the service stipulated in his or their contract as therein provided, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for the same service, who will enter into a contract for the performance thereof, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high, in which case he shall re-advertise such service. And if any bidder, whose bid has been accepted, and who has entered into a contract to perform the service according to his proposal, and in pursuance of his contract has entered upon the performance of the service, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, shall subsequently fail or refuse to perform the service according to his contract, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service, under the advertisement thereof, (unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high,) who will enter into contract and give bond, with sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster-General, for the faithful performance thereof, in the same penalty and with the same terms and conditions thereto annexed as were stated and contained in the bond which accompanied his bid; but in case each and every of the next lowest bidders for such service, whose respective bids are not considered too high by the Postmaster-General, shall refuse to enter into contract and give bond as herein required for the faithful performance of his contract, the Postmaster-General shall immediately advertise for proposals to perform the service on said route. Whenever an excepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: Provided, however, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service during the last preceding regular contract-term. And in all cases of regular contracts hereafter made, the contract may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be continued in force beyond its express terms for a period not exceeding six months, until a new contract with the same or other contractors, shall be made by the Postmaster-General.

"SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than 5 per cent. on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of new or modified service, not less than 5 per cent. of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds $5,000. In case any bidder on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited, and the checks or drafts deposited by all other bidders, on the same route, shall be returned to the respective bidders making such deposits. No proposals for the transportation of the mails where the amount of the bond required to accompany the same shall exceed $5,000, shall be considered, unless accompanied with the check or draft herein required, together with the bond required by a preceding section: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or intended to affect any penalties or forfeitures which have heretofore accrued under the provisions of the sections hereby amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the Senator from Minnesota, this is simply a bill proposing to guard against straw bids.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is it. It is the House bill on that subject, substantially, with an amendment added by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that amendment, the committee having examined it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

[House of Representatives.—Report No. 775.—Forty-third Congress, 1st session.]

MAIL-CONTRACTS AND TEMPORARY SERVICE.

JUNE 20, 1874.—Laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted the following report :

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom were referred, by the House of Representatives, the preamble and resolution offered by the Hon. William H. Stone, of Missouri, on the 13th day of April last, charging that "abuses and irregularities exist in the Post-Office Department in relation to certain mail-contracts, the payments to contractors and contracts for temporary service, therein designated, and instructing this committee to make an examination thereof," beg leave respectfully to report :

That having requested the attendance of Mr. Stone, the mover of the resolution, at their meetings, they proceeded, in his presence, to investigate and examine the testimony adduced by him, as well as all the official records and proceedings and other evidence material to the inquiry submitted to them.

The routes specified in the preamble, and in relation to which the irregularities were alleged to exist, are included in the advertisements of the Postmaster-General, dated September 30, 1870, inviting proposals for carrying the mails from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875, in the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas ; and as it was alleged by Mr. Stone that the facts in relation to all the routes named by him are precisely similar, the history of one being that of all, and that he had selected the first upon his list (No. 7587) for the purpose of presenting and exhibiting the abuses and irregularities upon which he based his charges, your committee deem it proper to refer to all the material facts in reference to it somewhat in detail. Under this advertisement, upon route No. 7587, (previously numbered 7567,) from Fort Gibson, Cherokee Nation, to Sherman, Grayson County, Texas, two hundred and five miles and back, three times a week, with proposals invited to run by a schedule allowing forty-eight hours running time each way, sixty persons or firms became bidders, at prices running from $900 to $80,049 per annum, as follows, viz :

Bidders' names.	Sum per annum.
Thompson, Pate & Monroe.....	$80,049.
Anderson Arnot.....	74,000.

	900.	Forty-eight-hour schedule.

The proposal of William Wood, the lowest bidder upon this list, was duly executed in proper form, and had attached to it the guarantee required by law, signed by D. S. Freeman and James W. Christie, who described themselves as residents of Baxter Springs, State of Kansas, and therein "undertake, that if the foregoing bid for carrying the mail on route 7587 be accepted by the Postmaster-General, the bidder shall, prior to the 1st day of July, 1871, enter into the required obligation or contract to perform the service proposed, with good and sufficient sureties."

To this guarantee was annexed a certificate of I. Frank McDowell, judge of probate in and for the county of Cherokee, State of Kansas, with the seal of the court attached, in which he certified, "under his oath of office, that he is acquainted with the above guarantors, and knows them to be men of property, and able to make good their guarantee, and that the bidder and guarantors are above the age of twenty-one years."

All the forms prescribed by law and the regulations of the Department having thus been complied with, the Postmaster-General felt himself bound, under the construction given by the Attorney-General to the several acts of Congress then in force in relation to mail-contracts, to accept this bid, and award the contract upon this route to William Wood, as the lowest bidder.

A contract having been prepared and sent, in accordance with the practice of the contract-office, to the postmaster at New Braunfels, Tex., the post-office address given by the bidder, for the purpose of having it signed, that officer after an unsuccessful effort to find Mr. Wood, returned it, by his letter of June 12, 1871, to the Department, unexecuted, stating the fact of his inquiry for and his inability to discover any trace of the bidder.

So important had this route become, as the principal line of communication from Saint Louis and the entire North and West with the interior of Texas, and as the connecting-link between the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad on the north and the Central Texas Railroad on the south, occupying the ground since covered by the completion of the railroads then in process of construction, and furnishing the principal if not the only postal facilities so urgently demanded by the rapidly increasing population and business interests of that section of the country, that the Post-Office Department had previously, some seven months before, found it necessary both to expedite the time and to increase the service to six trips a week.

Under the decision of the Attorney-General, before referred to and to be hereinafter cited more at length, this failure of the bidder then presented the alternative of an abandonment of this important route or the employment of temporary service until a contract could be secured, under a new advertisement, for the remaining portion of the regular contract-term. A proper regard for the interests of the people who were dependent upon it for their postal facilities forbade the former, and the Department, through the postmaster at the head of the route, made the necessary arrangement for the continuance of the service by the former contractor, temporarily, for six times a week, by a schedule of forty-eight hours running-time, at the rate of $34,296 per annum; being the same rate of compensation at which the contract had been awarded at the letting, under the advertisement of October 31, 1866, and at which the contractor had carried the mail during the preceding contract-term of four years.

The route was immediately re-advertised, with the same notice to bidders as under advertisement of September 30, 1870, and with similar service prescribed. At this letting twenty-three bids were received, varying from $32,193 to $2,773 per annum, viz :

F. P. Sawyer	$32,193	Adam E. Smith.....	$18,000
D. D. Searle	29,000	Delos T. Parker	17,500
Bradley Barlow	29,000	Andrew J. Wheeler	16,000
A. W. Harman	29,000	J. W. Parker	15,500
Adam E. Smith.....	29,000	Henry Tisdale	14,750
C. M. Lockwood	24,400	C. T. Brown.....	13,900
C. C. Huntley	24,333	C. M. Lockwood	11,900
Charles D. Woolworth	23,750	L. T. Anderson	11,000
J. C. Pritchard	22,800	W. N. A. Norton.....	9,865
Ulysses E. Fisher	22,337	P. J. Garrett	5,373
Thomas Marcum.....	20,000	J. C. Murdock.....	2,773
M. M. Long.....	19,000

The bid of J. C. Murdock was in due and proper form, with William H. Suter and S. S. Pleasants as guarantors, and had attached the certificate of H. C. Bingham, postmaster at Talladega, Ala., certifying, under his oath of office, that he was acquainted with the above-named guarantors, and knew them to be men of property and able to make good their guarantee, and that the bidder and guarantors were above the age of twenty-one years. This being entirely regular in every respect and properly certified as prescribed by law, and being the lowest offered, was accepted by the Department.

On the 3d January, 1872, the postmaster at Fort Gibson Court-House reported that the accepted bidder, J. C. Murdock, not having made his appearance and not having been heard from, he had continued to deliver the mail to the old contractor, F. P. Sawyer, on route 7587, from that place to Sherman, Tex. This action was approved by the Department, the route having been ordered to be again advertised, and the temporary service was continued at the same rate.

The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad having been extended forty miles, the route was curtailed April 1, 1872, to begin at Micco, and a pro-rata reduction of $6,992 per annum was made from the contractor's pay.

Under this advertisement 18 bids were received, the highest being for $29,000 and the lowest $3,400.

The Postmaster-General having discovered that the names of the postmasters appearing upon the certificates annexed to the proposals of the lowest bidder, William White, and of the next lowest bidder, E. G. Butts, were forgeries, and put there without their consent, accepted the next lowest bidder, and he having also failed to enter into contract, the Department then proceeded, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 27, 1872, (Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 56, section 5,) to offer the contract for the service to the next lowest bidder who would enter into such contract, sending a notice to each one of the several bidders at said letting. To this notice no one responded but F. P. Sawyer, who agreed to accept the service and enter into contract at the price stated in his bid, and it was accordingly awarded to him at the sum of $23,314 per annum, being the pro rata of his bid of $29,000, after deducting the forty miles curtailment of the route before referred to.

On the first of October, 1872, the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad having been farther extended, the length of the route was diminished 78 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles, and a pro-rata reduction of \$11,127 per annum was made from the contract-price. On the 11th January, 1873, a further diminution of 76 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles was made in the distance and a corresponding reduction of \$10,774 in the contractor's pay, and on the 3d of May, 1873, a through-line of railway having been completed, the whole service upon this route was discontinued, and the contract annulled.

The facts and proceedings relating to the lettings of the other routes specified in the preamble, and the employment of the temporary service rendered necessary by the failure of bidders to enter into contract and perform the service, are substantially the same, and furnish a fair illustration of some, at least, of the annoyances and difficulties to which the Post-Office Department was constantly exposed under the system of "straw-bidding" to which it was subjected.

The present Postmaster-General has, since he assumed the administration of the affairs of the Post-Office Department, frequently called the attention of Congress to these irregularities and abuses, recommending from time to time such legislation as was suggested by the experience of the Department, for the purpose of preventing, if possible, their continuance and repetition, and, so far as your committee have been able to discover, after a very full and careful investigation, they believe he has, with an energy and industry worthy of special commendation, faithfully striven to protect the Government from serious losses, which would otherwise have been sustained in consequence of these unlawful combinations and illegal practices.

Under this advertisement of 2,414 routes, at least 20,000 bids were received and examined, and as soon as it became manifest that the lowest bidders upon a number of them, including all of those embraced by Mr. Stone in his charges, would fail to enter into the contract, which was directed to be executed prior to the 1st day of July, 1871, the Postmaster-General at once proceeded to lay all the facts before the Attorney-General of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining his opinion as to the true interpretation of the laws bearing upon the subject, and of being officially advised as to the proper course for the Department to pursue under the circumstances for the protection of the interests of the United States and the rights of honest, bona-fide bidders.

In reply to the communication of the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General submitted the following opinion:

Opinion of Hon. A. T. Akerman, Attorney-General, under date of the 22d July, 1871, in answer to the Postmaster-General's letter of the 19th of the same month.

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, July 22, 1871.

"SIR: Your letter of the 19th instant, after stating the difficulties which have arisen in your Department in consequence of fictitious or 'straw' bids for contracts for carrying the mails, propounds to me certain questions, as follows:

"First. Is the Postmaster-General authorized to make any contracts for the conveyance of mails, other than for temporary service, except under or in pursuance of bids received, after inviting them by advertisement; or, more particularly, if the lowest bidder at an "annual letting" fails to enter into contract and perform service, can the Postmaster-General legally contract with the next lowest bidder who will agree to perform the service at his bid for the whole term, without re-advertising; or, is it lawful, after once advertising and failing to secure a contractor, to contract with a party who has not been a bidder on a proposition informally submitted, for the contract term'?

"When an accepted bidder fails to enter into an obligation with sufficient sureties for the performance of the service, the 27th section of the act of July 2, 1836, (5 U. S. Stat., 86,) requires the Postmaster-General 'to contract with some other person or persons for the performance of the service.'

"What authority has the Postmaster-General in contracting under such circumstances? Three answers have been suggested: first, that he must contract with the next lowest bidder; second, that he has an unlimited discretion as to the contractor and the terms; third, that he must advertise anew, and award the contract to the lowest bidder under the new advertisement.

"The act of July 2, 1836, section 24, (5 U. S. Stat., 86,) and the act of March 3, 1845, section 18, (5 U. S. Stat., 738,) gives the contract to the lowest bidder. No statute authorizes an alternative acceptance of the next lowest or of any other bid. The contract is offered to the lowest bidder. The bids are tendered for acceptance only in the event that they shall prove to be the lowest, and by the acceptance of one as the lowest the others are discharged. Thenceforth the law looks only to the successful bidder, and while it holds him and his guarantors responsible for his failure to complete the contract for the performance of the service, (act of March 3, 1825, section 44, 4 U. S. Stat., p. 114; act of July 2, 1836, section 27, 5 U. S. Stat., p. 86,) it does not hold the other bidders in waiting to supply his default. These others have no further claim upon the Government, and the Government has no further claim upon them.

"The construction that gives to the Postmaster-General an unlimited discretion upon the failure of the accepted bidder to complete the contract leaves in operation much of the mischief which the laws on the subject of advertisements and bids were designed to suppress. It was the policy of those statutes to subject the Postmaster-General to a rigid rule in the matter of contracts for the carrying of the mail; and that policy is practically overturned if a single fictitious bid remits the contract to his discretion.

"An unqualified direction that he shall contract must be taken to signify that he shall contract according to the general rule of mail-contracts, to wit, after advertisement and with the lowest bidder, (act of March 3, 1825, section 10, 4 U. S. Stat., 104.) The 23d section of the act of July 2, 1836, (5 U. S. Stat., 85,) especially provides for advertisement whenever it becomes necessary 'to enter into a contract for the transportation of the mail at any other time than the annual letting,' (temporary contracts alone excepted,) a provision which seems to have been contrived for such cases as that now under consideration. From an early period the law has required advertisements for mail-contracts. (See act of February 20, 1792, section 6, 1 U. S. Stat., 234; act of May 8, 1794, section 6, ibid., p. 358; act of April 30, 1810, section 8, 2 U. S. Stat., 595, and the acts above cited.) The object is manifest—to get for the Government the benefit of competition. From necessity an exception is allowed in the case of temporary contracts, (act of July 2, 1836, sec. 23;) but a construction which admits the fewest exceptions, and leaves the least to the discretion of the Postmaster General, is most in accordance with the general policy of the law.

"I am thus brought to the third of the suggested answers, and adopt it as the most conformable, both to the letter and to the general policy of the law. The most plausible objection to it is that it exposes the Department to the vexation of a second fictitious bid. But I do not feel authorized to reject a conclusion, otherwise satisfactory, for the reason that it places a second effort to effect the contract in the same danger as the first.

"On account of the loss of time in the first effort, the second offer of the contract must frequently be for less than a full term, and it could not have been the intention of Congress to guard the less by precautions not thrown around the greater. The failing bidder and his guarantors are made liable for the whole difference between his bid and the amount for which, on his failure, the Postmaster-General contracts, (act of July 2, 1836, section 27.) It is not probable that Congress intended that the amount of this liability should depend on the mere discretion of the Postmaster-General.

"There would be no inconvenience under present legislation if the Department could make sure of the responsibility of the guarantors; but I am informed that no precautions yet devised have been found effectual to this end. Congress can easily provide a remedy; and until that shall be done, I see no way to protect the Department from any occasional imposition through fictitious bids.

"Hence, by way of specific answers to your questions, I am of opinion that you are not authorized to make any contracts for the conveyance of mails, other than for 'temporary' service, except under or in pursuance of bids received after inviting them by advertisement. If the lowest bidder at an 'annual letting' fails to enter into contract and perform service, you cannot legally contract with the next lowest bidder who will agree to perform the service at his bid for the whole term without re-advertising. It is not lawful after once advertising and failing to secure a contractor to contract with a party who has not been a bidder on a proposition informally submitted for the contract term.

"Your letter also contains the following inquiries:

"Second. What meaning is to be attached to the word 'temporary,' as used in the proviso to the twenty-third section of the act of July 2, 1836? Can it be made to authorize a period of one year, so as to terminate a contract at the next annual letting; or is it limited to the time actually necessary to advertise—four weeks—and go through the process of opening, deciding, and awarding, as detailed in the law?

"I am of the opinion that, except in the case hereinafter mentioned, this word should not be construed to authorize a discretionary contract for a term extending beyond the time when the next annual letting will take effect, but that the Postmaster-General has a discretion within that limit to advertise immediately or to wait until the time for the usual annual advertisement. The exception to this rule is when the exigency arises too late in the contract year for the advertisement and letting to be completed before the beginning of the next year, in which case the right to make temporary contracts extends through the succeeding year.

"This word must be construed not merely with reference to the class of cases which has occasioned your present call for an opinion, but in reference to any other case of an interruption in the regular mail-service for which a temporary contract must provide. For illustration, in the accidents to which mail-service is liable, an interruption might occur six weeks before the time when the new regular contracts would take effect. Four weeks would be required for advertisement. Congress could not have intended to subject the Postmaster-General to the necessity, in such a case, of increasing the expense of advertising for a service merely of two weeks, and for so brief a service it is not likely that advertisement would produce bids advantageous to the Government.

"When, however, the occasion for a temporary contract arises so long before the annual letting as to justify the expense of advertising, and to make it probable that a saving to the Government would be effected by inviting bids, the Postmaster-General would, no doubt, feel disposed to conform as closely as possible to the general policy of the law, which is, that mail-service shall be generally performed by the person who will be found to do it for the least money, after public advertisement.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"A. T. AKERMAN,
"Attorney-General.

"Hon. J. A. J. CRESWELL,
"Postmaster-General."

Under this interpretation of the law as it then stood it will be seen that but little if anything was left to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. He had no authority to disregard the rule thus defined, nor to accept any other bid upon the list in place of the failing bidder, and his plain duty was to execute the law as he found it. That he and his assistants in the Department made every effort within the scope of their authority to detect and prevent fraudulent bidding, and that they honestly endeavored to perform their whole duty faithfully and in the best interests of the Government, the evidence taken in this investigation leaves no room to doubt. And while the prices paid for temporary service, in some of the cases in which it became necessary to employ it, were higher than a portion of the lowest, and probably irresponsible, bids for the regular service of four years upon the same route, yet the testimony proved very conclusively that the temporary contract—the only one the Postmaster-General was then authorized to make—was uniformly given to the lowest bidder for that kind of service, and that in no case was it awarded at a price in excess of what was believed to be a fair and reasonable compensation for such service.

In his annual report of 1871, extended reference was also made by the Postmaster-General to the fictitious bids received under the advertisement of September 30, 1870, upon these and other routes, and several amendments to the postal laws were suggested for the purpose of securing a fair competition among responsible parties who would be willing and able to perform the required service for a fair price. The act of Congress of April 27, 1872, before referred to, and the act of June 8, 1872, "to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," which followed soon after, contained important and salutary changes in the law upon that subject, and were intended to reform the abuses then known to exist. But further examination, aided by the light of more recent experience, has shown that a proper regard for the interests of the Government imperatively demand some additional protection for the Post-Office Department against the fraudulent practices and ingenious devices of men who, encouraged by past success, may again be disposed to combine and confederate together for the purpose of preventing competition and of defeating honest bidding at the regular lettings of mail-contracts, and your committee have therefore devoted much of their time, since the commencement of the session, to the examination of the subject and the consideration of measures designed to effect that most desirable object.

The bill which they had the honor to report, and which was unanimously passed by the House on the 6th instant, will, it is believed, if it should become a law, place in the hands of the Department the power to protect the Government from these frauds in the future, and will render the successful repetition of such disgraceful irregularities and combinations among bidders as have been practiced in the past, absolutely impossible.

The following is the bill at length:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 5, 1874.

Read twice, recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported the following bill:

A BILL to amend sections two hundred and forty-five, two hundred and forty-six, two hundred and forty-seven, and two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section two hundred and forty-five, section two hundred and forty-six, section two hundred and forty-seven, and section two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled 'An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department,' approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder with sureties approved by a postmaster, and, in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds five thousand dollars, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and further that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted.

"SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever.

"SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly or without the exercise of due diligence approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

"SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per centum on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of new or modified service, not less than five per centum of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds five thousand dollars. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder. And if any regular contractor for the transmission of the mail upon any route shall fail or refuse to perform such service, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service at such regular letting, who will enter into contract and perform the same, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high; and in case such next lowest bidder shall refuse to enter into contract and perform the same, the Postmaster-General may then award such service and enter into contract with any other person or persons who will duly enter into contract and perform the same at a price not exceeding that bid by such next lowest bidder. And in case of failure thus to secure a contract and the performance of such service as required by law, the Postmaster-General shall proceed in like manner, as soon as practicable, to offer the same to the several bidders at such letting, and also to all other persons competent to contract, at a price not exceeding the prices and sums bid at such letting, in the order of such bids, commencing at the next lowest bid and going up the said list of bids upon such route, unless he shall consider all such bids too high, until he shall secure a proper contract and the satisfactory performance of such service, preferring and giving to each of such bidders, respectively, the right, within such time as the Postmaster-General may designate, to accept such service, and enter into contract for the performance thereof at his or their original bid: Provided, however, That whenever a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service under the last preceding regular contract thereon."

In the opinion of your committee, the charge of irregularities in making payments to mail-contractors between December 31, 1873, and January 10, 1874, for services rendered for the quarter ended December 31, 1873, is not sustained.

The uncontradicted evidence fully established the fact that no payments of money were made, in any instance, in advance of the service, nor until after the expiration of the quarter in which the work was done. As a matter of favor and convenience to the Department, but without any obligation resting upon them, the class of carriers referred to in this charge, upon the large through-routes, took for collection, without expense to the Government, the usual quarterly orders drawn on the postmasters upon or in the neighborhood of their routes, for the balances due from such offices for the preceding quarter, and afterward accounted for and were charged with all moneys thus collected by them, in the adjustment of their accounts at the end of the quarter.

Generally the drafts, which were for sums comparatively small, were given to the contractors, in the second month of the quarter, and were not collected until within a few days of the time of settlement. In some instances they were not collected, and were returned to the Department.

Section 264 of the Postal Regulations, adopted by the Department for the regulation of its own practice, and which it was alleged had been violated, by the prompt payment of the amounts due these contractors at maturity, provides that "payments will be made by collections from or drafts on postmasters, or otherwise, after the expiration of each quarter, say in May, August, November, and February."

Under the act of Congress the compensation fixed for the transportation of the mails falls due, when the service has been properly performed, at the close of each post-office quarter, and is payable as soon as in the regular course of business the accounts can be properly adjusted. And it is, in the opinion of this committee, highly creditable to the officers of the Department, as well as to those of the Sixth Auditor's Office, having this business in charge, that in the cases referred to they were in readiness to discharge their obligations at maturity, and did not need the indulgence which a less efficient performance of their duties might have compelled them to ask under the section of the "regulations" just cited.

The remaining charges, which were evidently based upon a misapprehension of the facts, and a misconstruction of the papers, designated in the preamble as "manuscript abstracts or reports No. 4 and No. 5," were not pressed in the investigation before the committee, and were certainly not supported by the evidence.

Believing, therefore, that (while these combinations for straw-bidding have frequently been entered into by outside parties) the alleged abuses and irregularities have not existed, and do not exist, in the Post-Office Department, as charged in the preamble and resolution referred to them, and being of the opinion, after a very thorough examination of the whole question, that the charges against the officers of that Department have not been sustained, your committee respectfully recommend that the preamble and resolution be laid upon the table, and ask that they may be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

MAIL-CONTRACTS.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted a report in regard to mail-contracts and temporary service ; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 22, 1874.

MANAGEMENT OF POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. STOWELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, presented a report in writing on the management of the Post-Office Department ; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

[Forty-third Congress, first session, House of Representatives.—Report No. 783.]

MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

JUNE 22, 1874.—Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STOWELL, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted the following report :

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads respectfully report :

That Hon. J. K. Luttrell having made many general charges and allegations against the Post-Office Department, he was requested to submit his complaints to writing, in order to see if they were worthy of formal investigation, and on April 20, 1874, he referred the following complaint to your committee, with a request for its examination :

“ HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
“ Washington, D. C., April 20, 1874.

“ SIR: In accordance with the request of your honorable committee, that I prepare and present specific charges in relation to alleged irregularities and abuses believed to exist in the matter of mail-contracts, and the payment of contractors, I have the honor to submit the following :

“ 1st. I charge that Bradley Barlow, C. C. Huntley, Owen Miller, J. W. Parker, S. S. Huntley, J. L. Saunderson, F. P. Sawyer, B. H. Peterson, Gilmer & Salisbury, and others, were paid in advance of services rendered, and in direct violation of sections 264 and 508 of the Postal Laws of the United States.

“ 2d. I charge that the accounts of the above-named parties were settled in the Office of the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury in an irregular manner, without proper evidence that service had been rendered, and upon certificates issued by the post-office Department that said parties had performed the required service ; said certificates being false.

“ 3d. I charge that contractors have received full pay where no service was rendered, upon fraudulent certificates now on file in the Post-Office Department certifying that service has been performed regularly upon routes which have been rendered impassable.

ble by heavy snow-storms, and that the records of the post-office will show that where complaints have been made by postmasters of the failure of contractors to properly carry and deliver the mails, the postmasters have in several instances been removed, and their offices discontinued.

"4th. I charge that mail-contracts are made with irresponsible bidders, who cannot give bonds for the performance of such contracts, and who are the agents of a combination formed to defraud the Government, and that said combination consists of Bradley Barlow, F. P. Sawyer, C. C. Huntley, B. H. Peterson, and others, known as the Northwestern Stage Company, with whom contracts were made (and are now in force) after the regular letting of 1870 failed to obtain service, and that said parties, Bradley Barlow, F. P. Sawyer, C. C. Huntley, B. H. Peterson, and others, have offered and given a consideration to bidders on routes controlled by them to withdraw their contracts, or fail to execute them, in order that the service might fall into the hands of the parties above named. All of which is in direct violation of section 250 of the Postal Laws of the United States.

"5th. I charge that said parties control, among other routes, the route from Kelton, Utah, to Dalles, Oreg., for which they receive pay amounting to $229,000 per annum; the route from Winnemucca, Nev., to Boise City, Idaho, for which they receive pay amounting to $77,000 per annum; the route from Oroville, Cal., to Portland, Oreg., for which they receive pay amounting to $—— per annum; and that while this combination controlled the whole of this latter route (which is now somewhat curtailed by the extension of the railroad) the mail was carried by the railroad company, part of the distance at the expense of the stage company, and that the amount paid the stage company was greatly in excess of the amount the law would have allowed the railroad company for the same service.

"6th. I charge that in the summer of 1872, and in direct violation of section 26, Postal Laws of the United States, a large sum was allowed the stage company for increased speed in carrying the mail on the route from Oroville, Cal., to Portland, Oreg., said mail having been partly carried by the railroad company, thus shortening the schedule-time.

"7th. I charge that C. C. Huntley, who is a stage-contractor, was a bidder on the steamboat-route No. 6413, from New Orleans, La., to Key West, Fla., on which the pay is $76,000 per annum, and although not the contractor, and not owning any interest in the steamboat carrying the mail, he receives 8 per cent. of the pay.

"Papers on file with the Auditor of the Treasury, and pay drawn quarterly through the banking-house of Lewis Johnson & Co., of Washington, D. C.

"All of which is in direct violation of section 264 of the Postal Laws of the United States.

"8th. I charge that contracts were awarded to straw-bidders on most of the steamboat-routes in Louisiana; that temporary contracts were made July 1, 1871, with B. H. Peterson, and since renewed, on which he receives over $100,000 per annum, and that he is not the master or owner of any steamboats, but employs parties to carry the mails on routes he has control of, who were bidders on those routes, and who were paid a consideration to withdraw their bids.

"9th. I charge that F. P. Sawyer controls nearly all the valuable routes in the State of Texas, having bought off reliable bidders on those routes, and given to such bidders drafts against his mail-pay, which have been negotiated through Washington bankers and paid quarterly by the Auditor, and that drafts against F. P. Sawyer's mail-pay, given to C. M. Lockwood, a bidder on one of Sawyer's largest mail-routes in Texas, were negotiated and paid through the First National Bank of Washington, D. C.

"10th. I charge that most of the routes controlled by Bradley Barlow & Co. are sublet, in direct violation of section 271, Postal Laws of the United States.

"11th. I charge that the records of the Post-Office Department and Auditor's Office of the Treasury will show that many of the contracts held by Bradley Barlow, C. C. Huntley, Owen Miller, J. W. Parker, S. S. Huntley, F. P. Sawyer, B. H. Peterson, Gilmer & Salisbury, and others, were made with other parties, and that the contracts are controlled by them as agents or attorneys.

"12th. I charge that on post-routes from Walla Walla to Missoula, (453 miles,) supplying Stevensville and Fort Owens by a side-supply, a contract was ordered with S. S. Blake, at $15,100 per annum; that Blake failed to execute his contract, and that a contract was made with C. C. Huntley, at $22,900 per annum from July 1, 1870; that on July 29, 1870, an additional trip was ordered on side-supply, increasing the pay $2,200 per annum. On August, 23, 1870, the service was extended on side-supply to Gird's Creek, (45 miles,) increasing the pay $4,550 per annum. On December 22, 1870, two additional trips were ordered on the whole route, increasing the pay $41,754 per annum, making the total pay received per annum by C. C. Huntley $71,404.

"13th. I charge that the post-office at Gird's Creek (on side-supply ordered August 23, 1870) was discontinued December 19, 1871, and has not been re-established, and that C. C. Huntley received the pay ($4,550) on this discontinued route in violation of law, and for services which he does not render by reason of such discontinuance.

"14th. I charge that gross irregularities exist in the letting out of mail-contracts for mail-service from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1873, and from July 1 to June 30, 1875, on mail-routes 7587, 7590, 7592, 7647, 8553, 8536, 8537, 8538, 8539, 8540, 8549, 8550, 8557, 8571, 8572, 8575, 8577, 8590, 8603, 8619, 8620, 8642, and 8646; that the aggregate bids for these mail-routes amount to $48,490 per annum; that the lowest bidders failed to execute contracts, and that contracts were made with one F. P. Sawyer, of Washington, D. C., amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $439,469; that upon mail-routes 7524, 7612, and 7613, the bids amount to $2,350.01, and contracts were made with one Chidester for the sum of $14,522; that upon mail-routes 8006, 8007, 8010, 8013, and 8014, the bids amount to $25,700; and contracts were made with one Peterson, aggregating the sum of $101,500; that upon mail-routes 7603, 7604, and 7605 the bids amount to $3,892, and contracts were made with one Vaile for the sum of $14,100; that upon mail-routes 8082 and 8083, the bids amount to $1,995, and contracts were made with one Davis for $16,050; that the bids upon mail-routes 7596, 7595, 7523, 7524, 7506, 6631, and 14486 aggregate the sum of $26,395, and that contracts were made with sundry persons named therein amounting to $102,549; that the bids for service on these several routes amount in the aggregate to $108,822.01, and that contracts were made for this service amounting to the sum of $688,190, in direct violation of the Postal Laws and Regulations of the United States.

"15th. I charge that on the mail-routes established or ordered during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, other than those let to the contractors at the annual lettings, the aggregate of the bids for mail-service, on routes Nos. 7590, 7592, 8642, 8646, and 10843 amounts to $8,597.74, and that contracts were made with one Sawyer for $40,381.50; that the bids for mail-service on mail-routes Nos. 6061, 6648, 6791, 7522, 7524, 7525, 7648, 7594, 7603, 8082, 8526, 10843, 14935, and 14905, amount to $22,298, and that contracts were awarded to sundry persons for the sum of $93,651; that the aggregate bids for the mail-service on the foregoing routes amount to $40,440.49, and that contracts were made for this service for the sum of $177,030.50, in direct violation of the Postal Laws and Regulations of the United States.

"16th. I charge that service on mail-route No. 8031 was for twice a week at an annual sum of $3,900; that service was expedited to six miles an hour and one additional trip per week, for which the contract-price was increased $12,918.13; that the service on mail-route No. 8067 was for twice a week at an annual sum of $5,980; that the service was expedited to five miles an hour, for which an additional sum of $7,840.45 is paid, all of which is in direct violation of section 26 Postal Laws and Regulations of the United States.

"In connection with charges above submitted, I present the following statement, taken from the postal reports, showing some of the special lettings made with Sawyer, Chidester, Peterson, and others:

"17th. I charge that Barlow, Sanderson & Co. receive some $15,000 for carrying the mail between Callahan's Ranch and Shasta, in the State of California, and that they fail to connect with Trinity Centre on the line of said route and a distance of thirty-two miles from Callahan's Ranch, and that letters sent from Callahan's Ranch to Trinity Centre, and vice versa, are compelled to be carried over a circuit of two hundred and fifty miles in order to reach either of those places, and that said parties are paid for deliveries at Callahan's Ranch and Trinity Centre, when no such deliveries are made for months at a time.

"18th. I charge that Bradley Barlow, C. C. Huntley, Owen Fuller, J. L. Sanderson, J. W. Parker, Gilmer & Salisbury, and others acting together, control over one million dollars of the amount paid by the Post-Office Department in the Territories for mail transportation; that nearly every route on which they are contractors has had the service increased since their contracts were made in 1870, with a corresponding increase of compensation; that most of their routes are sublet at about one-third of the amount they receive under their contract, and that their accounts are marked special, and settled as soon as the quarters close, without waiting for the certificates required from most contractors, that the services have been properly performed, or for the collections made from postmasters on their routes.

"I desire, in connection with the above charge, to present the following statements, showing the extent of territory covered by the contracts of Barlow & Co., and the amount paid to them for carrying the mails:

"In conclusion, I desire to say that I do not present these charges from any partisan motives, but simply that fraud may be prevented, and a check put to the operations of a combination formed to swindle the Government of millions of dollars, and I am assured by the Postmaster-General that he will use every effort to break up the combination.

"I am satisfied that a thorough investigation will unearth a most gigantic fraud, and show to your honorable committee that such a combination exists, and is aided and abetted by irresponsible postmasters, who approve utterly worthless bonds in order to secure contracts for this combination. I present herewith the names of witnesses whom I desire called to establish the truth of the charges contained herein. All of which is respectfully submitted.

"J. K. LUTTRELL,

"Member of Congress 3d District of California.

"Hon. JOHN B. PACKER,

"Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads."

No names of witnesses given with this.

U. H. PAINTER,
Clerk.

On the 24th April, 1874, a notice was served upon Mr. Luttrell to furnish the names of witnesses, their residence, present whereabouts, and what he could prove by each witness. In the mean time the charges were published in the public prints throughout the country, by the procurement of Mr. Luttrell or some one else other than the committee. The names of witnesses, &c., were not furnished by Mr. Luttrell, and on the 10th June similar notice was served upon him, requesting him to answer it as soon as possible, and give the names of witnesses, and a brief statement of what he desired to prove by each one; and on the 11th June, instant, he filed with the committee the following paper:

"WASHINGTON, June 9, 1874.

"SIR: I have an abundance of testimony at hand preparatory to an investigation into the charges made by me some time since in relation to the letting of contracts and mail-service of the Government.

"I propose to prove, by Mr. C. Evarts, Mr. Underwood, and Mr. C. Moore, that gross frauds were perpetrated by C. C. Huntley and others, and certain officers of the Government, in the mail-contract from Missoula to Walla Walla; that an increase of service was made on that route in entire opposition to the recommendation of the principal postmaster, and that said increase was made when but two letters and two newspapers had passed over the route in an entire quarter.

"I will further prove by J. E. Barrow that he was an accepted bidder on a certain route, and that he was paid money by Bradley Barlow on condition that he (Barrow) should fail to execute his contract.

"I will further prove by Hon. John McBride, James E. Carr, Colonel Hooker, Hill Beachy, and others, that gross frauds have been perpetrated in California and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Montana, by Bradley Barlow and others.

"I will further prove by J. D. Hicox that gross frauds have been perpetrated in Nevada.

"I will further prove by Hon. J. M. Cavanaugh and Hon. — Clark that gross frauds have been committed by Barlow, Huntley, and others in Texas, Arkansas, Montana, and Idaho; and I will also prove by the same witnesses many other facts tending to show a combination on the part of Huntley, Barlow, and others to defraud the Government, and would request that the witnesses herein named be subpoenaed to give testimony before your honorable committee.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

"J. K. LUTTRELL,
"M. C. Third District, Cal.

"Hon. JOHN B. PACKER,

"Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

"Mr. C. Moore resides at Walla Walla, Wash.

"Mr. — Underwood resides at Portland, Oreg.

"Mr. T. C. Evarts resides at Washington, D. C.

"Mr. J. E. Barrow resides at New York City, N. Y.

"Hon. John McBride, Fort Jones, Cal.

"J. E. Carr, Trinity, Cal.

"Hon. W. T. Clark, Metropolitan Hotel, Washington, D. C.

"Hon. J. M. Cavanaugh, Arlington Hotel, Washington, D. C.

"J. D. Hicox, Pioche, Nev.

"J. K. LUTTRELL."

A subcommittee was then appointed to examine records of the Post-Office Department, to see whether they afforded evidence of fraud, irregularities, or violation of law in cases specified in said charges, and make report to the committee; which subcommittee, having made examination, reported to the committee as follows:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"Washington, D. C., June 16, 1874.

"To the chairman and members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, House of Representatives:

"The undersigned subcommittee appointed to examine the records of the Post-Office Department, to see whether they furnish evidence of fraud, irregularities, or violation of laws, as specified in charges made and filed with the committee by Hon. J. K. Luttrell, beg leave to report that they have examined as to routes and matters specified in said charges, except as to certain routes and matters which are included in charges preferred by Hon. William H. Stone, heretofore examined by the committee, and that we do not find therein any evidence of fraud, irregularities, or violations of law, although we are satisfied that upon many, if not all of said routes, straw-bids were made, which, under the law, the Postmaster-General was powerless to reject, and for the prevention of which legislation was had during the Forty-second Congress, and to perfect which the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have proposed legislation during the present session of Congress.

"J. G. CANNON.
"J. D. C. ATKINS.
"STEPHEN A. COBB."

Which report was received and adopted by the committee. In the mean time Mr Luttrell was personally examined by the committee.

The committee do not find evidence of fraud, irregularities, or violation of laws, as specified in said charges, from the records of the Post-Office Department. On the contrary, such records show a compliance with the law upon the part of those administering it in cases specified in charges. As to said charges, so far as they relate to combinations to defraud the Government by a system of straw-bidding in the letting of contracts to carry the mails, Mr. Luttrell states (of the truth of which the committee are satisfied) that he believes the Postmaster-General has been and is doing all he can to break up and punish such straw-bidding, and that he is a vigilant and efficient officer, and that straw-bidding has been carried on for years; indeed, the Postmaster-General for years has been calling the attention of Congress to the same, and recommended legislation under which it could be prevented; that legislation was had for that purpose during the Forty-second Congress, and this committee have again carefully considered as to what additional legislation is needed in the premises, and have recommended the same by reporting a bill which has passed the House; so the committee do not feel called upon to ask for authority from the House to send for witnesses to distant portions of the country, at great expense, to further establish that which is, and was long before the commencement of this Congress, matter of public notoriety, conceded by all.

As to the charges so far as they relate to employés of the Post-Office Department, the committee call attention to the fact that none of said employés are mentioned by name, nor are any of the alleged acts of fraud specifically set out. It also appears from the statement of Mr. Luttrell that, in making such charges, he is acting upon mere hearsay, and that he has not given the names of such employés or made a statement of their alleged misdoings to their superior officer, the Postmaster-General, and that he is not aware that his informants have done so.

If the fraudulent acting of employés were brought home to the Postmaster-General, and he were to connive at or negligently refuse to inquire as to the same, and remove the persons so acting, such failure would call for investigation and report by this or some other committee.

In the opinion of the committee, if frauds have been committed by employés of the Department, they should be reported to the Postmaster-General by parties having knowledge in the premises, who has full power of removal, and should also be prosecuted in the courts, where a full hearing could be had, and, if found guilty, would no doubt be punished, and not primarily investigated by one of the standing committees of the House. A primary investigation of alleged frauds upon the part of clerks in the Departments would turn the committees of the House, charged with originating and recommending legislation for the interest of the whole country, into mere voluntary detective organizations for the benefit and convenience of the heads of Departments, to be set in motion by any person who sees proper to make indefinite charges of fraud against subordinates in the Departments or elsewhere, not even disclosing their names; or by any one who could procure some member of Congress to make such charges upon their mere statement, whether caused by malice, disappointment, or a real desire to promote the public good.

For these reasons the committee do not feel called upon to make further investigation in the premises.

Mr. TYNER. My colleague on the committee of conference, the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. Marshall,) desires to be heard for a very short time. I have also promised to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Packer,) chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that we now adjourn, as it only lacks five minutes of the expiration of this legislative day.

Mr. TYNER. Very well.

And then, on the motion of Mr. Randall, at five minutes to eleven a. m., the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, June 22, 1874.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TYNER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 13 and 15.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 2 and 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the sixth amendment and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "library of the office of Assistant Attorney-General," and insert in lieu thereof the word "use;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the eighth amendment and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 1 of said Senate amendment, after "on" insert "and after the first of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-five;" and on line 4 of the House amendment to the said Senate amendment strike out the words "one cent and five mills" and insert "two cents;" and strike out all after "provided," in line 7, and insert "that nothing in this act shall be held to change or amend section ninety-nine of the act entitled 'An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department, approved

CVIII MANAGEMENT OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two," and in section 6, line 1, after "that" insert the words "on and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-five;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the twelfth amendment, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In the second amendment of the House to said amendment strike out "taken" and insert "made;" in line 31 of said Senate amendment strike out "one;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the fourteenth amendment and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 9 strike out "eight" and insert "six;" in line 33 strike out "eight" and insert "six;" in line 67 strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty;" in line 68 strike out "forty" and insert "fifty;" in line 69 strike out "thirty" and insert "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the sixteenth amendment and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 87 strike out the words "a letting under advertisement can take place," and insert in lieu thereof, "the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the seventeenth amendment and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Insert in lieu of said amendment the following:

That hereafter the postage on public documents mailed by any member of Congress, the President, or head of any Executive Department, shall be ten cents for each bound volume and on unbound documents the same rate as that on newspapers mailed from the known office of publication to regular subscribers, and the words "Public document" written or printed thereon, or on the wrapper thereof, and certified by the signature of any member of Congress, or by that of the President, or head of any Executive Department, shall be deemed sufficient certificate that the same is a public document, and the term "public document" is hereby defined to be all publications printed by order of Congress or either House thereof: Provided, That the postage on each copy of the daily Congressional Record mailed from the city of Washington as transient matter shall be one cent.

And the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES N. TYNER,

J. G. CANNON,

S. S. MARSHALL,

Managers on the part of the House.

WM. WINDOM,

WM. B. ALLISON,

H. G. DAVIS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. TYNER. I will demand the previous question on the adoption of the report unless some gentleman desires to ask questions in regard to it.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. TYNER. I desire to yield to my colleague on the conference committee from Illinois, [Mr. Marshall.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to offer a resolution in relation to the employment of soldiers in the Executive Departments, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. MARSHALL. I prefer to go on with my remarks now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts later on in the day.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, there is no such thing as perfect legislation upon earth. All legislation is the result of compromise. Mankind is fallible, and all the work of men partakes of their fallibility. The House and the Senate here at the end of the session have found themselves radically differing on some matters of legislation on the post-office appropriation bill. Conference committees have been appointed. Conference committees are only appointed for the purpose, if possible, of bringing the two houses together on matters on which they differ. If either house insists upon its position, standing on its own position and will not move, the adjustment of differences by this means is impossible.

If any gentleman asks me if I think the bill now reported by the conference committee is a perfect bill, I must answer most emphatically no. I think we ought to have better legislation than this furnishes for the protection of the Government against rings organized to plunder the Government in the contracts let for carrying the mails

But the Senate, governed doubtless by an honest purpose to correct these evils, differs with us as to the means to secure the end. But even if it were possible for Congress to pass a perfect law, unfortunately no law can execute itself. We are still compelled to rely to a great extent upon the efficiency and integrity of the Executive Departments of the Government. It is not to be assumed, at least there ought to be no cause even for suspicion, that the head of a great Department of the Government would at any time enter into collusion with organized plunderers to rob the Treasury. Be this as it may, we all know that there is no possible means of protecting the Treasury against raids made under the direction or connivance of corrupt or incapable public officials. We must perform our duty, and if the President and his appointees fail in theirs, we cannot be justly blamed therefor.

In reference to this mail-service, it is known that in regard to large contracts none but capitalists, or those who are able to command capital, can approach the Government for the purpose of obtaining contracts; and it is known that for years men have organized themselves for the purpose of obtaining, and have obtained from the Government, for the mail-service, double, treble, and even fourfold the value of the service they rendered. By these combinations, and it is generally believed by the connivance if not active co-operation of Government officials, the Treasury has year after year been robbed of millions of the people's money. The object of this proposed legislation is to protect the Government as far as possible from these organized plunderers. But, as I said before, a great deal must necessarily be left, in the execution of all laws of this kind, and their practical efficiency must depend upon the executive officers. I feel confident that this report, if adopted as the law of the land, furnishes additional guarantees to the people, and is on the whole better than the law we have had heretofore or have now. My colleagues on the conference committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Tyner,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Packard,] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cannon,] have from their official position here necessarily given more attention to and have much more knowledge in regard to the practical operations of the postal laws than I have. My colleague [Mr. Cannon] especially has devoted much time, labor, and practical ability to this subject, and did more I think than any other member toward perfecting the bill of the House thereon, and I have had the benefit of the judgment and superior information of these gentlemen as to the practical operation of existing laws and the effect of this proposed legislation. And I think it proper to add that every one of my colleagues on the conference committee acted loyally as the representatives of the views of the House, and for the purpose of effecting, if possible, a compromise which would retain all the conservative principles of the bill as it passed the House. And it was only after various meetings of the committee that the House conferees found it necessary, for the purpose of getting this legislation which we must pass in some form before we can go home, to yield or modify some of their own views in regard to some of the points in controversy.

It was the opinion of every member who had given any attention to the subject that the bill now before the House, although far from perfect, although not precisely what we want, is a great improvement upon existing law. We rarely, if ever, in legislation get precisely what we would prefer. If this is an improvement on existing law, why not pass it? If it is not, if it furnishes additional means to the robbers and plunderers who are seeking to get the money of the Government without giving an adequate return for it, then vote it down. But it is conceded, I believe, on all hands that the proposed legislation is an improvement upon existing law. If it is executed by the head of the Post-Office Department loyally in the interest of the Government, and with a determination not to permit the Government to be plundered by these organized bands, it will to a very great extent effect the object we all have in view. And, as I have heretofore said, we are compelled to rely to a great extent upon the ability and integrity of our executive officers. There is no possible escape from this dilemma.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I understand that the conferees on the part of the House have also yielded to the amendment of the Senate which emasculated the House bill that we passed some time back, relative to the letting of contracts, and that, as it now stands, the Postmaster-General, in making contracts for temporary service or regular service in case of the failure of the original contractors, is confined to the list of bidders bidding in the first instance, instead of being permitted, as he was allowed to do by the original bill which left the House, to let it to the bidders in the first instance and afterward to go to all the world, provided they would take it at the same price, without the necessity of an additional advertisement.

Mr. TYNER. In response to that I will say that the bill which the House sent to the Senate required that the bids for contracts in the Post-Office Department should be accompanied by bonds. It was designed to break up the vicious system of what is known as straw-bidding. This provision was materially amended by the Senate, who ingrafted in this appropriation bill, as a part and parcel of it, a provision which was entirely different from that originally passed by the House. The legislation adopted by the conference committee entirely defeats the legislation originally provided by the House. I have no hesitation in saying that the House bill upon this subject was decidedly better than that which is here proposed. I desire further to say in this connection that as one of the conferees on the part of the House I would not have agreed at all to the amendments of the Senate if I had not believed that it was a slight improvement on the present law.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Then I understand by the reply of the gentleman from Indiana that the bill is emasculated as I stated. And I wish to put it on record as a fact that it is in my judgment the triumph of the contractors again in the Post-Office Department by reason of this pernicious system of legislation of attaching laws to the appropriation bills.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TYNER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ELDREDGE. As I understand it the report of the committee of conference leaves the law as it existed before any amendment was made. It allows the Government to be cheated by this class of bidders known as straw-bidders. Instead of protecting the Government against these bids, these rings and combinations, the Postmaster-General is allowed to give out contracts to any one he pleases, even though no bid be made.

Mr. TYNER. I will answer that point. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin has taken a little too broad a view in regard to what is accomplished by the report. The law as it now stands provides that any party making a bid for the transportation of the mails shall send in a written statement signed by one or more persons that he will faithfully perform his contract; but this bill provides that at the time a proposed contractor files his bid he shall also file his bond signed by securities who must first take an oath that they have real estate of more than double the value of the amount involved.

Mr. ELDREDGE. What is the penalty attached to such bond?

Mr. TYNER. The penalty is the liquidated damages on the amount of the bond.

Mr. ELDREDGE. What is the amount of the bond that the bidder is required to be responsible for in fact?

Mr. TYNER. Such amount as the Postmaster-General may indicate in the advertisement for the proposals for the route.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does not the gentleman know that the old law required bonds; but does he know a single instance in which the penalty was recovered? Did he ever know a case in which forfeiture was made of the bonds of the defaulting contractors?

Mr. TYNER. I think the gentleman does not give to the conference report the full credit that it deserves. The law as provided for in this report is undoubtedly better than the law under which the Post-Office Department has hitherto given out contracts. I do not know a single instance under the old law where damages have been recovered on the bond of a defaulting contractor.

If the gentleman will listen to me I will state briefly all the provisions of the pending law as we propose to amend it. In the first place the bidder must file his bonds with the Postmaster-General, and if that bid exceeds the sum of $500,000 he must also file a certified check for the amount, with 5 per cent. interest. There are these two securities.

Then, in order to identify the sufficiency of the bond, the sureties and the bidders must take an oath that they own unincumbered real estate worth double the amount in value of the amount named in the bond. Then in addition to that still further, the postmaster, who approves the sufficiency of the bond, by the present law, in the event he shall knowingly approve a bond which he believes to be insufficient, or shall approve it without proper and due examination, is not only to be removed from office, but disqualified forever from holding a post-office. Then in addition to that the penalty imposed upon that postmaster, in the event of a prosecution and conviction, may be not less than $5,000, whereas under the present law it would not exceed the sum of $1,000.

Again, under the last law, under which only one single letting has been made, the Postmaster-General, when the accepted bidder failed to enter upon his contract, was authorized to go to the second bidder only. In the event the second bidder would not take the contract, then he was authorized to make a contract with outside parties for twelve months. This bill provides that after the first contractor fails the Postmaster-General shall go to the second if his bid be not too high, and if the second fails then he may go on up the list to the last bidder, and make a contract at any price that he does not consider too high. In the event that he cannot thus obtain a contractor, then he is authorized to let a temporary contract for a period not exceeding six months and at a price not above that of the last regular contract on that route.

Now, I submit to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldredge] that while this bill does not meet my views, while I believe I could frame a provision that would most effectually cut off straw-bidding, a provision which would tally precisely with the provisions of the bill sent by the House to the Senate, yet when we cannot get all we want, is it not wise to get all we can if it is better than what we now have?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I concede that it is wise to get the best that we can; there is no doubt about that. But the bill of the House, as I understood it, provided for the reletting of the contract by advertisement; it took away this discretion which has been vested in the Postmaster-General and which has been so much abused. I do not believe in leaving that discretion there. I do not say that the suggestion of the gentleman that the Postmaster-General has the right to go up the list and not let a contract at a higher price than contracts had been previously let is any protection whatever. We know very well that when the old contractor is on the ground, with his horses and wagons and his stock in general, he can keep everybody else from that route. It must be an actual letting under an advertisement or it will amount to nothing but straw; and straw-bidding will continue, in my judgment, in spite of all the things which the gentleman has suggested.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is very correct in his views that under the present law, in the event of the failure of the contractor to perform the conditions of his contract, the Postmaster-General then must let a temporary contract to the man who has stock on hand and is ready to go upon the route and perform the service. But the gentleman ought to remember that under the present law the Postmaster-General may make that temporary contract for twelve months, while the bill we are now considering provides that he shall not let it for more than six months, and shall not in that contract exceed the amount of the last regular contract on that route. I apprehend the gentleman from Wisconsin will see at once that this is a little advantage. It is not all we want; it is not what the gentleman wants; nor is it what any gentleman in this House wants who has honestly, carefully, and wisely considered the subject. We will, in my judgment, never get a law which is anything like right until we require the Postmaster-General, upon the failure of the accepted bidder, to go outside and contract with other parties.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to know what force there is operating in this House and in the Senate that prevents this wholesome provision which the gentleman himself says that we ought to have. I have no doubt of the sincerity of the gentleman. I believe he does sincerely want to guard against these frauds. But what power is there, secret or otherwise, which overcomes him in his efforts to get an honest provision of law to protect the Government? Is it in this House or around this House or in the Department? What power is there so mysterious as to balk all the efforts of this Congress to do what ought to be done?

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Wisconsin ought to know that I am not able to answer his question. I have been in this House for five years, during which time I have been more or less intimate with the affairs of the Post-Office Department as they come here. If there is a ring or a lobby or any other kind of influence about this House or the other House that prevents the passage of such bills as are necessary to protect the Government in this regard, I say to him frankly that I never saw them; I know nothing about them. No man has ever approached me on the subject; no man ever dared to.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not suppose the gentleman has ever been approached in that way. I hope he did not understand me as intimating any such thing.

Mr. TYNER. I do not.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not believe that the gentlemen can be approached. But there is some mysterious force at work so that when we find an almost unanimous opinion in Congress in favor of adopting such a provision as shall protect the Government, we cannot accomplish that purpose. I say that we should stay here till next August, nay, till the time for the next session to commence, before we should allow ourselves to be balked in our effort to provide against this crying evil.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I hope that this matter will be recommitted to the conference committee; and let us, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldredge] says, stay here, if need be, till the commencement of the next session in order to break up this combination to defraud the Government. I say that we should refuse to adjourn until this system of "straw-bidding" is broken up.

Mr. TYNER. The indignation of the gentlemen is all right; but we are getting now a law better than we have had.

House concurred in report.

[GENERAL NATURE—No. 90.]

AN ACT making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-five, and for other purposes.

* * * * *

SEC. 12. That section two hundred and forty-five, section two hundred and forty-six, section two hundred and forty-seven, section two hundred and fifty-one, and section two hundred and fifty-three of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department, approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds five thousand dollars, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route; to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and, further, that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service, according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages, to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted."

"SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever."

"SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder, or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly, or without the exercise of due diligence, approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both."

"SEC. 251. That after any regular bidder whose bid has been accepted shall fail to enter into contract for the transportation of the mails according to his proposal, or, having entered into contract, shall fail to commence the performance of the service stipulated in his or their contract as therein provided, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for the same service, who will enter into a contract for the performance thereof, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high, in which case he shall re-advertise such service. And if any bidder whose bid has been accepted, and who has entered into a contract to perform the service according to his proposal, and in pursuance of his contract has entered upon the performance of the service, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, shall subsequently fail or refuse to perform the service according to his contract, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service under the advertisement thereof, (unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high,) who will enter into contract and give bond, with sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster-General, for the faithful performance thereof, in the same penalty and with the same terms and conditions thereto annexed as were stated and contained in the bond which accompanied his bid; but in case each and every of the next lowest bidders for such service whose respective bids are not considered too high by the Postmaster-General shall refuse to enter into contract and give bond as herein required for the faithful performance of his contract, the Postmaster-General shall immediately advertise for proposals to perform the service on said route. Whenever an accepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law: Provided, however, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service during the last preceding regular contract-term. And in all cases of regular contracts hereafter made, the contract may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be continued in force beyond its express terms for a period not exceeding six months, until a new contract with the same, or other contractors, shall be made by the Postmaster-General."

"SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route

IN RELATION TO

MAIL CONTRACTS.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1876.

H. CLAY HOPKINS sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. Please state if you have any connection with the Post-Office Department, and if so, of what character?—Answer. I am classed as a special agent of the Post-Office Department.

Q. What are the duties of your position?—A. They are varied. I sometimes act as a detective, and sometimes inspect the accounts of postmasters, and sometimes look after the contractors to see that they are performing their service right.

Q. Does it come within the scope of your duties, the investigation of frauds committed by contractors?—A. Yes; I have had that duty assigned to me within the last year.

Q. The points that I desire to bring your attention to are these: we desire to investigate the frauds committed in the postal department in the matter of straw-bids, and supposing that you had had investigations of that character in your charge in different parts of the country, Texas or the Western States, I would like you to state to the committee if you have investigated cases of that character, and whose contracts they were?—A. Well, I don't know, sir, that I investigated any straw-bids. They were bona-fide bids that I was looking after last winter in the State of Texas. I went down to see whether parties who had contracts with the Department were performing the service.

Q. State to the committee what condition of things you found in regard to those contracts. State, however, as you go along, who were the contractors, and the routes.—A. Really I do not know whether I can give the number of the route. I can give the heads of the routes, the places where they begin and terminate. One route in particular that I was over was that from San Antonio to Corpus Christi, in Texas. The contractor was William D. Kittle. I went over the route from one end to the other; spent some seven or eight days on it. It is a route between 160 and 180 miles long. I found that the service was not being performed as it had been ordered by the Department at all.

Q. How was it performed, and in what particulars was it contrary to the order for the performance of the service?—A. The original bid was for three times a week, tri-weekly service between the points, and some time after he had commenced the service at three times a week, it was increased to six times a week by the order of the Department. But a month or two months after that order was issued, the service was not performed but three times a week. At the expiration of two or three months, (I am not positive about the time,) he commenced running the service six times a week, for twenty miles out of San Antonio, beginning at San Antonio and running twenty miles out, to Graytown; that was the first office outside. No; I am wrong; the original order was twice a week; then it was increased to three times a week, and then to six; but he commenced running it three times a week out of the first office, and twice a week from there to Corpus Christi. The service had continued in that way up to last October; then the contractor ran it six times a week from Corpus Christi twenty-eight miles out, and three times a week the residue. He ran it from Corpus Christi out to San Patricio, twenty-eight miles from Corpus Christi, and three times a week from that to Graytown.

Q. That was during the time that the order was in existence in the Department to run it six times a week?—A. Yes, sir. I believe it was running that way when I was there last February.

Q. William D. Kittle was the contractor upon that route?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Do you know whether Kittle received pay for carrying the mail from San Antonio to Corpus Christi at the rate of six times a week?—A. I think that he did. I believe that the record—I suppose you understand upon what the pay is based. The record is kept at the head of the route and at the end of the route. The pay of the contractors is settled by the report sent in by the postmasters at each end of the route; and of course he ran six times a week out from San Antonio, and the postmaster had to report it that he left his office and arrived six times each week, "arriving and departing daily."

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do I understand you to say that the postmaster reported that he was executing the service six times a week?—A. Yes, sir, at the ends of the route he did. The one postmaster could not do anything else because he left and arrived there every day.

Q. Were there any intermediate offices?—A. They are not required to keep any schedule. But the office at the other end was sending in its registers marked six times a week, although he was performing it only twice.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Is he still carrying that mail?—A. No, sir; I think the service was suspended in April or May.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How long did he continue to receive pay for carrying it six times a week?—A. My impression is that he got it up to the first of last January, 1875, and that was for the last quarter in 1874.

Q. You made a report, I presume, to the Postmaster-General or the Post-Office Department when you returned, of the facts as you have stated them?—A. Yes, sir, corroborated by a certificate that I took from each of the postmasters. I sent my report from Texas. I put it in the mail-pouch myself, and that was the last that was seen of it; but I duplicated that report when I got home and found it had not been received. As soon as I got over the route I reported, and inclosed all my certificates that I had taken, which were signed in the presence of two witnesses, and mailed it to the Post-Office Department, but it never was received.

Q. When you arrived in Washington you found that the report had never been received?—A. Yes, sir. Then I duplicated that report, and the only thing left for me to do was to write back to the postmasters and try and get statements again, and I did from all of them, I believe.

Q. At what time was this that you arrived in Washington and made your report?—A. I got here on the 12th day of March, 1875, and the next day I made out my report.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the Postmaster-General in regard to it?—A. Yes, sir. I went in to see him and told him.

Q. Did you communicate the facts to him as you have stated?—A. Yes, sir. I told him, personally, that I had gone over the route and what I had found. Just stated the facts as I have now.

Q. You then made a duplicate of your report, and that was put on file in the Office?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the action of the Department in regard to the contract when you made your report?—A. I don't recollect now, sir. I don't know that I would be consulted about that. I think that his service was suspended at once by the Postmaster-General, as soon as I had reported the thing. They telegraphed me to Texas for my report and I did not get the dispatch till I got home; that was a month, nearly, after I had made my first report.

Q. Under the regulations of the Post-Office Department, what deductions and fines ought to have been assessed against the contractor for failure in that respect, as you have stated it?—A. Well, it seems to me that a man ought not to be paid for what he does not do. Do you want to know what was done?

Q. I want to know what was done, and then what ought to have been done, if you know it?—A. Well, it seems to me that the man ought not to have pay for services that he had not performed; and I do not think there were any deductions made for the service prior to the 1st of January, 1875; I think he was just paid for the service as it was performed after that time. That is my impression.

Q. Your impression is that he was paid as if the service had been performed six times a week?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And your report showed that it had not been?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. SLEMONS:

Q. Does your report show that the actual service on the route is only twice a week?—A. Yes, sir; it shows just exactly as I found the service; that is what I tried to report.

Q. That was actually twice a week?—A. That was six times a week on one end and twice a week for the residue, until the 4th of October.

Q. Do you understand that that was any service at all, or a six times a week service on one hundred and twenty-eight miles?—A. Well, that is the postmaster's report, and his pay was based on those reports.

Q. Were the reports of the postmaster at San Antonio and of the postmaster at Corpus Christi simultaneous that it was six times a week?—A. Yes, sir; each month. The postmaster at Corpus Christi reported the mail as departing and arriving six times a week; but the postmaster at Corpus Christi made false reports, because the mail was only leaving his office twice a week, and he had it published in the papers there that it would leave twice a week, but the register he sent to the Department was six times a week. On the 4th of October, 1875, a six-times-a-week service was commenced on the Corpus Christi end for twenty-eight miles out, and three times a week the residue.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Did you have any conversation with the postmaster at Corpus Christi in relation to this matter?—A. No, sir; I do not think I spoke to him about it. I did not think it was necessary. I got all the evidence that he was sending in false reports.

Q. Do you know what action was taken by the Department against the postmaster of Corpus Christi?—A. He was removed. I remember his removal.

Q. Do you know whether any proceedings were commenced against him?—A. I do not think there were. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the postmaster of San Antonio in relation to this matter?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he admit to you that he knew that this service was not being performed?—A. He told me, and his records also show, that every month when he sent in his statements he indorsed on the back, "The mails come through twice a week." That was on all his registers; he showed that in the Department.

Q. That they came through twice a week?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You being a special agent I will ask you is it not the custom for the postmaster at the head or foot of the route to report every failure of the mail to arrive; for instance, the mail comes three times a week, they will report that and if it fails once they report the failure?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Has not the Post-Office Department required an excuse to be given or the pay for that trip will be deducted?—A. Yes, sir, that is the regulation.

Q. Do you know whether the Post-Office Department made any deduction for those failures of three times a week, or four times a week as reported by the postmaster at San Antonio?—A. I do not think they did. The face of his register would show that the service was performed all right, but when you turn over the back it shows the other state of facts. He came into the office every day, but he only brought the through matter twice a week, and the postmaster at San Antonio thought, of course, that there was something wrong, that the man was not performing the service.

Q. Did the postmaster at San Antonio admit to you, at any time, that he was aware that there was something wrong and call your attention to it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had he ever notified the Department?—A. He said that he had, and I suppose that he considered that a notification to the Department, indorsing on the back of the registers that he only got letters through from Corpus Christi twice a week.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. You are a special agent?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been in the service?—A. About six years and a half.

Q. Where are you on duty now?—A. My headquarters are in Washington City.

Q. When did this contract commence, or do you know?—A. It commenced in 1871, I think.

Q. I am speaking of the contract that you went out to investigate?—A. That is the one that I am speaking of.

Q. The letting is for four years?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then the new letting commenced last year?—A. No, sir. I was investigating the one prior to that, the one that expired on the 1st of July, 1875.

Q. You were there in February, 1875?—A. Yes, sir; I was investigating the lettings.

Q. Kittle did not get the new contract?—A. No, sir.

Q. You went out there in February, 1875?—A. Yes, sir. I got into Texas the latter part of January.

Q. I suppose you have no knowledge yourself of what took place except what came under your own observation?—A. That is all.

Q. Whether the service was performed one, two, three, or four years before that time you do not know, unless it be from hearsay?—A. Well, I could see by the records that he got his contract in 1871.

Q. I am speaking now of the performance of the contract?—A. I can only speak of my own knowledge what I saw while I was there.

Q. Then, of what happened one, two, or three years before that time, you have no knowledge?—A. No, sir.

Q. At the time you were there, they were only performing daily service a part of the way?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Although they were performing daily service at each end of the route?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you say that the returns of the postmasters at the respective ends, under the regulations, showed that fact?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Those returns are in the Department, are they?—A. Yes, sir; the schedules are there, and the contractor's pay is based on that.

Q. The contractor's pay is based upon the return from the two postmasters at the respective ends?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You became satisfied that this postmaster at the Corpus Christi end of the route had certified to an untruth?—A. Yes, sir; but not while I was there.

Q. But that he had, prior to that time, certified to an untruth?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was there appearing upon the face of these returns authorizing a deduction to be made?—A. There was nothing on the face of them. The Department could hardly help but pay, from the certificates that were sent in, because they showed that the service was performed, and not only that, but nearly all the postmasters along the route certified to the service having been performed six times a week.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do I understand you that nearly all the intermediate postmasters on the route so certified?—A. Yes, sir. They are not required by the Department to keep any record of the arrival and departure of the mails, but the contractors got them to send in certificates, so as to aid them in getting their pay through.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. In fact, then, nearly all those intermediate postmasters certified to the same untruth?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that the Department here, under the regulations, could not well have helped but pay for the service?—A. They could not help it.

Q. The fraud existed in the certificates that were made along the routes?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is a sparsely settled country from Corpus Christi to San Antonio?—Yes, there is about fifty miles between some of the post-offices, and only one or two houses between two of them.

Q. That would give peculiar facilities for the perpetration of frauds of that kind?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Upon whose order did you go out?—A. I received my instructions from Mr. Woodward, the chief special agent, and from the Postmaster General, both.

Q. You said a moment ago that it was your understanding that it was the duty of the Department to make a deduction, upon your report?—A. I did not intend to say that, sir; I did not intend to convey any such idea as that, because the Department could not do that; they must go according to the registers—the certificates sent in by the postmaster.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to understand you thoroughly on that point.

The WITNESS. I do not think that the Department would have authority to make a deduction simply on my report. If all the registers in the Department show that the service is performed, and the certificates of the postmasters along the route show that the service is being performed, I do not think that the Department could make a deduction on my report. I do not intend to convey any such idea.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. When you made this report that contract was at once canceled and that postmaster discharged?—A. Yes; I recommended his removal, and the Postmaster-General acted on it at once, and Mr. Kittle's pay was suspended not only on that route, but on all the routes that he had.

Q. Then the Department did what it could to get even with him?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. I did not understand exactly when that contract of Kittle's commenced?—A. I think it was the 1st of July, 1871.

Q. Consequently it ended in July, 1875?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you discover the failure of the contractor to perform the service—in January, 1875?—A. No, sir; it was in February that I started. The 1st of February I left Corpus Christi to go over the route, which took me about eight days.

Q. Had those frauds been going on all that time, over three years?—A. I do not know; I can only speak from hearsay. The records of the office show that the service was being performed, but I found it in the condition I have stated when I went there. If I had just examined at each end of the route, of course, I would have found the service all right.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. What time was it when you made your report to the Department?—A. I did not write out my report till I got back to Houston from San Antonio. I got back there in the night and left the next morning, and about two days afterward (I cannot give the date exactly, but I suppose it was about the middle of February) I sent off my report. That report was lost. I think the next report I made was dated the 13th or 14th of March.

Q. Your first report that ever reached the Department reached here in March?—A. Yes; I reached the Department myself on the 12th of March, and when I came in they asked me why I had not reported on the route, and I told them I had. They said they had not received my report, and the same day or the next day I wrote out the report again and submitted it to the Postmaster-General. I also saw him in person.

Q. The Department acted on that report?—A. Yes; the service was suspended.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where did you mail your first report?—A. At Houston, Tex.

Q. Have you any idea what became of that report?—A. I do not know, sir. It is a very difficult matter to trace those things up, when they go astray; that is a part of my business, though.

Q. That is the reason I asked you the question.—A. Well, it is a pretty hard matter to tell where it was lost. There were parties at both ends of the line who were interested in its being destroyed.

Q. Were the parties in Houston interested?—A. There may have been some one there; the contractor had some friends there.

Q. Did any one know that you were going to mail that report?—A. I do not know how they would have known it. I wrote it in the post-office, off in a corner by myself, at a high desk; no one could see me; and I inclosed the certificates that I had secured corroborating my statements, and inclosed the whole in a large official envelope, and took it over to the desk and had it stamped, and put it in the mail-pouch.

Q. And that report never reached the Department?—A. We cannot find any record of it on file in the Department.

Q. In answer to Mr. Cannon, you spoke of the intermediate postmasters certifying that the mail had been carried six times a week. Can you remember the names of any of those intermediate postmasters?—A. I do not know that I can give you the name of one of them now. We generally address them, when we meet them, as "Postmaster," and I do not remember the names. I think I have their names in a memorandum-book, but I am not positive.

Q. Were those postmasters at the intermediate stations between Corpus Christi and San Antonio, who made those false certificates, removed?—A. I do not know that any of them were. Those certificates are gotten up altogether by the contractor himself, and I understood how he got them.

Q. You understood that there was collusion between the contractor and those postmasters at stations between the two terminal points?—A. O, yes. The intermediate postmasters did not hesitate a moment to tell me just exactly how the service was performed; and I found it out by questioning the carriers myself, and I got their certificates also.

Q. Still, those intermediate postmasters certified that the mail had been carried six times a week?—A. They gave those certificates to the contractor, and they explained to me how the contractor got them.

Q. State how they explained it.—A. Their story was, that the contractor would have these papers all written out and would bring them and read them, and that they read that the service was being performed, as they knew it was being performed. Then the contractor would ask them to sign the certificate, and they would sign it without reading it, and it would turn out afterward that they had certified to the performance of double the service actually performed.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. They supposed they were signing for twice a week, and signed the paper without reading it, and afterward found they were signing for six times a week.—A. Yes; that is their story.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Did they all tell the same story ?—A. All except one ; he did not have any story at all.

Q. You say you received your instructions from Mr. Woodward. What did he tell you to do ?—A. He told me to go to Texas and examine into the service there, particularly in regard to the service on this route, from Corpus Christi to San Antonio, and also on the route from Jewett to Crockett.

Q. Did he tell you why he wanted you to examine into those two routes ?—A. I did not have my instructions in writing. They were simply verbal instructions to proceed to Texas and examine that service, and I do not recollect whether he did or not.

Q. He must have given you some information or instruction about it ?—A. My impression is that he said he thought there was something wrong in the service on these routes.

Mr. STOWELL. The fact of his sending you would indicate that, wouldn't it ?

The WITNESS. Well, he wanted me to look after the service generally in the State.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. You stated, as I understood you, in answer to Mr. Cannon, that the papers being correct on their faces, the Postmaster-General could not do anything else than to pay the contractors their full pay. Now, if that was the case what were you sent down there for ?—A. I was sent down there on that route, I suppose, to see whether the service was being done as it was ordered by the Department. The Postmaster-General could suspend the contractors' pay on my report.

Q. And order an investigation ?—A. I suppose he could. I was sent there to investigate the facts, and when I reported the facts, although I was the only one that reported them in that way, the Postmaster-General did suspend the pay of the contractor, and all his routes in Texas, and he had quite a number.

Q. I understood you to say, however, that he was paid for the time that he had carried the mails ?—A. There was a settlement made with him afterwards.

Q. Then, although the Postmaster-General suspended his pay at that time, yet afterward the contractor was paid the full amount ?—A. Before I made my report he had been paid up, I think, to the 1st of January, but he had not been paid for the third quarter of the fiscal year, from January to April, and that pay was suspended. I think it was suspended from the 1st of January.

Q. He was paid nothing from that time ?—A. There was a settlement made with him afterward. I think that settlement was on the basis of my report. The majority of the records in the Department were in the contractor's favor, saying that the service had been performed in all the records, with the exception of this indorsement on the back of the San Antonio postmaster's certificate, that he had only received a through mail twice a week. I think there was some agreement made afterward to pay the contractor for the service that he had actually performed.

Q. Have you any idea how much the fines and deductions, for the time that he had failed, according to your investigations, to carry the mail according to his contract, would have amounted to under the regulations of the Department ?—A. I did make a calculation at one time, but I do not recollect the amount now, and I am afraid to state from memory.

Q. In the final settlement that was made with him, was the amount that was paid to him from the 1st of January for the last quarter sufficient to cover the fines and deductions that should have been made for his failure to execute the contract ?—A. I do not think it was. That is my impression now.

Q. Then I understand you to say that if the fines and deductions had been made according to postal regulations, instead of the Government owing him anything, he would have been indebted to the Government ?—A. Yes. I cannot state the amount, but I know that was the result of my investigations ; I know that the balance was against him.

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. You say he had a number of routes in Texas, and that his pay was stopped on the whole of them after you found out the irregularity on this one route. Now, do I understand you to say that the balance would have been against him on all of his routes ?—A. I think that was the estimate that we made.

Q. Do I understand you to say further that the Post-Office Department paid him with the balance standing against him ?—A. My impression is that they did.

Q. Were you present when he was paid ?—A. I was not. That is a matter that is not put in my hands at all. I was then in the inspection division with the clerk for some time, when this case was being made up.

Q. Did you report to the Postmaster-General the fact that this contractor was being paid when he ought not to be ?—A. I did not.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you report to any one else?—A. I think I did to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. Mr. Tyner?—A. I do not know whether Mr. French was there in charge at the time, or whether it was Mr. Tyner himself. The case, as we made it up, was submitted to whomever was in charge of the contract-office at that time, either the clerk of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General or the Second Assistant Postmaster-General himself.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. After the case was made up you say that the Government was not in this man's debt, yet the Government paid him; do you say that?—A. I understood it so.

Q. I am not asking your understanding, but what you know.—A. Well, I did not see any one pay him, nor did I see any warrant given to him.

Q. Do you know that any warrant was given to him?—A. Only from what I have been told.

Q. These matters all appear on record in the Department, I suppose?—A. Yes; the records show what settlement was made and what amount of money was paid, or they ought to show; I never went to examine the records.

Q. I do not understand you to say, then, in the teeth of the record that the Sixth Auditor paid Kittle money against the record, or do you say that?—A. I do not know how to make it any plainer than I have stated it. I went into the inspection-room, where the account was being made up, and told the clerk how the service was performed when I was there, and how I had been told it had been performed for some time before, and upon that this pay was made up.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You were assigned to duty at one time to work up frauds in the inspection-office, with instructions to look into the inspection-office and see if any frauds had been committed there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that the way you got the information that you have been speaking of?—A. Yes, sir; I was in that room for some weeks when this matter came up.

Q. Now, you state that from what you had been told you understood that more money had been paid to this man on his contract than was actually due him. Who told you? Was it told you by officers in the Post-Office Department?—A. Well, perhaps I am wrong in saying that. I heard afterward, I think I heard Kittle say himself, that he had been paid by the Department.

Q. You made your report, I understand, to Woodward when you returned—your verbal report as well as your written one?—A. Yes, sir; I think so. I think it was addressed to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and I told Mr. Woodward all about it, and the Postmaster-General, too. I saw the Postmaster-General in person.

Q. What did the Postmaster-General say when you told him about it?—A. Well, I don't know, unless he called the contractor a great rascal or something like that.

Q. You say that he suspended his pay?—A. Yes, sir; his pay was suspended about that time. I think it was about that time.

Q. Was anything said by the Postmaster-General at the time you had the conversation with him, or by any other officer in the Department with whom you had conversation, Mr. Woodward or others, to the effect that he ought to be fined, and there ought to be a deduction made for all the time that he had failed to execute his contract?—A. I don't recollect whether that conversation passed between us or not; my impression is that there was something of that kind said in the conversation.

Q. Try and see if you cannot remember what was said in that conversation with the Postmaster-General or with Mr. Woodward or Mr. French, or any one in the Post-Office Department?—A. My impression is now, that it was the idea to fine him for not performing the service ever since he had failed to perform it; I think that was in the conversation.

Q. You say Kittle told you that he had received more pay than he was entitled to?—A. I don't know whether he said that; he told me that he was paid money.

Q. That he was paid money on his quarter from the 1st of January to the 1st of April?—A. Yes, sir; well, I don't know how long; of course after his services were suspended the men that he had employed in Texas quit working for him, and the postmaster had to employ temporary service.

Q. When did Kittle's contract expire?—A. It would have expired on the 1st July, 1875.

Q. In the conversation that you had with Mr. Woodward when you returned, in regard to this missing report, what was said about that by Woodward?—A. I don't recollect exactly. He told me I would have to duplicate it, and he thought then—I think he said that he thought it was destroyed by some one in the Department; that the probability was that it came there, and that some one who was working in the interest of the contractor there had got hold of it and destroyed it; he did not know that certainly, of course; it was only a surmise.

Q. Have you in your capacity as detective ever developed any fact satisfactory to your own mind as to where that paper was destroyed?—A. Yes, sir; I always felt perfectly satisfied in my own mind in regard to it; that it was a clerk in the Department who had gotten hold of it and destroyed it; he always, of course, denied it to me. There were several other reports of mine that I sent home that did not seem to be received. I think there were one or two others that I sent home, foreign to this route, in regard to other routes, recommending that there be no service put on them, but I never could find them in the Department.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Other routes in Texas?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. You made a duplicate of the written report, did you, in reference to this route from San Antonio to Corpus Christi, when you found the first one had been lost or destroyed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That report you filed in the Department?—A. Yes, sir; and I think it is in the Department to-day.

Q. Whatever action was had then (I am speaking now of legal technical action) by the Department was upon that report?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And not upon any loose conversations you had with A, B, C, D, E, or F?—A. No, sir.

Q. In whose office did you file that report?—A. I think that I handed the report to Mr. Woodward, the chief special agent.

Q. Did you see that report after that?—A. No, sir; I don't know that I ever saw the report myself after that. I don't recollect seeing it.

Q. Whether it is in existence at this time you don't know?—A. I cannot say, sir.

Q. Who made up his account?—A. Mr. O'Brien was the clerk in the inspection-office who had charge of that desk.

Q. Where is he?—A. He is not in the Department now.

Q. When did he get out of the Department?—A. Well, I cannot give you the date. I was away from Washington for some weeks, and when I went away he was in the Department, and when I came back he was out.

Q. About when was that?—A. I think it has been since the first of the year.

Q. Was he discharged or did he resign?—A. I think he resigned.

Q. Did you ever see the account that he made out?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it correct or incorrect, or do you know?—A. Yes, sir; I believe it was; it was correct, because I gave him the statement, and he made the calculations from it.

Q. What did he do with that account?—A. I think he took it to the Second Assistant after he had made it out, as he generally did. No, I don't know; perhaps he gave that account to Mr. Lake, who has charge of that inspection division, and he would take to the Second Assistant.

Q. What finally became of that account after it got to the Second Assistant?—A. Well, it was brought back to the office. There was no action taken on it at that time; that is my impression now. I know that it was brought back to the office.

Q. What month was that—March or April?—A. I think it was in May.

Q. Then it was after Mr. Tyner, the present Second Assistant Postmaster-General, had entered upon the performance of his duties?—A. Yes, sir; I think it was after he went there.

Q. How long after May was it before this final settlement was made with this contractor, Kittle?—A. It was either in June or July last.

Q. What kind of money was paid to Kittle, or do you know?

A. I do not know. I am not positive as to the month.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you allude, Mr. Cannon, to the final settlement?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I am speaking of the final settlement when this witness says he was paid money that was not due him.

Q. How much money was paid to Kittle?—A. I don't know what the amount was.

Q. Do you really know that any money was paid to him?—A. I did not see any money paid to him nor any warrant given to him.

Q. It was not your part of the business to pay him?—A. No, sir, that went up to the Sixth Auditor's Office, and I was not there.

Q. The Sixth Auditor passed upon a certificate from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General?—A. Yes; I did not see that certificate; but I know that there was a settlement made with Kittle.

Q. Have you ever seen a statement of the final account that was made up in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's Office?—A. I do not recollect seeing it.

Q. You do not want to be understood, then, as testifying here that on the settlement of that account, the account was so adjusted as to give Kittle money that he was not entitled to under the law, do you?—A. As I told you before, I did not see any money paid to him nor any warrant given to him. I know that there was an agreement made to adjust that account. It was held suspended for a time, and there was what you would call a compromise of the matter, and they agreed to settle his account on the basis of my report for the service he had performed from the first of January—to pay him just exactly as he had performed the service.

Q. But whether that was according to law, and whether the Post-Office Department was justified in making that settlement or not, you do not pretend to say?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then you do not want to be understood as saying that money was paid to this man improperly by the Post-Office Department, or by the Sixth Auditor, do you?—A. Well, I might have my own opinion about it.

Q. I am not speaking about your opinion; what, as you know?—A. I only expressed my opinion.

Q. You expressed your opinion?—A. Yes; that is what I intended to do. The Department may have thought it right, and I might think differently. I know what the regulations require in regard to fines and deductions. It is governed by regulations; there is no law in regard to it.

Q. No law in regard to it?—A. No, sir; it is only a regulation of the Department.

Q. It is wholly without authority in the postal code; do you say that?—A. Well, I was looking over the matter to-day, and it is under a regulation of the Department that I find what fines and deductions are to be made. There is nothing about it in the law. It is in the regulations.

Q. Are you a lawyer?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have you ever read the postal code through from one end to the other?—A. I do not know that I ever sat down and read it from one end to the other.

Q. How can you say, then, that there is no provision in the postal code in regard to it?—A. I asked that question of a clerk to-day who has been there for ten years. I asked him upon what they based their fines, and he said there was no law in regard to it; that it was merely a regulation, and he turned to the chapter of the regulations governing it. Then we went through the law and could not find anything there in regard to it. I suppose there is a law allowing the Postmaster-General to make these regulations.

Q. Then there is a law for those regulations?—A. Yes; he is authorized to make regulations; but that matter is not provided for by a special act.

Q. Have you ever seen a statement of that account as it was finally made up?—A. I do not know that I ever did see it; I have no recollection of seeing it.

Q. Then you have no charge to make against the Post-Office Department in general, or any particular employé of the Department, of paying this money improperly?—A. No, sir. I do not say that they paid any money improperly. I only know what I have been told about that. I do not recollect now that I saw this statement of that account as it was made up. I saw a statement of the account as it was first made up; but I did not see the one that was finally made up. That is my present recollection. I have some memoranda that would refresh my memory, perhaps; but they are not here.

Q. You say that, in your opinion, that first report of yours was destroyed in the Department by a clerk?—A. It is an opinion of mine that I have formed. I may have thought so, but I do not know so, because there is a number of places where it might be lost between Texas and here.

Q. Letters are frequently lost between Texas and here?—A. Yes.

Q. A dishonest contractor or postmaster or route-agent might have taken it?—A. Yes.

Q. If you have any evidence against any clerk in the Post-Office Department, or any clerk who has been there, we want to know his name and what the evidence is.—A. Evidence that he destroyed this package?

Q. Yes.—A. I have not any evidence. I know that he admitted himself that he was in the employ of the contractor and working in his interest—I mean the man who has charge of the Texas desk.

Q. He admitted that to you?—A. To the Postmaster-General.

Q. Did you hear him make the admission?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then that is a mere hearsay? I want to know what you know yourself.—A. I only know from hearsay.

Q. What has become of that clerk?—A. I only know what I have heard.

Q. What is his name?—A. Floyd. I cannot give his first name.

Q. Where is he now?—A. I only know from what I have heard. He is not in the employ of the Department now. I think he left there last June or July. I do not know whether he resigned or not.

Q. Then you simply, in your own mind, accuse or suspect him or somebody else, but you have no evidence about it one way or the other?—A. That is what I say, that I suspect this clerk myself, and from what was told me in the Department I feel pretty certain about it, but he did not make any confession to me.

Q. Do you know of any men in the employ of the Post-Office Department, in Washington, who are guilty of frauds, and have you any evidence against such men?—A. Now?

Q. Yes.—A. I do not know of any. Is your question whether there is any person in the Department, to my knowledge, who has committed frauds? I do not know of any one.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cannon has asked whether you know any person now in the employ of the Government in the Post-Office Department who has committed frauds or is accessory to frauds.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; in the adjusting of these accounts and matters of that kind.

The WITNESS. I do not know of any, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I want the witness to understand that you asked him whether you understood him to say that some one in the Department had committed a fraud in paying that money to Kittle.

The WITNESS. I do not know, only what I have heard, as I said before.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. This report that you made up in Texas, you made up on full investigation, fortified by certificates?—A. Yes.

Q. Were the facts of that report, all you filed in Washington, ever denied or disputed by any one interested in the matter?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were the fines and deductions then entered up by the Postmaster-General against Kittle in pursuance of your report and upon that basis?—A. The only thing that I can say in answer to that, is, that sometime afterward I went into the inspection office, and, with the clerk, made up the case on the facts as I had discovered them in the South.

Q. On your report?—A. Yes; but if you take the papers in that case, the evidence is against me.

Q. You say the fines and deductions were entered up according to your report. Did not they amount to very nearly $30,000?—A. I do not recollect the amount; it was in that neighborhood.

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-four thousand one hundred dollars, was it not?

The WITNESS. I do not recollect the exact figures, but it was between twenty and thirty thousand dollars.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. When they settled with Kittle, did not they settle upon the basis of deducting less than two thousand dollars?—A. I cannot now recollect having seen that case when it was made up for final settlement. I recollect very well that there was an agreement entered into; he was anxious to get his money, and they wanted to fix it in some way, and they agreed to settle the account in some way.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What was that agreement?—A. It was a kind of compromise, but I have no recollection now of seeing that case after it was made up finally by the clerk on the basis of that compromise.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. The papers in the Office would show how much was paid?—A. Yes; the Sixth Auditor's Office ought to show it.

Q. Was not Kittle afterward re-instated in all his rights, and did not he run his routes?—A. No, sir; he has not performed any service in Texas since, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. Did not he have some contracts in other names than his own, which were known to be his contracts, since that time?—A. No, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Not since July, 1875?—A. No, sir. I may possibly be wrong in regard to it. I know that on this route from San Antonio to Corpus Christi he did not perform the service up to the end of the year. There may have been some other smaller routes that he did run on; he had quite a number of them; I do not know now all the routes that he had.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. In your investigations did you find out that there was any failure to carry out the contract on any other route than this one by Kittle?—A. Yes.

Mr. Cannon interposed the general objection to the witness stating his "opinions" in regard to matters and accounts of record.

The Chairman ruled that the witness had a right to state his opinions in regard to the results of the work which he was employed by the Post-Office Department to do.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I wish to turn your attention to some other contracts that I have understood you had something to do in working up and reporting to the Government—the Peterson contracts.—A. I never had anything to do with the Peterson contracts; that is, I was never over the route. It is in a different State.

Q. Do you know anything about these contracts?—A. I only know from the records that I have seen in the Department.

Q. Do you know anything, from what you have seen in the Department, about the fines and deductions that were made?—A. I know that they were made.

Mr. Cannon objected to the witness testifying to what he had seen in the records, on the ground that the records should be produced to speak for themselves.

The question was waived.

Q. Do you know anything about those contracts from what the officers in the Department, who had these questions in charge, have told you?—A. I never heard any one express any opinion about them, except that the clerk may have said something to me about there being pretty heavy fines on the route, which he had figured out and which the record shows.

Q. Then you had nothing to do with the Peterson contracts?—A. No, sir.

Q. What do you know about other contracts with this man Kittle?—A. In regard to one other route of his that I was over, the service when I was there was being performed as required by the Department. He had just commenced performing it a short time before, as I learned from the postmasters along the route. That was the route from San Antonio to Beeville. It used to be one route from San Antonio to Rockport, but now it is two; one from San Antonio to Beeville, and one from Beeville to Rockport.

Q. You were sent there to investigate that route also?—A. In going down from the San Antonio and Corpus Christi route I went across on to the other. I was not sent specially to look after it, but I had got some information about it, and I went over just to see some of the postmasters there, and one of them told me that the service there was being performed as ordered by the Department, but that it had only commenced a short time before; I do not recollect now the date when the three times a week service commenced.

Q. He told you that previous to that the service had not been carried out according to the contract?—A. Well, he did not know whether that was the way it was ordered or not. He did not know whether it was ordered twice or three times a week, but I knew it was three times. He said they had put on an additional trip there sometime before.

Q. Was that the only other route of Kittle's that you investigated?—A. I was on another route of his, but I was not able to get over it. I could not get an outfit, could not get even a horse to ride. It was the road from Crockett to Jewett, and the only way I could get any information was, while I was there in the State, I wrote to different postmasters on the route and they replied, telling me how the service was performed. I went there with a view of going over that route, which was sixty or seventy miles long, but, as I say, I could not get any outfit or any one to take me. The roads were so bad that they could not travel, and the horses were so weak that they could not carry me—little Texas nags. I gained some information in the little village that I was in.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. You said that that final adjustment was made up on the basis of your report: that is, I suppose, deducting the number of trips that you ascertained that the contractor did not perform. I do not mean that it was made up on your estimate of the amount of the fines, but on your report of the number of trips.—A. I think he was paid for the service that he actually performed. He would not admit, but did not deny, the truth of my report.

There is one point that I have stated positively in my testimony, but since I have been thinking about it, it occurs to me that I may be wrong about it; I have not looked over my memoranda since July or August last, and I had very little idea of what was required of me here, though I supposed it was something in connection with the contracts in Texas.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I understand you to say that you were detailed at one time to go into the inspection department to develop frauds, if there were any in that department?—A. Yes, and to get a knowledge of how the business was performed, with a view at that time, I think, of going back to Texas.

Q. Did you develop anything in that department and report it to the Postmaster-General, or to other officers in the Department?—A. I think I saw some records there that were not altogether complete, but I only know that the clerk told me that the pay of contractors had been based sometimes on the certificate of only one postmaster, if my recollection serves me right, and I think I spoke of it to Mr. Woodward.

Q. The clerk told you that the pay had been based on the report of only one postmaster?—A. Yes. The regulations require that the certificates and the registers shall be from the postmasters at both ends of the route, and that the pay shall be based upon them. The clerk showed me some place in the book where he had failed to receive the certificate from one of the postmasters at the end of a route.

Q. What clerk was that?—A. Mr. O'Brien, the gentlemen who was here to-night; Dr. O'Brien.

Q. How long did you remain on that duty?—A. I was there several weeks; I cannot tell you exactly the number. My journal at home would tell exactly.

Q. Are you in the habit of keeping a journal?—A. We generally keep a journal of where we are each day and of our duties. We generally make out a copy of our journal and send it to the Department. For that time I would merely state in my journal that I was occupied in the Post-Office Department, or I suppose I would say that I was in the inspection division; being here in Washington it is not necessary to go into details as we do when we are away.

Q. These irregularities that you saw in the Department, did you report them to anybody?—A. It seems to me that I reported them to Mr. Woodward. It seems to me that I must have spoken of them to him.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. When was it that you were in the Department?—A. I think it was along through May or June, 1875. I may possibly have been there in part of April. I cannot speak positively about that now. I was there several weeks. I may have been away for a few days—sent away on some business—and then back again.

Q. Mr. O'Brien, you say, told you that in some one or more instances payment had been made contrary to the regulations on the certificate of one postmaster?—A. Yes; and he showed me in his book where he did not have the certificates of the postmasters at both ends of the route.

Q. That he had not entered them in his book, or that he had not received them?—A. He said he had not received them.

Q. Did he tell you that payment had been made in this instance?—A. He told me in some cases they had been paid. I don't know this of my own knowledge; I am only repeating what he told me.

Q. What case did he say had been paid?—A. I cannot recollect the case now. I went over quite a number of cases.

Q. Quite a number where he said the facts existed, or quite a number altogether?—A. Quite a number of cases altogether that I went through at his desk.

Q. What excuse did he give for making up the accounts in these cases?—A. He said he was instructed to make them up. I cannot recall any of those cases now.

Q. Would you recognize the books or accounts if you saw them?—A. I should recognize the books.

Q. Could you turn to the account or the route?—A. Do you mean one account?

Q. Yes.—A. O, there was more than one that was made up in that way, but there are three or four hundred routes in the State of Texas, and I could not recollect any particular one now.

Q. Who is Mr. Woodward?—A. He is chief special agent of the Post-Office Department. We report to him.

Q. Where is he on duty now?—A. His headquarters are in Washington. I think he has been in that position since Governor Jewell has been Postmaster-General.

Q. How long did that man that you have mentioned remain in the Department after you had reported him to Mr. Woodward?—A. As I said before, I think it was since the first of the year that he resigned; somewhere about the first of January. I never knew that he was out of the Department for several weeks after he left.

By Mr. WALKER:

Q. Did Mr. O'Brien consult you, as a detective, in that matter, to know whether the service had been performed or not, as he had only the certificate from one end of the route?—A. He was instructed to make up the case by his chief.

Q. But you, being a detective, did he consult you to know whether the service had been performed or not—was that his object to get information from you as to whether it had been performed?—A. I do not know whether he asked me that or not; he may have asked me about some routes in Texas; I have no doubt he did, as he had charge of the desk.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Who did he say instructed him?—A. I think he said Mr. Lake instructed him. Mr. Lake has charge of the inspection division.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. Did I understand you to say that he said that he had been instructed to make up the account and have it paid, or simply to examine into the condition of the account and see whether the requirements of the Department had been complied with or not?—

A. My recollection now is that it was in this way: that he had been instructed to make up this case; that after he had made it up he gave it to Mr. Lake, and when he saw the case next it was allowed. The case would come back approved, and then he would make up a certificate for the payment, and I think he told me that he had made up the papers for the final payment.

Q. With the knowledge that only one certificate from one postmaster was in?—A. Yes.

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. Mr. O'Brien said in substance, then, that he was instructed by the chief of the inspection bureau to make up the account when only the certificate of one postmaster was in?—A. It ought to be the certificates of one postmaster. There is a certificate for each month.

By Mr. LUTTRELL :

Q. You say it requires certificates from postmasters at both ends of the route before any account is made up?—A. Yes, that is what the regulation requires.

Q. And still you were informed that the instructions were to make up the account from the certificate of one postmaster without waiting for the certificate of the other to arrive?—A. Yes, sir. Sometimes they may have certificates from other places that they seem to think would be satisfactory.

By Mr. MILLER :

Q. From intermediate points?—A. Yes, but the regulations are that they must have the certificates from each end of each route.

By Mr. WALKER :

Q. Did you as a detective give them any information that the service had been performed?—A. No, sir; I did not know; I had not been over the route.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. The pay is not made up on the certificates of postmasters at intermediate points?—A. No, sir; the regulations require that the postmasters at the termini of the route shall each give a certificate, but very often contractors will get intermediate postmasters to send in certificates, because it helps to get their pay adjusted.

Q. It helps them to defraud the Government?—A. I do not know about that. If I were a contractor, I would like to have certificates from intermediate postmasters all along the route.

By Mr. MILLER :

Q. Do you know that the chief of this bureau had given the order to make up the account?—A. I only repeat what the clerk told me.

Q. You do not know whether he told you the truth or not?—A. No, sir; I do not know anything about that. That clerk is not in office now; I think he resigned.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1876.

P. H. WOODWARD sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. State to the committee what is your employment.—Answer. Special agent of the Post-Office Department. I have been in that service between eleven and twelve years. I have not been all the time in the Department here. I have been in Washington since the 1st of November, 1874. I was appointed in 1865, and was at the South for a number of years, and afterward in Connecticut.

Q. Has your line of duty been in the same direction most of the time in which you have been employed in the Department?—A. No, sir; during the first two or three years I had most of the time the charge of the organization of the mail-service at the South; that is, it gradually devolved on me, not by any appointment, but it fell on me. Then, when General Grant came in as President, I was switched off from that and employed on mail depredations for two or three years. Of course that involved a large amount of miscellaneous work, and for the last fourteen months I have had charge of the special agents on depredations.

Q. State what your duties are now in the Department?—A. They are about this: Complaints of losses in all parts of the country come to me, and my business is to, so far as possible, locate these losses. Of course a thief in East Tennessee, for instance, might steal letters going from the extreme north to the extreme south, and I try, so far as possible by myself and my assistants, to locate these losses and then designate the men who shall catch the thieves. Then there is a great deal of miscellaneous work done by the Department. For instance, complaints that there are troubles in communities in reference to location of post-offices. I generally designate the men who attend to that. More or less postmasters embezzle money-order and post-office finances. There are a few money-order agents that I have nothing specifically to do with, but the force on mail depredations have to attend to a great deal of that business, and when they do I designate them.

Q. Investigations, then, into the mail-contracts come not under your supervision?—A. They would to a certain extent. I would designate the men who would make the investigations.

Q. Please inform the committee what investigations you have had made in regard to particular contracts, who the agents were that you sent out to make the investigations, what reports they made to you, if those reports are on file in the Department, and what action was taken on them.—A. Do you mean throughout the country?

Q. You can begin on any particular contract.—A. Well, you have embraced so much in your question that I should hardly know where to begin. Perhaps I should make a little further explanation so that you would understand the matter still better. Of course, you are aware that in the Department the legitimate duties that devolve upon each one of us are very engrossing. More than half of the time this winter I have been at the Post-Office Department by 8 o'clock in the morning. It has always been my custom, so far as possible, to restrict my investigations to matters that properly belong to me. For instance, when an agent was sent to investigate mail-contracts, the reports came in to me; but in most instances I turned them over to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General without even reading them, because I have not time to do it; and as it is a matter falling particularly within his province, I never have familiarized myself with the details of these investigations.

Q. I will direct your attention specially, then, to the contractor on the route from San Antonio to Corpus Christi.—A. Mr. Hopkins was sent to Texas early in 1875, and was there five or six weeks, and went over a good many of those routes, and his reports, I have no doubt, are all on file in the Department, which would show for themselves. He reported irregularities on some routes; but the specific details I am not familiar with. His reports were made to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. That is, they were transmitted through me, and some of them, perhaps, might have been addressed to me; but the action on them would be taken in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and not at all in our division.

Q. Did you not give the instructions to Mr. Hopkins?—A. I wrote the letter of instructions which Mr. Hopkins went out under.

Q. What were the instructions?—A. Well, they cover, perhaps, three pages. I know my general instructions to him were to go there and make a thorough and exhaustive investigation, and to give us the exact facts.

Q. What was the object of the investigation?—A. We supposed there were frauds there, and if there were, it was to discover them and correct them.

Q. Did he discover any frauds?—A. I think he did.

Q. Were they corrected?—A. I think they were.

Q. Please tell the committee how they were corrected.—A. Well, my impressions of that matter would be general. There was a contractor by the name of Kittle, in whose routes he discovered more or less irregularities, what he believed to be frauds; I think the second assistant took action on those cases right away. I know it is the purpose there to be very prompt and thorough in those matters.

Q. What was the action taken?—A. I could not say; that is a matter that does not fall within my province.

Q. Is it within your knowledge?—A. No, sir; I could not say that it was; I don't think that Kittle has any contracts now; and whether his contracts were annulled at that time or not, I could not say.

Q. You say then that you don't know whether there were any fines assessed or deductions made?—A. Yes, sir; I know there were some fines made against him.

Q. What were they for?—A. For non-performance of service. Some of the facts come back to me now.

Mr. CANNON. I object to the witness being asked to state matters that appear on record in the Department. The records being easy of access, let them speak for themselves.

The WITNESS. My knowledge of what the fines were would be merely incidental.

The CHAIRMAN. No matter how the knowledge came to you if you have it.

The WITNESS. I only mention that to show you my knowledge would be very general.

Q. What were those fines and deductions for?—A. As I recollect, for non-performance of service, or perhaps because service had not been performed according to contract—non-performance.

Q. How long was there a want of performance according to contract?—A. There is a good deal of difference in the evidence. They have curious postmasters down in that country who will certify to most anything. There seemed to be some discrepancy between the certificates of the postmasters and the statements of Mr. Hopkins.

Q. Do those certificates come to you?—A. No, sir; to the second assistant.

Q. What was the amount of fines entered?—A. I could not say.

Q. Who has possession of the papers that will show that?—A. I presume they would be in the office of the second assistant. Those matters would be determined in the inspection division in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. You are in charge of the inspection bureau, I understand?—A. No, sir. The primary duties of the inspection bureau of the second assistant's office are these: The reports of mail-service throughout the United States are made to them, and it is on their certificates that contractors are paid ; for instance, here is a route running from Washington to some point in Virginia—at the close of the month or quarter, as the case may be, the postmasters at the terminal offices would certify as to the character of the service during the quarter. Those certificates would go to the inspection division of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and their records would be made from those certificates of the postmasters. Of course, if a postmaster should make false returns, his action might mislead the Department—would mislead them unless they had some means of correcting that misinformation.

Q. State to the committee what knowledge came to you in your official capacity in regard to frauds committed by this man Kittle, in carrying the mail on the route that we are alluding to ; or any other route.—A. My knowledge of Kittle's frauds, my personal knowledge, commenced at a later date in reference to his attempts to defraud the Government afterward, by fictitious bids. I don't know that I had any personal knowledge of that investigation in Texas ; all those reports went to Mr. Tyner, and if I had any knowledge in regard to them, it was something that came up incidentally.

Q. Did not Hopkins consult with you and talk with you in regard to this fraud on the route from Corpus Christi to San Antonio ?—A. He may have done so to a certain extent.

Q. What did he say to you when he came back ?—A. Of course, when one does not have to act in these matters he does not treasure them up as he would matters that belong to him ; but my recollection is, that Kittle had been in the habit of taking the mails out from both ends of the route, carrying them out a few miles, and perhaps, during the intermediate distance, not performing the service oftener than three times a week, while performing it on the ends, say every day. In this way he would manage to get certificates from the terminal postmasters. For instance, he would carry the mails out from each end ten, twenty-six, or thirty miles, perhaps, as short a distance as was practicable. Now, the postmaster might know that he was not faithfully performing the service. If he did, it would be his business to inform the Department ; but I know that he got his certificates from the terminal postmasters, and it was in that way that the Department had been misled. Hopkins went through the whole line, and I think he got certificates from nearly all the intermediate postmasters that the mails had not been carried as the terminal postmasters certified they had been, perhaps not more than three times a week, or twice a week. Of course, the full truth would have been that those mails were carried through from one office to the other twice or three times a week ; but it is perhaps within the range of possibility that a postmaster might be deceived, though I don't see how it would be possible. But in going over the route he got information from the postmasters and others that the service had not been performed throughout the whole extent.

Q. Do you know whether those postmasters were removed, all of them ?—A. Yes, sir ; the postmaster at Corpus Christi was removed, and I think it was upon the representations in part of the postmaster at San Antonio that that investigation was made. My recollection is that the postmaster at San Antonio reported that Kittle herein performed his service properly, and that that was one inducement to the investigation. He is still postmaster.

Q. What effect would that improper service have on Kittle's contract with postal regulations ?—A. Well, I should suppose—

Q. Don't you know ?—A. I should suppose that Kittle's contract would be annulled if he was engaged in any fraud of that sort.

Q. Did I understand you to state that you don't know whether they had been annulled or not ?—A. I think he has no other contracts.

Q. But at that time ?—A. I could not tell about the dates.

Q. Do you know anything about the final settlement that was made with Kittle in regard to this contract, or other contracts ?—A. I know that he was fined, and that a portion of the money that was due to him was paid to him.

Q. How much was due to him ; a quarter, or less or more ?—A. I could not say about that.

Q. Don't you remember about that ?—A. It is something that I had nothing to do with.

Q. Don't you know it ?—A. No more than what you would know from anybody ; an employé of the Department cannot know everything that is going on in all parts of the Department.

Q. But suppose you were told by an employé of the Department, you would know it then, would you not ?—A. I should ; but I should know it—

Q. Did any employé in the Department tell you what the fines were ?—A. Well, I knew at the time ; that is, I had some knowledge of it. There were several thousand dollars, I think, deducted from his pay.

Q. Getting your information from the same sources, don't you know that those fines were not sufficient to cover the frauds that he had committed against the Department in not carrying the mail according to his contract ?—A. No, sir ; I didn't have the adjutant of any of those matters at all, and they did not come within my knowledge.

Q. Don't you know it in the same way that you got the other information, from officers of the Department?—A. No, sir; I could not say that.

Q. Please state where all the reports as well as the statements on which warrants were issued for pay on those routes went to, who had charge of them, and where they went to.—A. That is, the routine that this account would go through?

Q. The reports first made by the detectives who were sent out under your instructions to make investigations; how, to whom, were those reports made, and where do they go?—A. Those all went to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. Did your duty end with simply giving instructions to the detectives to go and investigate certain contracts?—A. Certainly, that is where my duty ended.

Q. Then you never had any cognizance of the matter of those reports after they were made?—A. No, sir; not officially. I don't know that I ever read one of them.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Hopkins about his report?—A. Yes; I had more or less conversation.

Q. Did he not tell you that he had mailed a report to the Department?—A. Yes, sir; there was one report that he mailed to the Department that we never could find.

Q. What conversation did you have in regard to that?—A. We tried very hard to find it. We had, perhaps, a number of conversations in regard to it.

Q. What was the impression you had in regard to that?—A. My impression was that some clerk in the Post-Office Department stole it.

Q. That did not come under your department; why were you and he talking about it?—A. It would come directly in my department, because when that was lost it was a mail depredation, and then it became an original matter for me to investigate.

Q. Did you investigate that?—A. We did.

Q. Did you ascertain what became of it?—A. No, sir; that is, we only had our theory.

Q. What was your theory?—A. That some dishonest clerk in the Post-Office Department stole it.

Q. But you were not able to find out?—A. Well, we found out afterward that a number of men were acting very rascally, and the inference was that he might have been one of these men. Of course, if it was stolen, it was stolen in the interest of the contractor.

Q. Do you mean to say that the fines and deductions that were made against Kittle were sufficient in amount to cover all his failures to carry out his contract correctly?—

A. If I should answer that question, it would be expressing an opinion upon a question upon which I am not in any way entitled to express an opinion.

Q. Did you ever hear any postal officers speak in regard to that? What have you heard about it in the Department?—A. I could not swear to conversations that I had.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, do you mean now as to mere expressions of opinion, or of facts?

The CHAIRMAN. I mean statements. Officers in the Department can make statements that come within their knowledge and they could tell him. I mean that.

The WITNESS. I do not know that I ever heard an opinion expressed by any one on that point.

Q. Are you not aware that, in the working up of the fines and reductions on these contracts with Kittle, he was found indebted in a very large amount, under the postal regulations, for a failure to carry out his contract, and that the fines and deductions that were actually charged to him in his final settlement were a great many thousand dollars less than the amount should have been?—A. I know that in settling his accounts Mr. Hopkins was in great distress about the loss of the letter, because it brought his unsupported statements in conflict with all the records of the office. According to records by which accounts are settled, Mr. Kittle had been performing his service according to contract. Mr. Hopkins was a man that we believed in and a man that we trusted, and yet the evidence which he furnished disappeared in this letter, which left Mr. Hopkins in a very embarrassed position, which he felt very keenly. I know at one time I thought of sending him back to duplicate his evidence; but other matters came up and he never went back.

Q. I may understand, then, that, notwithstanding the fact that you sent out those agents for the purpose of working up these fraudulent contractors and the fact that they made reports and that those reports were acted on and fines and deductions were made, you never had even curiosity enough to learn what had been done in regard to many of those cases?—A. Well, if my curiosity should lead me to follow up everything that passes through my hands in the Post-Office Department, I should have to work every day twenty-four hours.

Q. I understand, then, that you did not know anything about it?—A. No, sir; it is something that did not come within my province at all.

Q. Or anything about the fines and deductions that were made of any mail-contractor?—A. No, sir; anything that I might say would be apt to mislead, being based entirely upon vague impressions. I could not speak for the records; they show for themselves. Of course, a great deal goes through my hands. For instance the investigations that are made under the direction of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, at the time exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than five per centum on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of new or modified service, not less than five per centum of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds five thousand dollars. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited, and the checks or drafts deposited by all other bidders, on the same route, shall be returned to the respective bidders making such deposits. No proposals for the transportation of the mails where the amount of the bond required to accompany the same shall exceed five thousand dollars shall be considered, unless accompanied with the check or draft herein required, together with the bond required by a preceding section: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or intended to affect any penalties or forfeitures which have heretofore accrued under the provisions of the sections hereby amended."

H. Rep. 814—VIII

many of them, pass through my hands, but most of them I do not read for lack of time, because I have not to act upon them at all, and I only read those matters upon which I have to act. A case goes to the office of Mr. Marshall, the First Assistant, and it would be a work of supererogation for me to go over all the papers when he has to make the final decision, and for lack of time one cannot follow those matters up. Now, when Kittle put fraudulent bids in afterward I had a great deal to do with working that matter up; and it came within my own personal knowledge, though it has passed from my recollection now; but the other matters, reports from the northwest or other parts of the country, they come to me under cover, and I very rarely read them further than to see that they do not pertain strictly to my duties, and I turn them over to Mr. Tyner, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. Do you state, then, to the committee that in your official position no knowledge has come to you of frauds by mail-contractors where fines and deductions were made on account of those frauds—that you don't know anything about the amounts of the fines and deductions that were made?—A. No, sir; I do not know the fines and deductions that were made.

Q. You have never heard the officers in the Department speak of it?—A. I presume I may have heard them.

Q. Did you hear any officer in that Department say that the fines and deductions against Kittle were not as large as they ought to have been?—A. I do not recollect that I ever did.

Q. Did you ever talk with Postmaster-General Jewell about the fines and deductions in the Kittle contract?—A. I may have done so.

Q. Please remember if you did.—A. If I did it would be incidentally. I cannot say.

Q. It does not make any difference how it was; I wish to know what your conversation was in regard to that?—A. Well, I do not know that I remember. I have an indistinct recollection that I talked with him about these matters.

Q. Are you in the habit of conferring with Postmaster-General Jewell?—A. Well, very briefly; yes.

Q. About matters of this kind?—A. Very briefly; that is, I may in the aggregate talk with him five minutes a day in matters that happen to come up in my business.

Q. Is it not a little strange that you cannot remember and recall a single conversation or expression of opinion between you and him in regard to these matters; you say you talked to him about it?—A. I say that I may have talked with him about it.

Q. Do not you know that you did talk with him about it?—A. I do not know why I should talk with him about it in particular, because it is something that would not concern me or my duties at all.

Q. Have you not talked with others about it?—A. Probably very little. I have talked with Mr. Hopkins about the investigation; he would be apt to remember more about that than I; these matters do not come specifically within the line of my duties, and whatever I would have to say about them would be incidental.

Q. Then you cannot remember things that do not come within the specific line of your duties?—A. Well, I can sometimes.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the men who have composed a ring in the city of Washington, or outside of it, and who are interested in mail-contractors that you found out were fraudulently performing or non-performing their service?—A. The contracts that we believed to be at that time fraudulent were the Kittle contracts. We did not investigate any other contracts in Texas particularly at that time. In answer to a question of that kind, I do not know that it would be proper for me to state that men composed a ring, unless I had ascertained and demonstrated the fact.

Q. I would like you to state this, then: In the payments that were made to these contractors, were any payments made by the Post-Office Department to other men besides Kittle as the result of these contracts?—A. As the result of what contracts?

Q. Kittle's contracts. The money that was due Kittle for carrying mail, was that money paid out by the Department to any one else besides Kittle?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. You do not know of any orders or drafts being given in any one else's name for the pay that was due him?—A. No, sir; I do not. I have no idea how he was paid.

Q. There is a Mr. Peterson a large mail-contractor, is he not?—A. He was at one time.

Q. And was entitled to a large amount of money. Now, I want to know if you have any knowledge that that money was paid to other persons besides Peterson?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have you ever talked to any individual about this?—A. About Peterson's moneys?

Q. Yes, sir.—A. No, sir. I do not know anything about his moneys. Mr. Peterson is a man whose name is familiar to me, but about the payments to him I know nothing.

Q. I understand you to say, then, that you have no knowledge of any frauds committed by any one in the Post-Office Department in connection with any of these fraudulent contracts?—A. Well, that would be pretty sweeping. We worked very hard last winter to break up frauds there, and a number of men that were believed to be very dishonest—

Q. What do you mean by "we" worked?—A. I mean I among others and the special agents.

Q. I would like to know what you found out.—A. We found out that a fraudulent stamp was used on a number of bids, and we found that a number of departmental clerks were engaged in these proceedings, and there might have been other frauds that we tried very hard to find out, but did not.

Q. By a fraudulent stamp you mean that that stamp was forged?—A. Yes, sir; forged.

Q. Did you get any knowledge in that investigation of the stamp being actually abstracted from the office?—A. The stamp was counterfeited.

Q. Did you find out how that counterfeit was made?—A. Yes, sir. One of the clerks in the Department furnished an impression of it to an engraver, and from that impression the engraver made the stamp.

Q. How did he furnish it?—A. I think that he got possession of it before the stamp was ever brought to the Post-Office Department, and had this impression made.

Q. In whose employ was that clerk?—A. He was in the employ of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. Who was the Second Assistant Postmaster-General at that time?—A. General Routt. I think Mr. French was acting as second assistant. I do not recollect whether General Routt had gone to Colorado or not. I left about that time.

Q. Who was the officer in charge of that seal?—A. Mr. French.

Q. Does the same officer have charge of the bids?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. His duty, then, is to keep the seal and the bids?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. This clerk was in his office?—A. Yes, sir; and I recollect the messenger who was sent for the seal was instructed by one of the clerks to bring the original seal to him, and he had possession of it for some little time before it was taken up to the Post-Office Department—long enough to make a number of impressions from it.

Q. Who was this counterfeit seal used by; for whose benefit?—A. It was used by Kittle on his contracts; it was used by one Hines on his contracts, Hines bidding in two instances in his own name, and the other instances, so far as we know, in the name of a man named Iddings, who professed to hail from Decatur, Alabama; quite a number of bids in his name, with Jerome J. Hines as one of the guarantors.

Q. Was there any seal used by other contractors of that character?—A. We have tried very hard to discover.

Q. Have you discovered that there was any other?—A. No, sir, we have not. We thought a week ago that we had, and two or three experts pronounced that a certain stamp was fraudulent. We discovered a fraudulent stamp, perhaps, within ten days—another counterfeit in addition to this one which Kittle used, a very perfect counterfeit, too, and in looking over the bids of the Southwestern States, commencing with Texas, it was the impression of Mr. Hopkins, to whom this investigation was intrusted, and mine also, that this counterfeit stamp had been used on those bids, and one or two experts that we called in pronounced the same opinion, but there was this difference: There was no doubt about the genuine stamp being used on the bids which were stamped first, that is, the States of Missouri, Iowa, and several others; they were stamped with blue ink. We have not been able to find out the exact sequence in which the States were stamped. The first States were stamped with blue ribbon, blue ink; the last States with black ink. It was our impression that as soon as the change was made from the blue to the black, in some way this counterfeit stamp was substituted for the genuine, and the testimony of the man who made the original stamp tended to confirm that first impression; and Mr. Hopkins spent several days in examining the matter. He took these stamps to the Treasury and they examined them very carefully, and so far as we have gone into the investigation they have pronounced all those stamps genuine. They say that the difference between the black ink and the blue is sufficient to account for the difference of measurement which we went by. And then there is another point which would tend to establish the fact that they are genuine; that is, there are certain small indentations on the genuine stamp which would be produced by injuries to it. It is put in a press and struck a heavy blow, and occasionally it sustains some small injury. There might be a pin in one of these bids that would make a mark across it, and Mr. Hopkins tells me that in all these bids which we supposed to be improperly stamped there were those indentations.

Q. Who are the experts? Give their names.—A. Mr. Casalier, of the Treasury, is one who pronounced it genuine.

Q. Who pronounced it a forgery?—A. The first man who pronounced it so was Mr. Lewis. He made the counterfeit stamp for Kittle. Mr. Chambers, who made the genuine stamp, (that is, he has the contract, but it might have been some employé of his who made it,) first pronounced it counterfeit; but he afterward pronounced it genuine. They had some little doubt at the Treasury, but, after a minute examination, they pronounced them all genuine. Now, to show you how we reasoned about this matter, this counterfeit was found in the possession of a woman, a servant at a sort of a cheap hotel here, and the account she gives of the stamp is this, and I supposed at first that her story was false: She says, at the time there was so much excitement about this matter, Channell was hidden at her hotel by Kittle, and there was no fire in his room, (it was along in May,) and he gave her a package of papers to burn up. This is the same man who had the original stamp brought to him before it was taken to the Department. In throwing the papers into the fire, she noticed something heavy, which dropped out, and which proved to be this counterfeit stamp. Channell was sick during the time those bids were opened, and of course the inference we drew immediately was that if this counterfeit stamp had been used in the press, then the story of the girl was a falsehood, because no combination powerful enough to get that stamp into the press in any way would ever trust such a vagabond with it. Now, if that counterfeit stamp was made for some purpose, if the girl tells the truth that she got the stamp through Channell, it is possible that it may be on two or three bids on some of those States. We are going through with them very thoroughly now, to see if we can find any impressions of that stamp. He was a very bad fellow, and, if he got it made, he got it with a view of selling the use of it to contractors, and it is possible that somebody may have bought the use of it. We are examining very thoroughly now to see if we can find any trace of it, but so far we have not. I mean, when I say "we," Mr. Hopkins, to whom this matter has been intrusted, with the aid of experts that he has called in. He has been, I believe, very thorough in it.

Q. Were not the bids themselves abstracted from the office for the benefit of this contractor Kittle?—A. We heard that they were. That is, we got it from the testimony of these accomplices. According to the testimony of some of them they were carried one night into the room of a clerk by the name of Van Vleck, in the Auditor's office, and examined improperly. According to the statement of another they were taken out by Channell and exhibited to contractors; taken out of the rooms where they should properly be kept.

Q. Whose rooms are those? Who had charge of them?—A. After the impression of this seal is put on them, which is supposed to authenticate them for the future, they are then distributed in the rooms of the different clerks having charge of the various States. Before they are stamped they should be in the safe that Mr. French had custody of at that time.

Q. I understand you they were abstracted before they were stamped?—A. They are kept in the safe until stamped. That is my understanding of the routine; it is nothing that I have anything to do with, but my understanding is that they are kept in a large safe until this seal is put on them, which is supposed to authenticate them for all coming time. After that they are distributed to the rooms of the various clerks; those belonging to Texas would go to the Texas clerk, those belonging to Arkansas to the Arkansas clerk, and so on. They are then put in cases somewhat like those, (the book-cases in the committee-room.)

Q. Do I understand, then, that this contractor abstracted these bids from the clerks to whom they had been distributed?—A. Yes, sir; either with or without their knowledge. There were some of those clerks we all know to have been corruptly connected with these transactions; but they might be abstracted from the desk of the clerk without any complicity on his part, perhaps, if they could get false keys.

Q. I would like to know whom you sent out for the purpose of working up the Peterson contract.—A. There was a man by the name of Morehouse, an ex-special agent, who was set down into Louisiana—

Q. What was the name of the messenger who delivered the stamp to the clerk?—A. Rothrock. He is an imbecile, almost. The poor fellow, I do not know that he had any knowledge of it. Channell told him to bring the stamp to him, and he did it. A man by the name of Morehouse was sent down there. He was a man that came—

Q. Have you any knowledge that he worked up any frauds in these contracts?—A. Well, the impression we formed of him was that he was pretty much of a humbug. He was a man that had formerly been employed as a special agent of the Post-Office Department. He was dismissed. He was one of the special agents discarded several years ago, and he came to me in, perhaps, May or June last, and wanted to be appointed for thirty days, on the representation that he could find out a great deal about frauds in the State of Louisiana, and I requested the Postmaster-General to commission him for thirty or sixty days, so that he might go and investigate them. He went down, and was absent about sixty days, and made a number of reports, which I turned over to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. The Second Assistant examined them very closely, and made up his mind, I believe, that his reports were almost valueless; that this man could not be depended upon.

Q. What were his reports?—A. I cannot say. His reports show for themselves.

Q. Do you remember anything about them?—A. I do remember something about them.

Q. What do you remember

Mr. CANNON objected to the question, but withdrew the objection with the understanding that the witness was not asked to state the contents of the reports.

A. I remember the last report he made particularly, because he was just going out of the service. You will find those reports filed, I presume, in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I took him, as he was going out of the service, to the Postmaster-General, and he read his last report, and the Postmaster-General gave me a very loud blowing up for ever bringing such a vagabond into the service. The point was this: There was no point at all in this report, but he was always going to do something. The impression that he intended to make was, "You put me in a while longer and I will find out something."

Q. Do I understand you to say that he did not find out anything?—A. Yes, sir; he made some specific charges against Peterson.

Q. What manner of charges were they?—A. There was one about going out of the way to supply an office in which Peterson was interested at some cost to the Government.

Q. That is what you call a side-office?—A. Yes, sir. Mr. Tyner took that matter up and investigated it, and explained to me afterward that the report of this man was false on that point.

Q. You were going on to tell about this side-office.—A. Well, his charge was that it cost the Government $600 a year to supply that office for Peterson's benefit. That was the charge on that point; and Mr. Tyner explained to me afterward—that is, it was none of my concern, but he showed me that the man's statement was incorrect on that point.

Q. What was his statement about the side-office? What side-office was it—on what route?—A. It was on a route running across the country, starting on the Mississippi River. The terminal office is a sort of a boat-house; the name escapes me at this moment, but it is on that route from Alexandria to Shreveport. There is a main trunk-line running parallel with the Red River and close to the Red River.

Q. This detective that you speak of made a report that was not credited. Was any other agent sent out to work up those frauds?—A. Yes, sir. David B. Parker, a special agent, was sent out before Morehouse. It escaped my recollection, or I should have put it in that order. He was sent to New Orleans, I think, early in the spring of 1875; he may have been sent there in February; I could not say about that. Among other things, he was to investigate the whole service thoroughly. He did investigate Peterson's routes, one in particular that I remember, a route running from New Orleans north, up the river. It runs about two hundred miles, and I think the nominal terminus is Red River Landing.

Q. Did he find that all correct?—A. No, sir.

Q. What was the matter with that contract?—A. According to law and the regulations, Peterson ought to have had a boat to carry that mail, and we found that he was putting it aboard any boat that he could find to take it, and sometimes it was not carried at all. There is a tri-weekly mail running up there that was very well carried, indeed, and this was supposed to be a supplementary mail. The tri-weekly mail was carried from New Orleans to Vicksburgh, and this was supposed to run on the alternate days as far north as Red River Landing. You see, it would ostensibly make a daily communication with that mail-route across the country. According to Parker's reports there were no boats that run regularly on those alternate days, but Peterson was in the habit of hiring any casual boat to take the mail, at the convenience of those boats.

Q. What other contracts of Peterson did he investigate?—A. I think that was perhaps the only contract in Peterson's name.

Q. Well, contracts that he was known to be interested in?—A. I don't know that he investigated any other. We told him to go over this same route. He was instructed to go over the route to Alexandria and to Shreveport, and to investigate thoroughly the manner in which the service was performed; but when he got up to Red River Landing the whole country was under water, and he reported that he could not go there that time.

Q. Were the contracts annulled?—A. This contract that I speak of—my impression is that it was.

Q. How did you get that impression?—A. I don't know; that is my impression—that it was annulled at that time. This evidence came into my hands, and I turned it over to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who took action on it.

Q. Peterson, you say, had no boats?—A. No, sir.

Q. Has he not been a contractor for a long time on the river?—A. I believe he has.

Q. Has he contracts for which he never put in any bid? I notice in the book of contracts that Pearson is carrying the mail, and in the list of bidders that is published his name does not appear.—A. I think the name of Peterson is pretty much eliminated from our records; that is, it appears on the records, but I don't think we have any connection with him.

Q. I asked in regard to contracts that he had heretofore that expired 1st of July, 1875, for instance. I wish to ascertain what contracts on the Mississippi and other tributary rivers Peterson had, expiring, say, July 1, 1875.—A. There was this Peterson and a Bodine C. Peterson, a relative of his, or perhaps a figure-head; I don't know. I think that on a letting which occurred a number of years ago they had the contracts from Memphis—I may be mistaken about this, but I think they had two routes, one from Memphis down to Helena or some point near Helena, perhaps Red River Landing, and another from Red River Landing to Vicksburgh. I think Red River Landing is the dividing office there; if not, it would be Helena. If you have an old advertisement it would show.

Q. Take, for instance, route 8006, from Vicksburgh to New Orleans, 408 miles, twice a week and back in steamboats, &c., lowest bidder William Williams, July 7, 1871. Contract with B. H. Peterson, three times a week, $37,000 per annum. Was that one of the contracts?—A. That is a matter away back in 1871.

Q. Yes, sir. When did that contract expire?—A. I think the contracts on the Mississippi River expired on the 30th June, 1875, and I think that temporary service was performed there for quite a while. Mr. Leathers and Mr. Tobin have been doing the work.

Q. You do not know anything about the price they are getting for doing the work?—A. I do not.

Q. I asked you a while ago if Peterson had not on the Mississippi River a large number of contracts.—A. There were a number in the name of Peterson.

Q. Was it not within the knowledge of the Department, from those investigations made by special agents sent out by you, that Peterson was neither the owner nor the master of the steamboat?—A. I think it was.

Q. Then I would ask you if the law or regulation of the Department does not require that the man to whom the contract was let, outside of the regular bidder, should be either master or owner of the steamboat?—A. The law is there to speak for itself.

Q. Is not that the general action of the Department?—A. My impression is that it is.

Q. Then I understand you to say that that investigation brought out the fact that he was not the owner or the master of the steamboat?—A. Mr. Parker's reports would be on file, and I presume that that statement is included among them, with reference to the performance of the service between New Orleans and Vicksburgh. You have the record there, the contract for the tri-weekly service between Vicksburgh and New Orleans, in the name of Peterson.

Q. Yes.—A. Well, the service was actually performed between Vicksburgh and New Orleans three times a week, by the steamboats, one of them commanded by Captain Leathers, a very fine steamboat, and another one by Captain Tobin, and our reports were that that service was performed according to contract.

Q. Do you know how that service was performed—they were not Peterson's steamboats?—A. No, sir; they were not Peterson's steamboats. The report of Parker was that this short route in the name of Peterson, from New Orleans north to Red River Landing, three times a week, was very improperly performed.

Q. You understand, then, that the contract was annulled on that route?—A. I think it was.

Q. Were there any fines and deductions made?—A. My vague impression is that he was not paid for it; that the contract was annulled, and that he was not paid that quarter; but my impression is very vague about that.

Q. I understand that this fact, that this contract had been let to Peterson, who was not the owner or master of the steamboat, was brought out fully, and brought to the attention of the Post-Office Department?—A. Yes, sir; the fact was brought out that he had no steamboat running between New Orleans and Red River Landing three times a week to carry that mail, and that the service was very improperly performed. He may have been interested in some steamboat. I cannot say about that.

Q. Don't you know that he also had a contract from Saint Louis to Memphis, and from Memphis up White River, routes carried by steamboat?—A. Yes, sir; I think he did. The records would show just what routes he did have.

Q. And you think, then, that no action was taken in regard to these other contracts with Peterson, but they expired July 1, 1875?—A. I think they expired July 1, 1875.

Q. You don't remember whether Parker made any reports about these other routes or not?—A. I do not think he did. His specific instructions were to go to New Orleans, and look into the service there, and then go up to Red River Landing and across the country to Shreveport; but it was under water at the time.

Q. Is Peterson a contractor now, or interested in any contract with the Department?—A. I do not know.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. Were there any parties suspected by you of being implicated in any effort to defraud the Government by fraudulent contracts, other than those mentioned; and, if so, who?—A. I do not know that it would be right for a man to mention suspicions of his where he is not able to prove it, because I might do men great injustice. Of course, in our business, we may suspect innocent people. We try to get at the truth the best way we can, and if we fail it would not be right to mention any suspicions we have.

Mr. AINSWORTH. I shall insist upon an answer to the question, and perhaps follow it by asking what efforts were taken to ascertain whether the suspected parties were engaged in that fraudulent business.

Mr. MCMAHON asked the witness to furnish the committee with a list of straw-bidders.

The WITNESS. You had better apply for that to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. It does not come at all within my province.

Mr. AINSWORTH insisted upon an answer to his question.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. STOWELL objected.

The WITNESS. I might do innocent parties the most grievous injustice. It is a part of our code to keep all our surmises to ourselves. We go into a post-office and there are four clerks there; we suspect that one of them is stealing; it is our business to find out that man and apprehend him. But if we fail, it would be a very improper thing to scatter our suspicions about. I know that I can say that we have labored conscientiously to run our department with absolute purity.

Mr. AINSWORTH. That is an answer that ought not to be taken down.

Mr. STOWELL. In addition to the objection of the witness there is another. If the Post-Office Department is honest in its efforts to discover these frauds, the bringing out of suspicions here would entirely put a stop to any proceedings they may be taking against the suspected parties.

After a brief discussion in regard to the admissibility of this question, the committee adjourned.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1876.

JOHN A. SCUDDER sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. In Saint Louis.

Q. What is your business?—A. I am president of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company.

Q. Do you know the character of the mail-service performed between Saint Louis and New Orleans?—A. No, sir; I know the character of the service particularly between Saint Louis and Vicksburgh, and I have familiarity with it from there to New Orleans.

Q. You represent a steamboat-line?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did that line have any mail-contracts between Saint Louis and Vicksburgh, prior to July 1, 1871?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you state the terms upon which you carried the mail in those contracts?—A. No, sir; I cannot. I left home upon a very short notice, and, of course, when we lost a contract, that was the end of it. We never kept any record of even our bids.

Q. You carried the mail, then, on your own contract, up to July 1, 1871?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you just one contract?—A. No, sir; we had a contract from Saint Louis to Memphis, and from White River to Vicksburgh, I think; I am not positive, but that is my impression.

Q. You cannot say what pay you received on those routes?—A. No, sir; I presume that is a matter of record.

Q. Was there any other steamboat doing mail-service on those routes?—A. No, sir; I think not. There may have been little short routes in there that I do not know anything of.

Q. Did you put in bids July 1, 1871, to carry the mails on the route you spoke of?—A. We did put in a bid to carry the mail from White River to Vicksburgh.

Q. That is route 7505 in this book. Do you remember your bid for carrying the mail?—A. I do not, sir.

Q. I see it is put down at $7,000 in this book.—A. $7,000, I think, is correct.

Q. You did not get the contract?—A. No, sir; it was not awarded to us under the bid.

Q. Was that a bana-fide bid by your company?—A. Yes, sir; of course. We never make anything else.

Q. Did the Postmaster-General, through his officers, make or offer to make contracts with you at the amount of your bid, at any time afterward?—A. We had no notice of any informality in the bid.

Q. Did you ever receive notification or offer from the Post-Office Department to make contracts with you at the amount of your bid?—A. Not to my knowledge, sir. I have no recollection of it.

Q. That is, neither the Postmaster-General nor any officer of the Department made any such offer to you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Would you have been willing to contract at those bids?—A. Certainly, sir.

Q. What action did you take about carrying the mail in July, 1871?—A. We learned—I don't think through the Department, I have no recollection now of learning anything from the Department whatever, not a word—but of course we learned indirectly, that we were not the successful bidder, that the contract was awarded to some one else. I gave instructions then to our steamboats to stop receiving the mail, to put it on shore wherever it was brought on board. That created so much disturbance among the people down there, who could not seem to understand the matter, that in a few weeks or a month, I don't remember the time exactly, Mr. Peterson came on to Saint Louis, and, although it was against our rules to contract with a subcontractor, we made a contract with Peterson to carry the mail at $10,000 per annum.

Q. Do you remember what time you made the contract with Peterson?—A. I see by my books that it was in August, 1871. That was for carrying the mail from White River to Vicksburgh.

Q. You commenced carrying the mail for Peterson, at $10,000 per annum, about the 1st of August, 1871; now, who carried the mail from the 1st of July to the 1st of August?—A. I don't know. I don't think it was carried at all. That is my impression.

Q. Was there any other steamboat-line other than yours?—A. There is no steamboat-line running regularly except ours. There are, of course, miscellaneous boats running all the time, and the service may have been performed on those boats. It may have been a week or two after we received the notice, and we may have carried them until we learned that we were the unsuccessful bidders. When we learned that we stopped carrying the mails. I don't know exactly when that was.

Q. What do you know of Dr. B. H. Peterson?—A. I have never seen the gentleman but twice; that was at that time and once since. I know nothing of him.

Q. Who did he give you to understand he was when he employed you to carry the mail?—A. He made no representations to me any more than that he was Mr. Peterson, a mail-contractor.

Q. Did he make any representations about there being anything peculiar about his contract?—A. No, sir.

Q. In the terms you made with him, was there anything said about fines and deductions?—A. We were to stand fines and deductions. They were to be deducted from our pay of $10,000 per annum, and they were deducted.

Q. Did you carry the mail during that time of his contract running from that period to the 1st July, 1875?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How were you paid?—A. The payments were made for the first two years pretty promptly; since that time they have not been made promptly. He is still in our debt for the service.

Q. Do you know what Peterson got for carrying the mails, what his contract was?—A. I do not.

Q. You have stated that he was still in your debt; please explain that to the committee.—A. I don't know how to explain it, unless that it is simply a refusal on his part to pay. I have written to him in every direction, but have never been able to get paid.

Q. Did he ever give you a check or draft?—A. Yes, sir; he gave me a check; but even outside of that he is indebted to the company.

Q. What became of the check?—A. It was protested, and is still unpaid.

Q. About how much is he indebted to you?—A. It is pretty difficult for me to tell, because I have no knowledge of the fines and deductions.

Q. Taking as the basis the fines you have already paid, how much?—A. I suppose he owes $8,000 or $10,000.

Q. Tell the committee how much fines and deductions you did pay during that time?—A. We figured it out the other day $2,698.29. That was up to February 1, 1873. Since that time we have had no settlement with Mr. Peterson.

Q. You don't know whether any fines have been assessed since that time or have not been?—A. No, sir; but I know that they should be.

Q. Are you acquainted with the general character of the mail-service on the western rivers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you a sufficient knowledge of the prices that the mails have been carried at by steamboats on the Mississippi River, under contracts for the last few years, within the period that you have been talking about, to know the actual cost and the profit that ought to come to contractors for carrying the mail? And, if so, please state to the committee; state whether the price they have received has been proper, or whether they have been largely overpaid.—A. The price that those bids were made at was a very low price. There seems to be considerable inconsistency about these bids, even between the amount that is paid now under Mr. Jewell and those bids; for instance, for that same service now we are getting about $17,000. At the close of the rebellion, on the Mississippi River, as you all know, there were but very few of those landing made. For instance, in the mail-route between White River and Vicksburgh, probably there were not over eight or ten mail-landings at one time. Since that time they have been increasing every year, and the service has become, of course, more difficult to perform; and, consequently, it is worth more money to perform it.

Q. How often did you carry the mails between White River and Vicksburgh?—A. We carried them three times a week. I think if you look at the proposals you will find that they are made for twice a week, but we carried them three times a week. We charge nothing extra for the three times a week.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. Was your contract with Peterson to carry twice or three times a week?—A. It was to carry twice a week.

Q. Were you prevented at any time from carrying the mail regularly from ice or any other cause in the river?—A. Yes, sir; we were. I cannot answer that without giving the date, because it occurs every year, more or less, except this one; this has been an exception.

Q. Were these fines and deductions made for that reason, to cover those failures?—A. This $2,698 was.

Q. Have you any idea whether the amount that is paid there was sufficient to cover the failure to carry the mails during the time, up to January, 1873?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you any knowledge of whether it has been the habit of contractors on the Mississippi carrying two different mails and making one common carrier or steamboat carry both mails?—A. I have heard of such things, but we have nothing of the kind on our route.

Q. Do you know anything of the kind on other routes?—A. I could not state that positively. I only know that from hearsay.

Q. Did you ever hear any contractors state so?—A. No, sir; I have not.

Q. State how you got your knowledge.—A. I simply got my knowledge in a general way. I could not state how, or where it came from.

Q. Can you tell on what routes it was?—A. No, sir.

Q. On what part of the river or who owned the steamboats?—A. My impression is that it was on the route from Memphis to White River; that there are mails there that might be carried upon one boat. It is not the case now, but I think it was at that time. I don't state that positively, though; it is only my impression.

Q. State whether the rates that you have understood were paid for transporting the mails to Peterson were not exorbitant?—A. If you will state the amount I can tell better.

Q. Did you consider the $10,000 you got from Peterson sufficient?—A. I did at the time. As I stated before, there is an inconsistency in this thing, which I have tried to explain to you, in regard to the landings; you understand that.

Q. How long were you a subcontractor?—A. I see by my books that it was from June 30, 1871, until June 30, 1875.

Q. Were you ever offered any inducements by Mr. Peterson, or others, not to bid?—A. No, sir; never.

Q. And I understand you to say that after you put in your bid, you received no notification from the Department?—A. We never did, sir.

Q. Did you bid on this same service?—A. Yes, sir; we did last summer.

Q. What was your bid?—A. That I disremember, too. The bids are a matter of record. They were, however, deemed too high, all of them, and thrown out, and a contract made by us afterward with the Department.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. At a lower rate?—A. Yes, sir; something less.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were the contracts made outside of any regular advertisement?—A. Yes, sir. They were made under an advertisement, you might say. As I said, the bids we put in were thrown out, being deemed too high, and then we made a contract with the Postmaster-General at a less price.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Was that a temporary or permanent contract?—A. A permanent contract for three years. The bids were accepted, but the bonds made less.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you in Washington yourself to see to this?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who arranged these contracts for you?—A. Capt. Bart. Abell, the last time.

Q. Did you pay any attorney's fees to secure it?—A. Nothing at all, sir; not a cent in any way, shape, or form, except what I paid to Capt. Bart. Abell.

Q. You paid no portion of your mail-contract compensation?—A. No, sir. I never have done so in any way or shape.

Q. You say you never met this man Peterson but twice?—A. Twice, I think; possibly three times, but I think only twice.

Q. Do you know whether he has any contracts now or not?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know anything about his responsibility outside of what you have stated, that he did not pay?—A. No, sir; that is all.

Q. Do you know any reason why he did not pay you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Has he given you any reason?—A. Not at all, sir; I was not able to get an answer out of him at all.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. How did your service from February 1, 1873, to June 30, 1875, compare in efficiency with that prior to that time?—A. I do not think it was performed as well afterward, for the reason that we had an overflow there. Those overflows always interfere very materially with the mail-service. With that exception, it was performed as well. The same boats were running.

Q. What, in your opinion, should be the amount in fines and deductions for the time from February 1, 1873, to June 30, 1875?—A. That is impossible for me to form much idea about.

Q. Knowing the manner of service and the causes for fines and deductions, can you make an estimate? This last period was from July 1, 1871, until January, 1873, about eighteen months; and the other period was about two and a half years.—A. Then I should suppose it was larger than that.

Q. Has any complaint been made either by the Department or Mr. Peterson as to the manner in which you performed the service subsequent to February 1, 1873?—A. We never heard of them. They would come to Peterson from the Department, he being the contractor; they would not come to us.

Q. At the time the contract for carrying the mail was let to Peterson, was he either the master or owner of a steamboat, or interested in any line of boats running from Vicksburgh to White River?—A. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. Do you know that he was not the owner or part owner?—A. No, sir; I cannot state that. A man might own an interest in a steamboat without my knowledge; but I have no idea that he was or I should have known it.

The CHAIRMAN. Refer us to the book and to the person in whose name it appears to be let, not Peterson.

The WITNESS. In this book, on page 328, Executive Document, route No. 7505, 1871; in my opinion, there is not a bona-fide bidder there except the Memphis and Saint Louis Company.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You have another contract there; you may state about that.—A. On the same page, route 7504, there is not a bona-fide bidder to my knowledge, with the exception of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company, and that of A. J. White, (who may perform the service, he has a boat or two there,) and the Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company. This is the letting of 1871. I am even very doubtful about these two, but I name them because it is possible they might be bona fide. The others I have never heard of in the steamboat-line at all. In the bid for route 7504 I would consider the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company the lowest bidder, as their bid embraces the furnishing of route-agents and the others did not, I suppose, as it does not say so here. There was but very little service upon those routes at that time.

By Mr. MCMAHON:

Q. State to the committee whether your bid in that matter was a bona-fide bid?—A. We never made anything else in our lives, sir.

Q. Was any application ever made to you for any temporary service or outside service on that route 7504?—A. Not that I have any recollection of.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Was the advertisement for route-agent service, or was that a matter that you put in?—A. I do not think the advertisement called for route-agent service. That is my impression.

Mr. CANNON moved to postpone the further examination of the witness until to-morrow, or until the Post-Office Department can produce before the committee all the records relating to the letting of the contracts on the two mail-routes in question; so that he (Mr. Cannon) might have an opportunity of examining them and framing questions upon them.

Mr. MILLER moved an amendment, that the chairman instruct the clerk to have the records produced before the committee to-morrow, (February 3.)

Mr. CANNON accepted the amendment; and the motion as amended was lost, ayes 3, noes 7.

Mr. McMAHON moved that the witness be permitted to return home, with the understanding on the part of the committee that if, after Mr. Cannon shall have examined the papers, the committee deem it necessary, upon his showing, to examine the witness further, he shall be recalled. Agreed to.

A d j o u r n e d .

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 4, 1876.

P. H. WOODWARD recalled and further examined.

The WITNESS. Before you proceed with the examination, gentlemen, I would like to correct my former testimony in one particular. I think I was asked whether I recollected or knew of any other frauds connected with the letting of contracts last spring, and the frauds in connection with Mr. Kittle were all that occurred to my mind when I answered. I now recall two other instances; that is, one other instance of fraud, and one where I think there was fraud. There were some bids put in by a man by the name of Nichols, of Iowa, that were found to be fraudulent in this, that the name of the postmaster at, I think, Osage, Iowa, was forged to a portion of them. I took the bids myself to the officers of the Bank of the Republic, and they pronounced that if certain signatures of his were genuine then these were forged. We sent an officer out there, and the postmaster admitted, at first, that they were forged, but afterward tried to evade it. There were two other bids that never were put in which there was some question about. I believe they were produced by Channell (one of the clerks who was engaged in those frauds on the Department, and who was discharged) about the close of February. They were bids made by a man of the name of Chichester, of Arkansas. The certified checks were with them. Channell's statement in regard to the case was that these bids were given to him by Chichester, and that Chichester had offered him, I think, $50 apiece if he would slip them in, but that, as he was working in the interest of Kittle, he would not go back on his friend, and so he declined to put them in. My opinion at the time was that the statement of Channell, although he was a great rascal and told a great many lies, was correct. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General attacked Chichester with considerable fury on the subject, and he denied the whole thing; he said that these bids went in at the proper time, and that he could not account for their being in the hands of this fellow Channell—that they went in before the last day for receiving bids; that he put them in properly; that if they got into the hands of Channell, they got there improperly. It was a question of veracity between Channell and Chichester. Mr. Tyner, the Second Assistant, brought Chichester to my room. After Mr. Tyner had had his talk with him, he came to the conclusion that Chichester told the truth, but I maintained the contrary opinion; though we were both judging by the physiognomy, of the general character of men; there was no other evidence, as I recollect, except their own statements. With regard to those two bids, I think about that Mr. Kittle had some personal knowledge of them, as well as Channell—knowledge aside from what Channell told him; it may be that they were in his hands; though I based my opinion upon the statement of both men. So far as I now recollect, there were no other frauds that were discovered. Perhaps, if I thought this matter over longer, others would suggest themselves to me, but I do not recall any other case now.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. The question which I asked at the last meeting, and which was not answered, was, Were there any other parties suspected by you of being implicated of attempts to defraud the Government by fraudulent contracts? If so, who, and what steps were taken by the Department to investigate the same?

Mr. CANNON objected to the question, in so far as it called for a disclosure of any suspicions not based upon evidence, but did not object, he said, to anything going to show that any fraud had been unearthed, or that there was reason to suspect any particular party of that Department, or that any officer thereof had been negligent of his duty in the matter. He moved to have the question modified so as to read, "Have you any knowledge touching any fraudulent bids, or any conspiracies to defraud the Post-Office Department in any way, manner, or form that you have not testified to? If so, please state them."

The motion was rejected.

The WITNESS. I understand, then, that I have no alternative but to answer the question, so that if anybody gets after me with a horse-pistol I cannot help it. Of course there is nothing about the matter that I wish to conceal, but on general principles it seems to me exceedingly improper to answer the question, that is all; it is only on principle that I object to it. I shall have to explain, briefly, how we got at the thing, in the first place. There were surmises in the Department, I cannot say how they arose, that there might be a counterfeit stamp extant. Of course, you understand the way in which it could be used to defraud other people. The last day for receiving bids was,

I think, the 30th of January, and any bids received after that were regarded as invalid, and so treated. The bids were opened and the seal put upon them, and they were then distributed among the clerks having charge of the various States to which the bids belonged. Now, by means of collusion with dishonest clerks inside of the Department, a contractor, who had one of these clerks in his fraudulent employment, could find out the lowest bids of particular routes; indeed, there is no telling what such a clerk might do; he might steal bona-fide bids or destroy them; he might do anything. But a contractor could get hold of the lowest bids on particular routes, and then could interpolate afterward a fraudulent bid of his own below the lowest figure of the genuine bids, and that fraudulent bid would seem to be genuine, having this imprint upon it. We had an idea—how we got it I cannot say now—that there might be a counterfeit stamp out, and Mr. Kittle was the man that was first suspected. I think the first lot of his bids was taken up to the Treasury experts by Mr. Tyner, but they failed to detect any counterfeit. The morning after that, I think, I had an engraver from Baltimore in my office, and we brought out Kittle's bids again, and he discovered seven or eight of them with this counterfeit stamp. Our presumption, of course, was that if one of them was fraudulently stamped they all were, but it seems that some bids that he put in were really below the other genuine bids, so far as he knew, (and I presume he had very correct information,) and there were only six or seven that bore this counterfeit imprint; and the reason they were not discovered at first probably was that none of the counterfeits happened to be taken to the Treasury, because the counterfeit was quite perceptible when we saw it. On the same day, I think, we found the engraver who had made this counterfeit stamp. Of course we didn't know for whose use it was made, and the next step in the proceeding was this: We observed that the bids in the name of one Iddings, for whom J. J. Hines was chief guarantor—and two of the bids were in Hines's own name—we observed that these bids ran very little, about a dollar or two, below the bids next above them. There were about twenty of them; our surmise was that very likely a counterfeit stamp might have been used upon them, and in that connection of the accepted bids the Iddings or Hines were produced.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I understand that Hines was one of the men who were prosecuted last summer and that Kittle was one of the witnesses against him.—A. Yes, sir. You will understand that Hines and Kittle were in copartnership; they had an agreement between them; Kittle turned State's evidence—that is, he told all the facts on his associates; he told everything that he knew, I presume. We found that these bids of Iddings and Hines were stamped with this counterfeit stamp. I do not recollect exactly the chronology of these matters, but about the same time we found that other case, the Nichols bids. I think his bids were for service in the Southwest, but he lives at Osage, Iowa. About the same time there was this difference of opinion between Mr. Tyner and myself with reference to the bids of Chichester. We did not know anything more than I have stated, but we had an idea that men who were professional contractors, and who would be in collusion with dishonest clerks in the Post-Office Department, might be guilty of any sort of an attempt of that kind to wrong each other and to wrong the public. However, these were all the discoveries we ever made, and, so far as I know, no fact was ever brought to light which would justify any suspicion against anybody else. I might state further, in answer to your question, that there were some bids put in in the name of a clerk in the Interior Department, as I understand, a man that I never saw to my knowledge; his name was Coffin. A number of men—Logan H. Roots, of Arkansas, and a man named Kinzey—are supposed to be interested in these bids. There may be four or five men that are interested in them. Some of those bids were certified to by a postmaster at Falls Church village, over here in Virginia. These men were beneficiaries in the awards of many of those contracts. By that I mean that they receive a great many of these contracts—this combination in which several of these men are interested, the Texas Stage Company, as it is called. The fact that frauds were going on, the fact that we detected some, the fact of the general belief on the part of the men who had detected that they were engaged in a fight with men who were using the same weapons as themselves, although they could not develop the exact method in which the others were working, for, of course, they were as much in the dark as we were—all this was enough to make us endeavor to find out, so far as we could, whether any other frauds had been committed; but we never got hold of the first clew which would lead up to these men. There was one Sunday when Kittle or Channell or both testified that they went together to the Texas room in the Post-Office Department to find the Texas bids, and all the bids were gone.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Who reported that?—A. Kittle or Channell, whichever one of them went there. They went in to put in bids, and they reported that the bids were out of the room at the time. Of course, if that was so, it was the work of some dishonest clerk; it must have been done in the interest of contractors if it was done at all.

Q. Who was the clerk in the Texas room at that time, where these bids ought to have been?—A. The clerk who had charge of the State of Texas in the contract-office at that time was Mr. Floyd; but I do not know that he was in custody of the room at that time, for the clerks were mixed up so as to put them away from their desks. He was dismissed for frauds. I do not think, however, that he had charge of that room at that time, and I do not think that we suspected the party who had. If they got in they probably got in a back window, or there were several keys forged to the doors of those rooms. I know that they tried to hire Rothrock, a messenger there, to carry a key to one of those rooms to some party; the exact circumstance has passed from my mind, but I bring it up to show that there have been false keys used in this case. The presumption raised in our minds at once would be, that if parties would try to get hold of those bids for fraudulent purposes it would be parties who would be very materially benefited in the lettings. Now, the parties that I have referred to received a good many contracts—

Q. Who do you say received the information from those two men that they had gone to the Texas room?—A. They told me. It was either one or both of them who made the statement. It must have been Channell, I think, because Kittle would not have access to the Department on Sunday. Ten days ago we thought we had got another clue in this matter. I believe I explained that the other night—the discovery of a fraudulent stamp; but we have not found that stamp on a single one of those bids. They are being examined now, but so far as getting hold of any evidence implicating those men, we have not a particle. I did not want to say that, because if there is any I hope we shall yet discover it.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. What I wanted to know was, what efforts you made to determine whether there was any fraud committed?—A. That is why I went into this explanation. You see why we suspected the Hines case; it was because the bids fell just below the next higher bids, and in that case, if the bids of this combination had run as evenly as the Hines bids did it would have raised a strong presumption against them; but according to my recollection that was not the case. There was a great deal more discrepancy between them and the bids next above them, so that the suspicion was broken down.

Q. Did you do anything to ascertain whether the Hines bids were genuine or not?—A. Yes; and we found that they were fraudulent. They bore the counterfeit seal. We found also a portion of the Kittle bids bore a fraudulent impression. If Kittle had kept out of this thing he would have been well off; he would have got a good many contracts by his regular bids; but his fraudulent bids vitiated the whole of them, and it is my impression that all his bids were thrown out for that reason. I have a very strong impression also that all the Nichols bids that had this fraudulent certificate of the postmaster at Osage, Iowa, were thrown out. Whether his other bids were thrown out or not, I cannot say; but I have no doubt they were. If they were not, it would be, I presume, because the Department felt that they had not law for doing it. But I cannot say whether they were thrown out or not. The records will show.

Q. Was there any prosecution or proceedings instituted against Nichols?—A. I think not.

Q. In his case there was no lack of proof?—A. The proof was not of so damaging a character as it was in the other case. We had a very clear case against Hines. The courts here and the juries of this District did not seem to help us very much, and it seemed a thankless piece of business to follow men with prosecutions which we felt that we could not make good. The feeling was that it was not—

Q. I understand you to say that the proof was conclusive that the signature of the postmaster at Osage had been forged?—A. The postmaster admitted it at first, but afterward denied it. I do not suppose there is an expert in the world who would not have said that the signatures which purported to be his were forged. He first admitted it, then denied, and in a third instance represented that Nichols was authorized to sign his name, which, of course, was an exceedingly irregular thing, even if it were so. The facts are all there, if anybody wants to prosecute upon them, but my opinion at the time was, and is still, that it would be utterly useless to try to prosecute it in this District, or perhaps anywhere else.

Q. Where is this man Nichols now?—A. I don't know. He is an old contractor and has been in Washington. I don't know the man by sight. There is another thing about this Nichols man; he was more or less connected with Hines; that is, Hines gave an order to Channell one night for $50 and Channell took it to Nichols, and Nichols gave him the money for it.

Q. Is your only duty to appoint detectives?—A. I do not appoint them at all. I don't have anything to do with their appointment.

Q. To detail them?—A. No. There is no end to our work except the limit of our time and ability to do it. The primary part of our work, that which overtops everything else, is catching depredators on the mails. You see how much work that involves; in the first place, locating your thieves, and then putting the right men to catch them; and in my management of the business, I look upon everything outside of that as very subordinate to it; that is, it takes so much abler men to do that than anything else; although, with one or two exceptions, our best detectives in that business are the ablest in every branch of the work.

Q. That is not in answer to the question. Is it not your duty, if you suspect a contract to be fraudulent, to put on foot investigations regarding it, or do you wait until the evidence is furnished without any effort on your part?—A. I am not supposed to know anything about fraudulent contracts. If there were good grounds of suspicion, they might come to us originally, but they would be more likely to go to the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and he would request that an agent should be sent to investigate them; and I should probably designate the man.

Q. You made no effort to ascertain any frauds, excepting such as were substantially known to you before the commencement of your investigation?—A. I don't know that I understand that question. If you refer to my personal, individual efforts, as I am stationed here in Washington, the only cases which I would have any immediate connection with would be those that would be convenient here, right in or around the Department, and where, to a greater or less degree, I would be co-operating with other men who were doing the running, and were, perhaps, more actively engaged than myself. For instance, in these investigations that I spoke of, there were one or two agents that rendered a great deal of aid, and perhaps took the principal part of the work.

Q. Do you know of any effort to investigate the contracts of any party who was suspected, unless the evidence was such as to force the investigation?—A. Your question is, whether we hunt about for fraudulent contracts?

Q. Yes; whether the Department does.—A. We give general instructions to our special agents to find out everything they can in regard to that service and report it to us; that is, frauds on the part of contractors everywhere. That is a part of their general duty.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. And they report to you?—A. They all report to me, throughout the country. We have a few in Chicago and Saint Louis. They would make their reports either to me to be handed over to Mr. Tyner, the Second Assistant, or they would make them directly to him.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. Do you ever make investigations of those reports when they are made?—A. I turn them over to Mr. Tyner, and if there is any further investigation to be made, he—

Q. Before turning them over do you investigate those reports?—A. No, sir; as he has the final decision in the case, I never regard it as incumbent on me even to read the reports.

Q. Do you read them?—A. Sometimes I do and sometimes I do not.

Q. Mr. Hopkins's report, was that made to you?—A. That was made to me, I think. Perhaps as he was not the first man that was sent out, it was thought to be safer to send his report to me than to the Second Assistant; and yet that report was stolen.

Q. Do you remember looking at that report?—A. That was stolen, you remember, before it got into my hands, and we never knew where it was stolen, whether in Texas, on the road, or in Washington; but my belief was that it was stolen by some dishonest clerk here.

Q. And it was impossible to investigate that?—A. Well, if a letter starts from Texas and comes to Washington, it is a long road to follow out a single letter. You will remember that one individual letter does not give us as good a clue as if there were more. It is by tracing several frauds to some one point that we find out the thieves.

Q. So there is no report from Hopkins now in the Department?—A. He undertook to supplement that afterward, but whether he did it verbally or in writing I could not say.

Q. You knew nothing about his report?—A. Nothing, except from his conversation. This report that was lost was valuable, as containing evidence from postmasters on the line, their certificates, or their oaths; and when he came back, of course it put him on the record in an unpleasant light. We believed him to be an honest, truthful man, but it put him in a very bad position on the record, because he made statements that certain service was fraudulent, and the statements of these postmasters would show that it was proper.

Q. And he was not able to cite you to any persons from whom he had received those lost certificates?—A. Yes, sir; they were received from the postmasters along the line.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Didn't I understand you to say that the postmaster at the San Antonio end of that route had either notified the Department of the fraud or corroborated Hopkins's statement?—A. I think he has written letters to the effect that the service was improperly performed. The postmaster at the other end, Corpus Christi, was certifying that everything was lovely. We found two letters from the postmaster at Corpus Christi making contradictory statements; and then, in explanation, he said that one time he was writing officially, and that in the other instance he was writing personally; that officially he told the truth, and that personally he lied.

By Mr. AINSWORTH :

Q. Has the Department made any effort to supply that lost testimony?—A. Whether it has or not I could not say; I am not aware of any.

Q. You have not detailed any person to attempt to supply it?—A. No, sir; not that I recollect of. It was our purpose to send Mr. Hopkins back, but other work kept crowding, and we took his word for the truth of his statements.

Q. What was done with Moorhouse's report when received?—A. I turned it over to Mr. Tyner.

Q. Is it there now?—A. I presume it is.

Q. Did the Government take any action to ascertain whether that was a correct report or not?—A. I presume that Mr. Tyner did. In fact, he stated to me that one of Mr. Moorhouse's reports, in some vital particular, was false.

Q. Do you know whether investigations were made?—A. What do you mean—investigations ad infinitum?—"flea on flea"—is that the theory?

Q. No, sir. I think you said, the other day, Mr. Tyner stated that Moorhouse's report looked scaly, and he did not propose to pay any attention to it. Now, I want to know whether he made any effort to ascertain whether it was really correct or not.—A. The source from which he derived his information I do not know.

Q. Do you know that he had any information contradicting any of the charges made by Mr. Moorhouse?—A. I cannot answer for Mr. Tyner's information.

Q. Do you know of any such information being in his office?—A. I have no particular knowledge of what is in his office.

Q. I don't ask that. Do you know of any particular information or document being in his office, or in the Post-Office Department, in anywise contradicting Moorhouse's report?—A. All that I know that is in Mr. Tyner's office is the brief statement that he made to me in regard to one vital point in the report. He said it was incorrect, and that he had the evidence there to show it. What the evidence was I do not know.

Q. I would like you to answer the question I have asked.—A. I have answered it most explicitly, as I understand it: that he made this statement to me, and that I do not know what his statement was based upon.

Q. Then I would like to know whether you know of any information being on file in the Department which contradicts Hopkins?—A. Well, I say that Mr. Tyner made this verbal statement to me. I have no knowledge of the information he based his statement upon.

Q. Did he make any application to you to detail anybody to see whether Moorhouse's reports were true or not?—A. It would be utterly impossible, with the multiplicity of work we had, to keep sending one man on the heels of another. We had sent two men already.

Mr. AINSWORTH. I must insist on an answer without statements of this kind.

The WITNESS. Well, a categorical answer to your question would give an entirely false conception of the manner in which we do our work.

Mr. AINSWORTH. You can answer the question, then, and made explanations afterward.

(Question repeated.)

A. No, sir; he did not. Now, I make the explanation that we have vastly more work than we can do, and therefore we cannot send agents one after another to remote districts to follow on the trail of such a man as Moorhouse is.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. Is Mr. Moorhouse one of your special agents?—A. He was a special agent several years ago, and he was discharged.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. Let me call your attention to an instance where the Department acted otherwise. Were you not sent to Dayton to investigate the postmaster there, immediately after Mr. Petherbridge made a report?—A. I was.

Q. Within a month?—A. Yes, sir; but ordinarily that would not happen. That was a case where there was a good deal of general interest manifested, and the investigation was re-opened. Your Dayton case was a very extraordinary case.

Q. Was it as important as the matter of Peterson's contract?—A. I don't think it was any more so.

Q. The Dayton matter was not a very large matter, was it?—A. No, sir; not very.

Q. It did not involve so much money to the Government as the Peterson matter did?—A. The point in this case was one involving some $600 a year. It was in regard to the supplying of a post-office, which Mr. Moorhouse represented was for the exclusive individual benefit of Peterson.

Q. That was all there was in Moorhouse's report, was it?—A. No; I cannot tell what there was in the report. The reports are there, and will show for themselves. That was the particular point that Mr. Tyner brought up.

Q. Were there no other charges against Peterson in that report but one involving $600 a year?—A. I don't know of any charges being made there in particular about Peterson's routes. As I told you, we found that one of those routes was managed very improperly. Peterson had more or less to do with the steamboat-line—

Q. You misunderstand the question now. I am confining it to the report that was made by Morehouse and Parker against Peterson. I am not asking of what you subsequently discovered. Were there not other charges made in the Morehouse report against Peterson?—A. Morehouse's reports were rambling and inconsequential, and he was always just going to find out something. He had been a special agent of the Post-Office Department before, and had been removed, and he was very anxious to get back. I, personally, was very anxious to get hold of the facts with regard to the Peterson routes. Morehouse had been there, and he said he knew all about them, and could get at all the facts. At my solicitation the Postmaster-General, without seeing him, appointed him, but when he came back his reports were rambling, and his whole aim seemed to be to get back into the service by talking about what he could do if he were continued.

Q. If you were so anxious to get at the facts with regard to the Peterson routes, and Morehouse's reports were so entirely unsatisfactory, why did not you detail somebody else to investigate them?—A. I had already sent two men there. One of the best men we had had spent a month there in the winter, and Morehouse was about two months there, and by that time Peterson's contracts had all expired, and Peterson had become defunct, so far as we were concerned; his pay was cut off—a great deal of it. I don't remember how much, but I remember his attorney was whining around the Department about it. When Morehouse got back it was the 1st of August, and Peterson's contracts had expired on the 1st of July.

Q. Who was that other agent?—A. Mr. Parker. He went there in the winter. He was ordered to go over there, but you remember I told you that he was unable to do so on account of the country being flooded.

Q. The first man did not find anything on account of the high water and the second man's report was rambling?—A. Yes; Mr. Parker did find out that Peterson's route from New Orleans up to Red River Landing, that tri-weekly route, was a sham, and it was on his discovery that the route was broken up, if it was broken up, as I presume it was.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. Do you know a man named Sickles, or is there a man of that name in the Department?—A. There is such a man there now.

Q. Do you know Mr. Holbrook?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did not Sickles go up to you and tell you all about the Peterson frauds?—A. I don't remember anything about Sickles coming to me. We got information from so many sources, partly fact and partly surmise, that I can't remember. He may have done so.

Q. You do not deny that he did so?—A. He may have done so.

Q. Didn't you tell Mr. Holbrook that you had evidence enough to sink Peterson and his contracts to perdition—more than he, Holbrook, ever dreamed of?—A. I don't know whether I ever told him so or not. I have a very poor opinion of Peterson and his contracts.

Q. Didn't you tell Holbrook that you would have Peterson's contracts annulled in twenty-four hours?—A. It would be a very extraordinary speech to make, for I do not usually talk in that way.

Q. Or that they would be annulled within twenty-four hours?—A. I do not remember that I said so, and, on general principles, I should say I never did, for I am not in the habit of making threats of that sort.

Q. Was not Holbrook subject to your order as a special agent?—A. To a certain extent.

Q. Didn't you examine the records of the Post-Office Department to ascertain what frauds Peterson had committed?—A. I examined the records to find out the history of Peterson's connection with the Post-Office Department.

Q. Did you find any service that he had been paid for and had not performed?—A. Yes, sir. This route on the Mississippi River, from New Orleans to Red River Landing. That is, he performed it very improperly, so that it was tantamount to no performance at all. He had a contract for carrying the mail three times a week as far as Red River Landing, to supplement the regular mail, but the evidence was that there was no regular boat to carry it; that he would give $5 to any casual boat for carrying the mail; that the mail was very light anyhow, and that sometimes it would reach there behind the regular packets, and that for four or five weeks there was no return mail from Red River Landing at all. That appeared by Mr. Parker's reports.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. Was not that an increased mail-service, from three times a week to a daily mail?—A. No, sir: this was a new service when he took it.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. He was paid for that contract which you say he did not perform?—A. I think not, sir. He may have been paid for it before the fact was discovered, but I don't think he ever received any pay after that fact was discovered.

Q. Mr. Hopkins made up a statement for you of Peterson's fines and deductions, didn't he?—A. I think not. He was not on Peterson's route.

Q. Then Hopkins never showed you any statement of fines and deductions against Peterson?—A. Hopkins was on an entirely different route. He was sent to Texas, and this was on the Mississippi River.

Q. I am asking about what Hopkins did here among the records.—A. Mr. Hopkins has made a great many investigations in the Department records in regard to those contracts in the Southwest.

Q. What I want to know is whether he did not make up here, and show you, a statement of fines and deductions against Peterson?—A. I have no recollection of that whatever. He may have done so, but I do not recollect it, and my belief is that he never has investigated Peterson's routes at all.

Q. Do you know whether any fines and deductions were entered up against Peterson at all?—A. I didn't have anything to do with fines and deductions, but my impression is that after the discovery of this fraud, not only was the contract annulled, but that the pay that would have been already due him on the quarter never was allowed. He was receiving about $5,000 a year on that contract.

Q. Were any fines against Peterson remitted?—A. I don't know anything about that. It does not come within my province.

Q. Do you remember whether you opposed the remission of his fines?—A. I never opposed the remission of any fine of Peterson. I never have done anything to screen Mr. Peterson from any consequences of his own acts.

Q. You never had charge of the Peterson papers at all?—A. I looked through the records to find the history of Peterson's routes on the Mississippi.

Q. Did you have those papers in your possession some time?—A. They are large books. I have gone through the books and examined them.

Q. Did you ever have them in your possession outside of the post-office building?—A. I have had papers in regard to different routes in my possession; I cannot say whether I have or have not had those papers.

Q. Did you ever take those papers and get into a carriage with the Postmaster-General with them, and go away from the Post-Office Department?—A. I have no recollection of having done anything of the kind, now; but possibly I may have done so.

Q. I will specify about the time—about the 1st of January, 1875.—A. I don't recollect it. The information I got was on the books or records of the Post-Office Department, and there were some cases where I looked into the history of the routes to see if I could find any recommendations or reasons why certain things were done; now, whether I did that in regard to the Peterson routes or not I can't say; I do not see any particular reason why I should, because the facts are all drawn off on the record-books, and there would be no particular occasion for it.

Q. You say that you have no recollection of having had those papers outside of the Department, or having got into a carriage with the Postmaster-General and taken them off?—A. I do not think I ever got into a carriage with the Postmaster-General, but there were certain batches of papers that I took to my room to examine them at night, having no time during the day. I took them to my room and brought them back the following day.

Q. Did you ever carry them anywhere else?—A. No, sir; I do not recollect that I did. The only reason I took them out at all was because the days were not long enough, and in the evening I was quiet, and could go over them carefully.

Q. Then, I understand you to say that you do not remember anything about the fines and deductions against Peterson, if there were any, and that you never opposed the remission of them, and that, in fact, you had nothing to do with them?—A. I had nothing to do with the fines and deductions, and I certainly never opposed the remission of fines and deductions of Peterson. Anything that I might know about fines and deductions would be something that came to me casually and incidentally.

Q. You have no recollection of having said to Mr. Holbrook that you had evidence enough to sink Peterson and his contracts?—A. I know I had a bad opinion of Peterson, and I might have expressed it strongly.

Q. How did you get that bad opinion?—A. From examining the records.

Q. Did they satisfy you that there had been these frauds perpetrated by Peterson?—A. I do not know as you can call them frauds. Everything grew up under the laws as they exist.

Q. You say that you do not know that you can call them frauds?—A. These very things that affected my mind so unpleasantly in regard to Peterson, all seem to have the sanction of law. There is one exception that I want to make to them. There was a point brought up the other day as to whether a man who does not own a steamboat can be a bidder.

Q. Don't you consider it a fraud on the Government for a man to take a mail-contract, and then fail to carry the mail, and to receive pay for doing it?—A. Well, take this route that I have spoken of, from New Orleans to Red River Landing; I have given you all the facts as I found them, and a man can characterize that according to his pleasure, but I suppose they can refer to the other investigations and discoveries which I made in the books.

Q. I will ask you whether, after an examination of the papers and books in regard to the Peterson matter, and after discovering those irregularities, or frauds, or whatever you choose to call them, you communicated your information to the Postmaster-General.—A. I did.

Q. Did he annul the contracts on the strength of that information?—A. Well, we discussed that matter together.

Q. What was the result?—A. You can take the records and look them over and form your own calculations as to whether the facts conform to the law or deviate from it. Any opinion that I expressed would be merely an opinion of my own. But I think that when we discovered the frauds on this particular route on the Lower Mississippi, which would naturally exasperate one somewhat, the contract was immediately annulled. Peterson had one above that on the Mississippi River somewhere. There was another in the name of B. C. Peterson, who, I suppose, was a relative, or, perhaps, a mere figure-head, though that is a matter of opinion. It was some time in the month of March or April when this question came up. Now, I may be convinced that a contractor is a rascal, and yet he may be so completely hedged in behind the law, and may have managed his cards so well that we have no authority for touching him, and we have to do the best we can under the circumstances. Whether the Postmaster-General asked my advice in this case I do not know, but I recollect giving my opinion—it may have been a very unwise one—but it was within about three months of the expiration of the contract, and if we annulled those contracts we had to give the contractor one month's extra compensation. Mr. Peterson was then very intimately associated with the steamboat-men who were carrying the mails. The Post-Office Department, of course, had no means of determining his relation to them, but he claimed, I believe, to be their agent, and, in some instances, the steamboat-man admitted that he was authorized to speak for them. Now, if we had annulled those contracts we would be obliged to give those men one month's extra pay, and then to contract for the balance of the term with the same men on the best terms we could, so that it would have been a costly matter to the Government to have annulled the contracts on the Upper Mississippi River at that time.

Q. Was not one of the results of your investigation the discovery of the fact that Peterson never was a bidder at all on those routes?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was he a bidder or not?—A. I think Peterson got in on the river as a temporary contractor.

Mr. CANNON objected to the last question, first, because the witness could not know the fact; secondly, because it called for that which was a matter of record.

The WITNESS. As you know, those routes are let over and over again, under the law authorizing the Postmaster-General to contract for temporary service, for a period not exceeding six months, at a rate of compensation not exceeding that which was previously paid. There are four of those routes between New Orleans and Saint Louis, and on one or two of them, I think, Peterson came in as a temporary contractor; but my recollection is that in those relettings he appears more or less as a bidder.

Q. What do you mean by "more or less as a bidder"?—A. They were advertised every six months, and I mean that in some of those relettings he appears as a bidder, and in some he does not.

Mr. CANNON moved that the further sessions of the committee be held with open doors.

Lost—ayes 3, noes 4.

Mr. CANNON. This investigation has gone far enough to show that certain contracts with Peterson, with Kittle, and with Nichols are to be investigated. I move, therefore, that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General be called upon to appear before the committee as soon as he can, and to bring with him all the records of those cases, so that we may inspect the records and examine him in regard to his action.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee adjourned.

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1876.

JAMES W. BRADY sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. State your occupation or official position.—Answer. I am a clerk in the Sixth Auditor's Office.

Q. Please take the books and give the committee a history of the fines and deductions on mail-routes 7504 and 7505.—A. I find on route 7504, Arkansas, that A. J. White is the contractor from July 1 to December 31, 1871. His pay for that period was $1,248; no deductions or fines. On the same route the service of the Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company was recognized from February 14 to May 31, 1873, at $14,334.75 per annum. The pay for that period was $4,233.90. From June 1, the same parties were recognized (by another order of the Postmaster-General) to June 30. The pay for that period was $1,181.43. The total amount of the service which was performed under those orders was $5,415.43.

The Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company as contractors, (the other was recognized service,) was July 1, 1873, to June 30, 1875, the end of the contract-term of four years, at the rate of $21,500 per annum. The amount paid was $43,000. During that period of their contract-term there was a deduction of $714.01, and one of $412.14; also a fine of $10, making the fines and deductions $1,136.15. Out of these deductions there was remitted $714.01 and $412; so that there was really only thirteen cents deduction. That is, first, we deducted $714.01 and $412.14, then it was remitted $714.01 and $412. On that route, for the whole period, to those different parties, the whole amount of transportation accrued during that period, from the 1st day of July, 1871, to the 30th of June, 1875, was $50,789.44, including the fines and deductions; but deducting the deductions and fines, the amount actually paid was $49,653.29. That is a history of 7504, as I find it on the pay-books of the Sixth Auditor.

By Mr. AINSWORTH :

Q. I do not understand how you get from January 1, 1872, to February 1, 1873; I do not understand you to have given any amount for that period.—A. The first I find is from July 1, the first of the contract-term, to December 31, 1871. That I have given. Then the recognized service from the 14th of February to May 31, 1873, $4,233.90.

Q. Now, I do not understand how that gap is filled.—A. Probably I may have the dates wrong; I will refer back to the book and see. I do not know about any gap; I only give it as the record appears before me, [consulting the book;] the next volume does not make up for that interregnum of which you speak. The next service, according to the order here, is from January 1, 1872, to February, 1873. Here it is. There are six months in one book, six months from 1st January, 1872, to the 30th of June, that there is no service for on the book at all.

Q. Then the interregnum is a year, a month, and fourteen days?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. Suppose the service was imperfectly performed, and there was no settlement about it, then your books would not show anything about it?—A. Unless there was some special order from the Postmaster-General about that route. These books do not show any orders from the Postmaster-General recognizing any service during that period.

By Mr. AINSWORTH :

Q. Give that period particularly.—A. The Sixth Auditor's books, from January 1, 1872, to February 14, 1873, do not show any contract or recognition of service of any person.

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. And they would not show anything unless the Postmaster-General had certified to you?—A. Certainly not; there being no contract. If there was a contract it would show on the books.

Q. Unless it was in abeyance. It might be still unsettled in the Postmaster-General's Office?—A. Still the contract would show on the book. It is the duty of the Postmaster-General to send the contract to our office, or a certified copy of it, and it is placed on record, even if there was no payment made for the whole period.

By Mr. AINSWORTH :

Q. If any person had had a contract for carrying the mail over that route during that time, it should appear in your office?—A. It would appear on the books; the name of the contractor on the left-hand page, with his address; on the right, the compensation per quarter, the time from which the contract commenced, and the time at which it was to end.

Q. And those books on which it should appear are those books which you have here?—A. Yes, sir. I did not keep those books then. They were kept by a clerk who is now dead. I have had charge since April.

Q. And nothing appears on those books for that period?—A. Nothing appears on that book by which I can give you the information you seek for that period.

Q. The question is whether anything regarding it does appear?—A. There is nothing appears on here showing that there was any service performed or that there was a contract for that period. I have got through with 7504.

7505, recognized service of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company, J. A. Scudder, agent, from the 20th to the 31st July, 1871; the amount of transportation for that period, $442.30. There was a short contract made with B. H. Peterson from August 1 to December 31, 1871, at $18,400 per annum, and for that period was paid $7,650. It was then continued by order of the Postmaster-General from January 1 to June 30, 1872, and for that period was paid $9,200; the contract with Bodine C. Peterson commenced July 1 and continued to June 30, 1875. During that period was paid July 1 to December 31, $9,000; January 1 to June 30, 1873, $11,250; July 1, 1873, to June 30, 1875, two years, $54,000. The reason I gave those others in that way was because there was an increase of pay during the term, and I could not give the pay by quarters without showing the increase in the pay.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. What made the increase in pay?—A. An order from the Postmaster-General to increase the service to three times a week.

Q. Before that it was twice a week?—A. I don't know, sir; I suppose it was. Our books do not generally show the number of trips made per week, that is the pay-book does not show that, but there is a clerk now who checks the orders of the Postmaster-General, showing what the increase is for. There was remitted $606. The whole amount from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875, including this amount remitted, was $92,158.30. During that period was deducted, the first quarter, 1872, $88.46; $22.11 fines; the first quarter, 1873, $50 fines; the second quarter, 1873, $18 fines, also $10; the fourth quarter, $692.32 deductions, $59.89 fines; the first quarter, 1875, deductions, $5,865.68; second quarter, $86.54 deduction; the total amount of deductions during the period, $6,733; total amount of fines during the same period, $160; paid for special agent's fares, $3. A special agent passed over the road, and they collected from him for his fare, and it is charged to the company, as their contract compels them to carry special agents free. The whole amount of fines, deductions, and special agent's fare for the period is $6,896; which deducted from the amount of the transportation for that period (including the amount which was remitted, $606) leaves the amount paid $85,262.30; that includes the history of that route for the time.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The gross amount that you give is the compensation paid to every one, beginning with A. J. White?—A. No. A. J. White had nothing to do with 7505. Scudder, as the agent of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company, $442.30; and B. H. Peterson as contractor, and B. C. Peterson as contractor—the whole amount paid those three parties. It was very easy to ascertain the amount paid to each. Scudder, as the agent of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company, was paid $442.30; the amount paid B. H. Peterson for the period he had it was $17,850; the amount paid B. C. Peterson, $73,865.80.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. I suppose you have given us all that your books show?—A. Yes, sir; in these two cases.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 5, 1876.

GEORGE W. CHEEK sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State where you reside and what your occupation is.—Answer. I reside in Memphis, Tenn. I am superintendent of the Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company. The members of that company are, myself, George Malone, Mark R. Cheek, Thomas H. Cheek, A. Carr, and my mother, Mary Cheek; and I think A. J. White has some stock in it, and one or two others, probably.

Q. How many steamboats have you belonging to that company?—A. Three; the Illinois, the A. J. White, and the George W. Cheek.

Q. When was the company organized?—A. I think it was organized in 1872; I cannot give you the date; it may have been in the fall of 1871; I am not positive, but I think it was in the winter of 1871 and 1872.

Q. The stockholders you have mentioned, were they the original formers of the company?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you own those boats before?—A. We had two of these boats; there were two of them owned by Cheek, Malone & Co., and they got a charter from the State of Tennessee, and sold the boats to the company.

Q. At that time, did your company begin to carry the mail under contract with the Post-Office Department?—A. The contract ran out last July; they carried it two years and four or five months, I think, up to the 1st of July, 1875.

Q. Was anybody interested in that contract besides the members of your company?—A. Mr. B. H. Peterson was interested in one of the contracts that the company had.

Q. Please state the amount of the contract, what was paid you, and what interest Peterson had in it.—A. The amount of the contract was $21,500 a year. It was from Memphis to the mouth of White River; it was either route 7504 or 7505. The distance was about 200 miles. I think Peterson's interest was about 15 per cent. I don't recollect exactly; there never was any written contract between the company and Peterson.

Q. How much did you pay him?—A. We paid him from time to time all that was due him—all that he was entitled to.

Q. How did you pay him?—A. We paid him sometimes with drafts on the Department. We loaned him some money; we paid him more than the amount he was entitled to on several occasions. The drafts had to be drawn, "The Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company, and B. H. Peterson; Geo. W. Cheek, agent." It should be "Geo. W. Cheek, superintendent;" but they made it "agent," and I told them it didn't make any difference whether it was changed or not.

Q. Were the fines and deductions to be taken out of the part that the company had, or was he to bear them?—A. No; he had to stand the fines and deductions, his proportion of them; his 15 per cent., or whatever the per cent. was; and, also, he was to stand part of the losses, if the boats lost anything during the summer.

Q. Had he any stock in the company?—A. He had no stock in the company. He was not a member of the company. I think he did own a steamboat, but that is not of my own knowledge; I only heard him say that he did.

Q. Did he own any in that mail-line?—A. No, sir; he owned no boat that came to Memphis.

Q. How did he get into the contract with you?—A. I received a letter from Governor Alcorn introducing Peterson to me. The letter was dated in Washington, and just about that time there had been great complaint about the carrying the mails there, and in fact there were no mails carried about that time, and the citizens there had written to Governor Alcorn in regard to the mails, and he wrote a petition and sent it to me to get the people along the route to sign. I sent it along, and it was signed by I believe most everybody, and I returned it to him, and on the return of that petition, and the presentation of it to the Department, as I understood, the Department took the mail away from the Saint Louis Packet Company, which was carrying it, as I understand it, for a man named Burke, purporting to be from New Orleans, and, as I understood, the Department refused to let the Saint Louis Packet Company bid for the mail, as they had been carrying it several times, and had thrown it up, and had given the Department a great deal of trouble. Governor Alcorn wrote a letter to me by Peterson, recommending him as a nice gentleman and reliable, and he came by Memphis on his way going to New Orleans.

Q. Recommending him for what purpose?—A. That probably Peterson could assist me in getting a contract.

Q. Were there any other representations made to you about the influence that Peterson had?—A. No, sir; only what he made himself. He made a representation to me that he was attending to the business of the Saint Louis Packet Company, for which they paid him 10 per cent.

Q. What did he say that he could do in the way of influence?—A. He did not say that he could do anything more than that he had.

Q. He must have produced some impression on your mind to induce you to make a contract giving him $3,000 a year.—A. Yes, sir; it was more than that.

Q. He must have said something to produce the impression on your mind that he was worth that money; can't you remember it?—A. I cannot, sir. I know that I was very anxious to get some pay for carrying that mail, or the company was.

Q. You cannot remember anything that he said to you, except as you have stated it?—A. No, sir; I don't recollect anything special. He never told me that he could; he said that he had some influence with members here, and that he had a good many friends, and so on; nothing that was any wise criminal, that I know of.

Q. Well, tell what he said that was not criminal.—A. Well, I am telling you. The letter from Governor Alcorn to me introduced him. I had the utmost confidence in Governor Alcorn, and I supposed that it was the best thing that we could do.

Q. You supposed it would pay you to have Peterson for your agent?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was a business transaction?—A. Yes, sir; that is it exactly.

Q. You thought it would pay you from the representations you had had about him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that the first acquaintance you had had with Peterson?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you subjected to any fines and deductions on that contract?—A. No, sir; we never lost a trip. I think there was one deduction of about $14. They made a new post-office, and when the water got high it overflowed the bank, and we could not land there, it was so stumpy and bad, and we were reported for it; and I wrote to the Department the circumstances, and told them they would have to fine us; we could not go in there and take the risk of sinking our boats; that I was sorry we could not do it; and I got certificates of the other postmasters above and below, and of the people there, as to the condition of the landing, and sent them to the Department; and they remitted the fine. That was the only fine that occurred while we were carrying it. We carried the mail four times a week instead of three. The contract was for three times a week.

Q. The settlements were made with you quarterly?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. On each one of those settlements you paid over to Peterson the amount that he was entitled to under your agreement?—A. Yes, sir; we may have given him more than he was entitled to. I know there were several times that he got drafts for more than his proportional part. The secretary of our company kept all that, and I never paid any attention to it. I could have gotten the facts and figures and brought them here. There is nothing in the world in it that I care to keep secret.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Peterson during the existence of your contract, or at any time, from that time to this?—A. Yes, sir; I had one or two conversations with him.

Q. About your mail business?—A. Not particularly about ours; it went along so very smoothly that we had no trouble.

Q. Was it in regard to mail-service?—A. Yes, sir. I asked him how it was—who this man Burke was, purporting to be from New Orleans—the man that took the contract away from us, bid it down so low that we did not bid on it, and who never could be found. I asked Peterson who he was, and he said it was the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company that had put in that bid; said there was no such man as Burke. I went to the Department when our time was up for carrying the mail, and the post-office at Memphis notified me that the contract had been let to Burke, from New Orleans. On the day that he was to begin to carry the mail I went down to the post-office to see whether he was going to take the mail, thinking that, in all probability, he might let it be, and we would just carry it right on.

Q. At what time was it that Burke was supposed to have this contract?—A. That was just a short time previous to the time that we commenced carrying it.

Q. That was not the letting in 1871, but in 1872?—A. In 1871 some man from some place in Alabama had bid it off. The second letting we did not bid for it at all.

Q. I notice that in 1871 the contract for route 7504 (from White River to Memphis, 180 miles and back, twice a week) was drawn and transmitted to Alexander Thornton, at $1,975 per annum, but not executed?—A. Yes, sir; he wrote to me asking what I would carry it for, and I wrote him that I would not carry it for him at all.

Q. The route was readvertised subsequently?—A. Yes, sir; it was readvertised, and we did not bid on it at all, and Burke was the lowest bidder at that time.

Q. I will read over the names of the bidders as reported by the Postmaster-General: Alfred Lee & Co., highest bidder, $5,500; do you know who they were?—A. No, sir.

Q. Are they steamboat-owners on the Mississippi River?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Are you familiar with the owners of steamboats on the river?—A. Pretty familiar, sir.

Q. The next is William English, $4,800.—A. I think William English lived in Washington here; I think I got a letter from him on one occasion.

Q. Had he any boats?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. J. M. Tebbetts, $4,800. He was a Memphis man, was he not?—A. That was Judge Tebbetts. He was interested with the Memphis and Arkansas River Packet Company; he was their attorney, as I understood from the president of the company.

Q. Was he a reliable bidder?—A. Well, the company broke.

Q. Was it broken at the time he made this bid?—A. It was pretty well shattered, I think.

Q. Next, A. J. White, for $4,600; what about him?—A. I know A. J. White. I did not recollect about that bid at all.

Q. Is he a steamboat-owner?—A. No, sir; he was one of our company.

Q. Then, the Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company, $3,498?—A. That is our company.

Q. The Memphis and Saint Louis Company, John H. Scudder, $3,000. Then, Edward P. Dougherty & Co., $2,995; do you know them?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. You spoke of Burke a moment ago. Was not his bid for that company?—A. Yes, sir; that is what Peterson told me.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company again, $2,888.—A. Well, we put in the first bid, and then we concluded to put a less one; after sending on the first bid we concluded to put in a less one. That is my impression.

Q. Was White's bid put in with the consent of the company?—A. I don't recollect that it was, but I suppose it was. He would not have done it otherwise.

Q. What caused you to drop down in your bid?—A. I will tell you the reason of that. Previous to running to the mouth of White River we ran our boats from Memphis to Friar's Point, where General Alcorn lives. Friar's Point is about 115 miles from Memphis, and we call it 200 miles to the mouth of White River.

Q. It is called 180 here.—A. Yes; I see it is called 180 there. We were running to Friar's Point with our boats, and when we left and commenced running down to the mouth of White River, Mr. Scudder's agent notified us that Scudder was going for us heavy; that if we ran a foot below Friar's Point he was just going to wipe us out; and the company got a little up about it. They concluded that they would not be wiped out; that they would bid this thing down; and that if Scudder took it he would have to get it at a low price.

Q. I want to call your attention to these bids. A. J. White, $4,400. Then, the Memphis Packet Company, $3,498, within $98 of $1,000 less. Then Scudder put in a bid of $3,000. Dougherty then put in his, and bid $2,995, $5 less than Scudder's. Then your company bid $2,888, a little less. I want to call to your attention that these three bids, Scudder's, Dougherty's, and your last bid, were very nearly together. Had you any information, in any way, by which to guide you in the amount of your bids?—A. None; not a word, sir.

Q. It was purely an accident, then, that the bids are so close together?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You stated, however, that you were anxious to get the contract, and that you had heard that Scudder was going to run you out and you were anxious to get under him.—A. Yes, sir; that is the reason.

Q. And you say that you had no information, except a mere guess, about the amount of his bid?—A. I think, since you have commenced talking about information, that the reason that bid was put in was this: There was a gentleman in Saint Louis who was talking with their secretary there, and the secretary was telling him about how low down they had bid it on us. Their secretary told this gentleman, who is a clerk on one of our boats, and he told me what the secretary of the Saint Louis Packet Company had told him, and then we concluded to put in this less bid.

Q. Who put in these bids for you?—A. We put them in ourselves, I think. I think I did—put them in the mail and sent them here; that is my impression.

Q. Did Peterson have any connection with these bids?—A. No, sir; none in the world.

Q. Did you get any information in regard to them from him?—A. No, sir; I did not know him at the time. The post-office books will show that we commenced carrying the mail, I think, just about the day that I first became known to Peterson. The Department telegraphed to Memphis to the postmaster there to see what were the best terms on which they could get the mail carried.

Q. Your company put in three different bids for this route 7504, and the contract was given to Alexander Thornton at $1,975. The point I want to call your attention to now is this: I understand you to say that the Post-Office Department gave you $21,500 to carry this mail from Memphis to the mouth of the White River, 180 miles, as it says here. Now, you agreed to carry this mail, according to your first bid, for $4,400 a year?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You agreed afterward to carry it for $3,998?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then for $2,888?—A. Yes, sir; but it was twice a week.

Q. Now, I would like to know whether, after this contract was thrown up by Alexander Thornton, or not executed, or at any time, you were notified, as a bidder on this route, that the contract was not executed by Thornton, and your company given an opportunity to carry the mail at the price you had bid at.—A. We took the mail when we commenced with the agreement that we would take it and carry it for whatever price it was let at when it was let.

Q. That is not an answer to the question. After the contract was not executed by Thornton, to whom it was awarded, was your company notified, as one of the bidders on that route, that he had failed to carry out his contract, and given an opportunity to carry the mail at your bid?—A. I do not think we were, sir.

Q. On any other one of the bids?—A. I do not think so, sir.

Q. After you put in these bids at these prices I speak of—I have no doubt it looks a little strange to the committee; it does to me—how does it happen that they got a contract for $21,500, when they had bid for $4,400?—A. Well, sir, carrying it at $4,400, they would not make anything at it, but would lose money, and they calculated to lose money.

Q. But you had put in a bid for it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you came to make an application to carry it at $21,500, were you ever asked by the Department to carry it at your bid?—A. I don't recollect being asked.

Q. Those were bona-fide bids; you intended to execute them when you put them in?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You made a bid on a new advertisement in 1872?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Your bid was $21,500?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you were notified that you were the lowest bidder?—A. Yes, sir; I was right here in the post-office, myself.

Q. Do you know anybody else that was a bidder?—A. There was no other bid on it, as I understood.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. That was not a regular advertisement?—A. It was advertised twice. It was advertised in the first place to carry it twice a week, and the lowest bidder had an informal check in. The law required that they should put in a check on a national bank, and I understood that the check was on a private bank, a certified check for five per cent. of the amount bid, and Peterson was interested in that bid; and he was the one that called the attention of the Post-Office Department, and found out that some way or other, I do not know how.

Q. Who told you this, Mr. Peterson?—A. Well, I had a letter from Governor Alcorn and Mr. Peterson both in regard to it. Governor Alcorn wanted it three times a week instead of twice, and he got the Department to re-advertise.

Q. That was after this informal bid?—A. Yes, sir; it was then advertised sixty days more. That was in the winter of 1871 and 1872.

Q. What did they re-advertise it for when A. J. White was carrying it?—A. I cannot say.

Q. How did it happen that you put in a bid for so much larger an amount? As a matter of course, I take it for granted that you revolved the subject in your own mind and concluded that the bid would go through. How did it happen that you put in a bid of $21,500 in 1872, having put in a bid of $4,400 in 1871?—A. Well, sir, we just concluded that we would get pay for it or we would not carry it.

Q. Had you any knowledge of these other bids that had been put in in 1871, what the highest bid was?—A. No, sir.

Q. You had never been informed?—A. No, sir.

Q. You state, then, that you entered into no sort of combination?—A. No, sir; not with anybody.

Q. And had no information from the Postal Department, or from anybody outside who professed to have information, to guide you in that bid?—A. Nobody but Peterson and myself talked about it.

Q. And he gave you no information of that kind?—A. Not that he had ever learned anything from—

Q. Had he learned anything from anybody?—A. Not from anybody. I will state to you how we made our bids: We got the prices from Vicksburgh to New Orleans and the price from New Orleans to several other points, and divided it by the number of miles, and we put in the same price per mile as those contracts were then let for. That is the way that we got at the $21,500.

Q. Who were they let to?—A. I don't recollect who were carrying them. I do not know whether Peterson had anything to do with them or not.

Q. Did he ever tell you that he had?—A. I know that he had one contract down there to some place. I think he had a contract to some place up the Red River.

Q. You think you were the only bidder under the re-advertisement?—A. That was what they told me in the Department. The Postmaster-General sent for me and questioned me. He was considering whether or not he would let it at the price. He sent for me to learn why it was that we put in such a bid as that, so high; he said it was an outrage. That is just what Mr. Creswell said. He asked me why I put in a bid of that magnitude, and I told him that we had just come to the determination that we would either get pay for it or that we would not carry it; that times were getting harder and business duller, and unless we did get right good pay we might be cut up in the summer time.

Q. Was there no one else but you to carry that mail?—A. No, sir; there were no other boats that were competent to carry it, unless somebody else put in new boats and run us out.

Q. Were Scudder's boats running there?—A. We had taken all the trade away from him. I don't suppose his boats landed. They would leave Memphis at 5 o'clock in the evening and, I think, would be at the mouth of the White River the next morning by 10 o'clock.

Q. I see Scudder's bid is $3,000 on that route?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that company responsible?—A. Yes, sir; it is so considered, a very responsible company. I suppose it is worth a million dollars.

Q. One of the best companies on the river?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did the Postmaster-General ask you anything about the other boats on the river?—A. Well, he told me that it was an outrageous price, and I told him that we had made up our minds that we had been carrying it for nothing and had lost money, and we were going to have pay for it or we would not carry it.

Q. What did he say then?—A. "Well," he says, "I don't believe I will give it to you," and he held it up for two or three days, and consulted, I think, Governor Alcorn about it, whether or not he should let it. As Governor Alcorn lived there at Friar's Point, and the people had all been fussing at him about it a good deal, I think about the third day he sent for me again to reduce it, and I told him we would not reduce it.

Q. You thought you had the Department in a tight place?—A. Yes, sir; and I told him that we would carry it, and he should have no complaint, and we never lost a mail. We made every exertion, and when we did not have a boat of our own we just hired one to go.

Q. You stated that you had run Scudder out of the trade; don't you think Scudder could have been brought back into the trade if he had been invited to carry the mail?—A. Well, his boats passed along there; but before we went into that trade he was charging them two dollars a bale for cotton, and we went in there and charged them a dollar and a quarter, and we tried to accommodate. We found that it was our interest to accommodate everybody along the river. We worked there for about two years and never made anything, and we built up a very nice trade, so that it commenced to pay, and Scudder lost all his business along there.

Q. Did he continue to run his boats?—A. Yes; he ran them through to Vicksburgh.

Q. Over this same route?—A. Yes, sir; but his boats were too large to land at the way-landings. That was the great trouble with him in carrying the mails.

Q. Who thought they were too large?—A. They could not land at a great many places. He acknowledged himself that they were too large to land at these way-landings.

Q. Were there post-offices at the way-landings?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What did the Postmaster-General say to you after sending for you on the third day?—A. He wanted me to reduce the price to less than $21,500.

Q. He told you it was exorbitant, outrageous?—A. Those were the words that he used, I believe.

Q. And the third day he told you that he would let you have the contract?—A. That is my understanding.

Q. Were you notified there that you had the contract?—A. Yes. I went up to the Department every day to see, and we were awarded the contract, and they paid me for the time that we had carried it up to the time it was let, at the same rate. We had been only carrying it twice a week. The great secret about this big price is the putting on of another boat. We carried it four times instead of twice. The bid was three times a week, which required the necessity of putting on another steamer, and the boat could not live there making one trip a week, so we made two trips a week, and in that way we divided a great deal of business that the boat would do in making two trips a week. So that we bid on it large on that account.

Q. You bid on it five times as much as the original bid in order to cover that additional boat?—A. Yes; I told Mr. Creswell at the time that the additional trip was a little hazardous, if the steamboat undertook to run all through the summer, for the business gets very dull at that time, and it does not take a steamboat long to lose a thousand dollars. One year that we carried that mail on the A. J. White, her expenses were $104,000.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. Prior to the time that you received the letter from Governor Alcorn, introducing Peterson, had you had any conference with him regarding the letting of that mail?—A. Yes, sir; I had sent him the petitions from the people down there.

Q. Had you had any conference with him regarding the price that you should receive?—A. No, sir; I do not think we ever mentioned a price about it.

Q. Had Peterson or any other person been mentioned by him to you as a suitable person to engage with you in the contract?—A. Only after this petition had been sent on here.

Q. Did you have a conference with Governor Alcorn regarding some persons going in with you?—A. No, sir; I supposed that Peterson had seen Governor Alcorn and asked him to give him a letter to me. I do not know in what way that came about.

Q. You and Governor Alcorn had never had any conversation regarding this man?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have you that letter that Governor Alcorn sent you?—A. I do not know whether I have it or not. It might be in our office at home. I will forward you that letter if we can find it, and I think in all probability we can. It was a mere letter of introduction of Peterson as a reliable gentleman who wanted to talk with me about the mail-service.

Q. After receiving that letter you had a conference with Peterson?—A. Peterson brought the letter.

Q. What took place between you and him at that time?—A. Well, sir, we talked about the mail service; I don't recollect exactly what took place.

Q. What did he propose to do for the 15 per cent. which you agreed to allow him?—A. Well, he agreed to do anything that he could; anything that was in his power to do. The understanding was that if we got the contract, any time that it was necessary to come to Washington here to attend to any business of the company, he was to come at his expense and do it; and then, I think, he agreed that if the boats lost any money in the summer he would put up his proportionate part.

Q. What did he represent that he could do toward obtaining the contract?—A. Nothing, but he said that he knew a good many members of Congress here and the officials.

Q. He did not state to you that he had any influence here at the Department, any means of obtaining contracts beyond any other man?—A. No, sir; he did not represent anything of that kind.

Q. You did not consider that it would add to your chances of getting the contract to give Peterson 15 per cent.?—A. Yes, sir; I thought it would add to our chances.

Q. How?—A. Well, I thought he understood it. I had never been here to the Department, and did not know much about it. I had been a contractor with the Department during the war, though.

Q. Did you consider that his relations with Governor Alcorn would be of any advantage to you?—A. No, sir; I thought Governor Alcorn would do as much for me as he would for anybody. He would not do anything for anybody but what was right.

Q. Who did attend to getting the contract, and was here at the Department day after day?—A. I was here myself and put the bid in.

Q. Was Peterson here?—A. Yes, sir; he was here; we were here together.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him regarding the position of the contract during these days that it was pending?—A. Nothing, only what I have stated, that I know of.

Q. You have not stated anything that took place while you were here?—A. I don't recollect anything special. I know that we were talking about the chances of getting it all the time.

Q. Tell me what you did and what he did regarding the contract during the time it was pending before the Postmaster-General.—A. I do not know that we did anything; I made it at home. Our company thought it was best that I should come here and not trust the bid with anybody. They knew the agreement that had been made with Peterson, but they thought it was best that I should come on here. I got three blank contracts, filled them out for three different prices, and got the security, and took them there before the proper parties and got the certificates as to solvency, &c.; it was drawn up "The Memphis & Vicksburgh Packet Company," and B. H. Peterson was put in here, to the best of my recollection, after I got to Washington.

Q. What was the amount in the other two bids?—A. There was one that was larger. I don't recollect the amount. The other was smaller; I think it was about $18,000.

Q. What decided you as to which one should be filed?—A. My impression is that we calculated what the Department was paying other routes for the same service.

Q. Who calculated?—A. I did—Mr. Peterson and myself; and we asked Mr. Routt, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to give us the figures; we asked him what they paid on such and such routes.

Q. Did he know that you were consulting him with reference to making up a bid?—A. I do not suppose he did. We did not tell him.

Q. You went and saw him before you put in your bid?—A. Yes, sir; I saw Colonel Routt, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. Did he assist you in making up your application?—A. No, sir; he did not.

Q. You have stated only one conversation with the Postmaster-General, but you say you were there every day. Did you have any other conversation with him regarding it?—A. No, sir; none other.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him regarding Peterson?—A. No, sir.

Q. With Peterson regarding anything that he had done or was doing at the Department during the time it was pending?—A. No, sir. If he had been doing anything wrong, he was smart enough to keep it from me.

Q. Do you know anything that he did do regarding the obtaining of that contract?—A. No, sir; I do not. Nothing irregular.

Q. Do you know of his doing anything?—A. I know he was there. He insisted that it was a reasonable price, &c. He went before Mr. Routt, and I do not know whether he saw Mr. Creswell or not. I know that I saw Mr. Creswell; he sent for me, I think.

Q. State anything else that Peterson did for his 15 per cent. besides what he did here at the time you obtained that contract.—A. Well, he was here every quarter and got the pay sent out.

Q. Do you think you could not have drawn your pay without him?—A. O, I find now, sir, that I could. There would have been no trouble about that.

Q. State anything else that he did for his 15 per cent., besides what he did at the time you obtained the contract, and drawing your draft and sending it to you.—A. Nothing, that I know of. I think what we paid him was just thrown away.

Q. Did you pay any other persons for obtaining that contract, or in connection with it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have any conference with Governor Alcorn during the time that the contract was pending at the Department?—A. I do not know whether I had. I probably told the governor that we had put in our bid, and I do not know that the governor did not tell me it was too large, and then I told him why, and explained to him that it would require another boat, and we could not get a boat for less than $50,000 or $60,000.

Q. Do you know that he went to the Department in your behalf to endeavor to obtain that letting?—A. I do not.

Q. You made no request to him to do that?—A. Well, Governor Alcorn would have done anything if I had asked him. I do not recollect asking him to go.

Q. Nor having any talk with him about going?—A. I may have done so.

Q. Don't you know that you gave him this explanation of putting on the extra boat, and these data showing that your bid was not too high, in order that he might present them to the Postmaster-General?—A. I think in all probability that I did. I don't recollect whether he did go or not.

Q. Is it not your recollection that he did?—A. I think it would be probable. I might have told him for that purpose, but I do not recollect.

Q. He was not before the Postmaster-General at the same time that you were?—A. I don't recollect his being there. He had been to the Post-Office Department frequently with me.

Q. Were there any persons here who aided you in getting that contract?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who is carrying that mail now—are you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who is?—A. The Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company are pretending to carry it. There is a petition of about five thousand people now in regard to it.

Q. Do you know at what compensation?—A. They are carrying it from Memphis to Chicot for $17,000, and from Chicot to Vicksburgh at $18,000. Chicot is a few miles below White River. Instead of the mouth of White River being the terminus, they have moved it down to a little railroad that comes in there, about thirty miles below the mouth of White River.

Q. What determined you not to accept the amount in your lowest bid?—A. I do not know anything but what I have told you, that we had got the business concentrated, and we determined to get pay.

Q. But I mean what made you change your mind after leaving home with the $18,000 bid?—A. What I made up, I had to make up at home, and I had not determined upon what amount we would put in.

Q. Can you give me the routes and prices with which you compared, in order to determine what you should bid?—A. I do not know that I can. I know there were several routes.

Q. Did you compare it with any routes in which Peterson was interested?—A. I do not know whether we did or not.

Q. You compared it with some others in which he was interested?—A. I think we compared it with one route from New Orleans to Saint Francisville, and from New Orleans to the mouth of Red River. I do not know whether we compared it with the Vicksburgh and New Orleans route or not.

By Mr. WALKER:

Q. Did Peterson say to you that he might bid with some other steamboat company in case you did not take him in as a partner?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. I understand you to say that when you put in the bid for $4,400, on route 7504, that that was for twice a week service?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Those bids were put in in the early part of 1871; Thornton's bid appears to be accepted March 30, 1871; when was this bid put in on which you got it at $21,500?—A. About two years and three or six months from last July. That would make it about April, 1873. I carried it, I think, sixty or ninety days, before the contract was made at the pro-rata rate. Two or three companies bid for it at a stipulated amount, but our bid was to carry it at whatever it was let at.

Q. Was your bid as reasonable as the others?—A. I do not know what the others were.

Q. This bid at $21,500, was that in response to a regular advertisement?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I understand you to say that your boats are small boats?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were the offices along the river increased in number from this time, in 1871, when you put in the bid, when you did not get the contract, up to the time that you put in the $21,500 bid?—A. Yes, sir; I think there were a good many post-offices established. Everybody that wanted one along the river, we landed there, and there was a great increase.

Q. In the mean time, I understand you to say, that you had worked to build up a business along that route at a loss?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. There were rival lines?—A. Yes, sir; the Memphis and Saint Louis, the Memphis and Arkansas, and the Memphis and White River lines.

Q. And you had been running at a loss for the purpose of running them out and securing the business to yourselves?—A. Yes, sir; and the business was all concentrated on our boats; we had the best boats.

Q. Your boats are smaller than the Memphis and Saint Louis Company's boats?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you say about their boats being too large to land at many of those post-offices?—A. Their boats carry about a thousand or twelve hundred tons; our boats, about two hundred and fifty tons. A boat drawing ten feet of water could not get in to half the landings.

Q. Therefore, for that or some other reason, they did not put in any bid at all at this other advertisement?—A. Mr. Scudder sent me word that he could not perform the service. I think it was by his agent at Memphis, a man named Dill; he died about a week ago. He carried all the mail-service there.

Q. He sent you word, then, before you put in this second bid, that he could not perform it?—A. Yes, sir; he had the service, and they took it from him.

Q. And the poor manner in which he performed it led to this complaint and petition and general uproar?—A. That is it exactly.

Q. Then he did not put in a bid this second time?—A. No, sir; he did not. I understood that the Department would not receive his bid.

Q. Do you know whether he offered a bid?—A. I do not.

Q. How did you understand that?—A. Well, I understood it from several. I think in all probability Peterson told me, but I am not certain; but I understood that they would not receive his bid, because he failed to carry the mail and they had had so much trouble about it.

Q. You say that Mr. Creswell, the Postmaster-General, sent for you and said that your bid was outrageous?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was it—pretty high?—A. I do not consider it high even now, to have the service performed right.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Alcorn considered it high, you said?—A. He did until I explained to him that we would have to put on another boat there.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Is not this the truth about it now, that you had run that line as you say at a loss, but in such a way that you had aggregated the business, built up your freight business along the route, so that no other line could run in there and divide it with you, and you thought you had got the Government in a tight place, and that you could jam them and get your own price?—A. Well, sir, that is the honest truth. I did think so. I told the Post-Office Department at the time that there were no other boats that could go in there and carry it.

Q. What did Mr. Creswell state about not letting you have the service?—A. Well, he said it was an outrageous price, and he was in a quandary for several days whether he would let us have it or not. I told him that we had been running at a loss, and had concentrated the business there, and I did not think it was an exorbitant price.

Q. You refused to lower the price?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who carried the mail between the time that Thornton failed and the time that you commenced to carry it?—A. The Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company. They were carrying it at the time we got it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. And they are carrying it now?—A. Yes, sir. I can tell you how we kind of "boosted" him out the first time, when he was carrying it at such a low price. He took it on the 1st of July, from this man Thornton, (I thought it was a man by the name of Burke, but it seems it is Thornton,) and their boats came down very heavily laden, and, the water being very low, they could not get in to many post-offices. They carried the mail down to the mouth of White River, and would leave it out there, and our boat would come down there and take the mail and bring it up and distribute it at all the post-offices, I think about 34; and they got so that they did not land at these places, because we would take this mail without making any contract with them whatever.

Q. Was that a kind of a labor of love, or did the Post-Office Department pay you?—

A. No, sir, not a dollar. Our object was to carry that mail, and to get it carried regularly, so that when they failed, the Department would take it away from them.

Q. That is, you were trying to work up a hubbub along the river, by carrying it a while so that the people would get used to having the mail carried regularly, and then shutting off?—A. Yes, sir; that is just exactly what was done. And the ice filled up the river and then boats had to stop, and the people had no mail, and we quit carrying it, and it was during this interval that the petition and howl were gotten up.

Q. Was there any corrupt bargain between you and Peterson to affect any official or officials?—A. None in the world; not a particle in any way.

Q. Then I am to understand that this arrangement between you and Peterson was purely a business one?—A. Purely a business transaction. I have heard a great many things said about Mr. Peterson, but I have never heard anything from him but what was right and proper, and in a business manner.

Q. You say that the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company is now carrying this mail?—A. Well, sir, they are carrying at it.

Q. Do you know what price is being paid them?—A. I was in the post-office when the contract was let. It was $17,000 from Memphis to Chicot, and $18,000 from Chicot to Vicksburgh.

Q. Chicot is how far from the mouth of White River?—A. About 35 miles.

Q. Then it is being carried at five or six or seven thousand dollars less than you carried it at. Now how is that service being performed by the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company?—A. Very poorly.

Q. What do you mean by very poorly?—A. I will show you a certificate gotten up with about 5,000 signers to it. Sometimes they carried the mail once in two weeks, and in the month of December there were only four or five mails; they were twelve days apart.

Q. What is the difficulty?—A. It is owing to the size of their boats; their route is so very long, from Saint Louis, that they don't get to Memphis sometimes in eight or ten days, and the route is so long that sometimes three or four of their boats come together to Memphis. The boats start at Saint Louis and run clear through to Vicksburgh, and the river gets down sometimes to about 4 or 4½ feet, and they get aground and delayed. At one time there, the steamer Julia was twelve days from Saint Louis to Memphis. She was on her way to Vicksburgh, and the mail there all the time waiting for her to come.

Q. Why didn't you bid on that route again?—A. The reason was we didn't have the capacity to bid from Saint Louis to Memphis, and Memphis to Chicot, and Chicot to Vicksburgh; we hadn't the capacity to carry the mail from Memphis to Saint Louis, and we didn't want to come in competition with the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company over the whole route; it is a very strong company.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were those routes all advertised together?—A. They were advertised separately, but they were not let according to the advertisement. Our bid was the lowest from Memphis to the mouth of White River, except one, and his bid was informal on account of his check.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Why didn't you get it then?—A. Well, they did not let them according to the advertisement. The advertisement was for six times a week, and they let them at three times a week instead of six.

Q. That is, the Postmaster-General said that this six times a week service was costing too much, and he would not let anybody have it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then he went to work and made a contract, without advertisement, with this Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company?—A. Yes, sir. I was present. That was just about a year ago yesterday or to-day.

Q. Did White carry this mail?—A. Yes, sir, for a time. I don't recollect up to what time. We were carrying it. It was under my supervision.

Q. How did the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company get to carry it?—A. That contract was under this man Thornton. I thought it was for Burke, of New Orleans; that is what my impression was; I may have been mistaken in the name. I know that contract was not in the name of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company.

Q. When White carried it, it was carried by your boats?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He is one of your company?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you perform the service badly or well, while he was doing it?—A. We performed it well; we never lost a trip.

Q. Then how did you happen to get out of it; the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company to get in?—A. That is just what I never could understand.

Q. Do you recollect when it was done?—A. I could not give you the exact date.

By Mr. AINSWORTH :

Q. When did White cease to carry it ?—A. We carried it to the 1st of December. On the 1st of January, again, somebody else stepped in. White's contract was at so much a trip, up to the 1st of January or until the expiration of the time, at the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. The question that Mr. Cannon wants to get is, did your company or White throw up the contract ?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then how did you get out of it ?—A. Well, I went there pretty nearly every day and signed for the mail, and there was a wagon, which we paid for it, that came and took it to the boat, and the newspapers had it there, that the mail had been taken away from the steamer A. J. White ; that it was no longer a mail-boat ; so I went to the post-office at Memphis on the day that they were to commence the service, as I understood, and the postmaster showed me an order from the party who was supposed to have it, (I thought it was Burke,) an order to the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company for the mail.

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. Then it must have been a second re-advertisement when your bid was put in at $21,500 ?—A. Yes, sir ; it was a second ; it was really a third re-advertisement. Our supposition was that nobody would bid under $24.50 a trip, and that the Department would just continue it on, but Burke underbid. That is the way that he got it.

By Mr. MILLER :

Q. Was your company organized under a charter ?—A. Yes, sir ; of the State of Tennessee.

Q. The parties that made up the company had been steamboatmen ?—A. Yes, sir ; myself and my brother, and partner, and another brother ; my mother, also, was a member and stockholder in the company ; she had some money, and I got her to put it in there.

By Mr. AINSWORTH :

Q. Was White your brother-in-law ?—A. No, sir ; Mark R. Cheek and Thomas H. Cheek and George Malone ; Mr. White is no relation at all.

By Mr. MILLER :

Q. What was the capital stock of your company ?—A. It was $100,000. I think the charter provided that it might start with $70,000 paid in.

Q. In reference to the contract for $21,500, you say you came to Washington with three proposals ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You hadn't determined which one you should put in until you reached Washington ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that question settled, as to which one by Peterson ?—A. Well, he and I consulted about that. I wanted to put in the large one, and he wanted to put in the small one ; he thought we would be more likely to get it by doing that ; but we finally settled on the middle one.

Q. Had you taken Peterson into partnership with you before you reached Washington ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You said you had not put his name in the contracts ?—A. No, sir ; I had not. I left a place, though. I had to give the security there in Memphis for the performance of the service.

Q. You entered into this copartnership with Peterson, thinking that he would be valuable to you in this contract ?—A. Yes, sir ; I did.

Q. Didn't you think that the main value would be in getting the contract from the Department ?—A. Well, I thought in all probability that it might be. I didn't know. I supposed so. At the time we must have had something in view. I made the contract with him, and we thought it was for our interest to do it. He represented to us that the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company was paying him 10 per cent., and their contracts were about $100,000 ; and on this small contract of $21,500 he wanted so much.

Q. It was understood by you, and generally by the contractors, that he was a valuable man to help to get contracts ?—A. Well, I didn't know anything about him until he brought the letter from Governor Alcorn.

Q. But you knew the fact that he was getting 10 per cent. from the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company. That helped to confirm you in your idea of his value ?—A. Yes, sir ; of course it did.

Q. You had an idea that you stood a better chance of getting the contract by taking him in as partner ?—A. I did.

Q. And you had an idea that you could not get the contract unless you did take him in as partner ?—A. I didn't know. It might be that we thought we might not get it. We thought the chance was much better with him, any way.

Q. You thought he had skill in securing contracts. Did you think also that he had power to defeat contracts?—A. I could not tell about that. He never made any unfavorable representations to me, only that he was getting this 10 per cent. from the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company, and I thought they were better posted than I was—a large company like that, that had been carrying the mail for a long time.

Q. But when you were talking privately with Peterson, making a bargain, you would not naturally overrate his services. Now, the rule of law is that the lowest bidder gets the contracts, and yet he explained that he could get a contract when you could not?—A. No; he never said that.

Q. No, but he left the impression that he could get a contract when you could not. Now, how was he going to do it?—A. I don't know.

Q. How did he leave that impression on your mind?—A. It is a hard question for me to answer.

Q. Well, it might have been by insinuation; but that is just what we want to know.—A. No, sir; he never insinuated anything corrupt to me in his life.

Q. You look like a sharp business man enough, and I take for granted that if a man should come to me and demand 15 per cent. on a contract of mine I would want to know how he could perform the service for it.—A. Well, you see, we had had that mail before. White had had it and it had been taken away, and it became necessary, as we thought, to have somebody to watch it.

Q. I can see that White's mail was taken away by an underbidder. There is not any mystery about that; but this other is a little mysterious. I suppose your bids were properly made out?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And yet you thought it necessary to give some man 15 per cent. for influence in securing your contract?—A. Yes, sir; we did it. If that thing was to be done over again I don't think I would do it.

Q. No, perhaps you think you understand it as well as he did, now. How many days were you and Peterson here together before you got your contract?—A. I was here on two occasions; I have been here repeatedly; I don't recollect.

Q. But when you brought those three bids with you didn't you stay until the matter was decided?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long was it?—A. I think I was here about ten days. I was here several days before the bids were put in.

Q. Didn't you see Peterson every day?—A. Yes, sir; I think I saw him every day.

Q. Were you together always when you went to the Department?—A. No, sir; we went there frequently together, and I went there frequently by myself.

Q. But after visiting the Department you met and talked over what your chances were?—A. I presume we did.

Q. What did Peterson say; did he say that he thought you were going to get it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When the Postmaster-General told you that it was an outrageous bid and that you ought to take less, you had a consultation after that?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Peterson said that there was no use in your yielding the point, did he?—A. Peterson thought that we ought to yield the point.

Q. But I understood you that he thought you would win?—A. Well, he thought we would win finally, but for several days there was some doubt about it.

Q. Didn't Peterson tell you that he thought that by the influence he had with Congressmen, Senators, &c., you would succeed?—A. No, I don't recollect his telling me that, sir.

Q. You were the only bidder?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The only point was, whether the Department would contract with you, or say that it was too high and advertise again?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, wasn't the conversation between you and Peterson to the effect that there could be enough outside pressure brought on the Department to influence them to make a contract at that time, and at your price?—A. I don't know that it was, sir.

Q. Don't you remember that it was?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. That would have been a nice little subject of conversation between partners at such a time.—A. Yes, sir, and a very natural one, too. I think in all probability I explained to Governor Alcorn why the price was put in there as it was, and I think that he went to see Mr. Creswell about it; I do not know, though, positively.

Q. Did you explain to anybody else?—A. No, sir.

Q. You think the only outside influence that you had was Governor Alcorn?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. What did Peterson represent to you that he was receiving the 10 per cent. from the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company for?—A. For attending to their business with the Department here.

Q. Doing what?—A. I do not know. He did not say what he was doing. I suppose he made their collections and attended to their fines, &c.

Q. When he stated that he was receiving 10 per cent. from them, and asked 15 per cent. of you, didn't he state to you anything that he was doing for that company?—A. No, sir; only that he had put in their bids and made up their bids, &c.

Q. And he did not state to you anything that he could do for your company?—A. He proposed to make up our bids, to see that they were all right, examine them, and all that kind of thing.

Q. Did he make up your bids? They were made up before you left?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But he fixed the amount?—A. Well, I put in the amounts myself. We consulted, of course, about the amounts.

Q. Then, I understand, the only inducement for you to enter into the contract was the fact that Governor Alcorn had written a letter to you, introducing Peterson as a good man for you to become a partner with?—A. I don't know that he said anything about partnership. He introduced him as a nice gentleman, and reliable.

Q. Who first broached the subject of your becoming partners?—A. I think Peterson. I think Governor Alcorn wrote me that Peterson was the agent of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company, and that he introduced him to me that he might probably be of some service to me.

Q. And at your first interview you offered a partnership?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I want to call your attention to route 706, White River to Pine Bluff, 156 miles, July 5, 1871; the bidder having failed, a contract was made with the Memphis and Arkansas River Company. Were you interested in that company?—A. No, sir. John D. Adams was president of that company. I don't know who were the stockholders.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. Was Mr. Alcorn governor of the State at that time?—A. No, sir; he was Senator.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. When were you notified that that $21,500 was the only bid?—A. I was notified—I don't know when, if I did not find it out the next day, when the bids were opened.

Q. Didn't Peterson tell you that he didn't believe there was any other bid?—A. No, sir. I think the first notice was when Peterson and myself was in to see Mr. Routt, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and Mr. Routt says, "You have got us foul on those bids." That was the day the bids were opened; I think that was the remark he made.

By Mr. WALKER:

Q. You had no knowledge before that yours was the only bid?—A. No, sir.

Q. You say that Scudder told you that he would not bid?—A. No; he said that he did not want it any more—that he would not have it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Scudder himself told you so?—A. No, sir; I never spoke to Mr. Scudder in my life. I never was introduced to him. It was his agent, Mr. Dill, that told me so.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. Was there a suggestion between you and the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company that you would divide the routes a little and not bid against each other?—A. No, sir; Scudder said that he did not want that part of it; there was always so much complaint about it.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. Was Peterson an acquaintance of Burke's?—A. Peterson told me there was no such man as Burke.

Q. Did he claim to know by whom that bid was put there?—A. He told me it was the bid of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company.

Q. And that was at the time that he was in the employ of the company, receiving 10 per cent.?—A. Well, he didn't say it was at that time, but I presume it was so; he was their employé then.

Q. And you knew that he was in their employ at 10 per cent., and that he knew this man Burke to be a myth when you offered him that partnership?—A. Well, I don't know that he got that 10 per cent.; I only know that he told me so; that is all.

Q. And he told you at the same time that this man Burke was a myth?—A. The Department had written me asking me if I could find out where Burke lived, and when I became acquainted with Peterson I thought in all probability he knew something about it. I always thought it was the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company had put in that bid, and Peterson told me there was no such man as Burke.

Q. Now, did he tell you, previous to the time that you formed the partnership with him, that he was in the employ of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company, receiving 10 per cent. from them; and also that this man Burke was a myth?—A. He did not tell me then that he was a myth; I suppose it was a year afterward that he told me.

Q. It was not a year afterward before you took the contract?—A. It was a year after we got the contract before I asked him.

Q. You succeeded Burke, did you not?—A. Yes, sir; the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company was carrying it under Burke.

Q. Before you had any talk with Peterson as to who Burke was?—A. No, sir; not before.

Q. And yet you had letters from Washington inquiring who Burke was?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you knew that the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company was carrying it for Burke?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that Peterson was an agent or partner of that company receiving 10 per cent. from them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And yet you made no inquiry of him for over a year?—A. I didn't see him for eight or nine months or a year after we had put in the bids at the Department, and I did not think of asking him about it then. But I thought afterward of asking him about it, and I did ask him.

Q. How long after the bid was put in did you get the contract?—A. Several days.

Q. How long before the bid was put in was it that you knew that Peterson had received a percentage from that company?—A. O, I knew that before it was advertised.

Q. How long before the bid was put in had you received letters inquiring as to who Burke was?—A. I don't recollect. It was pretty near the time when the failures to carry the mail along the river commenced; the Department commenced then hunting up the contractor. He had never given any bond, as I understood.

Q. But it was more than a year before you made any inquiry of Peterson about him?—A. I did not say it was a year. I think it was the first time I saw him after I—

Q. Is not this true, that, at the time that he came with the letter from Governor Alcorn and told you that he was in the employ of that company, receiving 10 per cent., and when you and he talked of putting in a bid to succeed Burke as the contractor, that you talked about Burke?—A. No, sir; I don't think we did.

Q. Well, you had received those letters of inquiry before?—A. It was just about that time. It may have been afterward.

Q. Burke's failures were about that time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And as quick as they commenced you received those letters?—A. Yes, sir; that is my impression.

Q. And yet no question about Burke arose between you and Peterson?—A. Well, I didn't suspect Peterson of knowing anything about it.

Q. You knew that he was receiving 10 per cent.?—A. He told me about it at that time.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Monday, March 6, 1876.

J. M. EDMUNDS sworn and examined.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Question. What is your name, residence, and occupation?—Answer. J. M. Edmunds; I reside in Washington; and am postmaster of the city.

Q. How long have you been postmaster here?—A. Since 1869.

Q. Do you remember, in February, 1876, of approving or placing your certificate upon certain bonds filed by J. F. Reynolds as a contractor?—A. I could not say as to the day, but recently I recollect certifying to such bonds.

Q. State whether that is one of the contracts upon which you put your certificate? [Exhibiting the paper to the witness.]—A. Yes, sir; that is one.

Q. State, as near as you can, what number you certified about that time?—A. I cannot remember. They brought me in quite a lot of them, I could not say how many; I take no account of these; I make no record of them; there might have been thirty or forty, and there might have been more. My impression is that there was not a large number.

Q. Examine those, [handing the witness a package of papers,] and state the number of each one certified by you; [witness selects certain papers from the package.] Did you examine and certify the sufficiency of the bonds on each of these bids shown you by me at this time, and now in the possession of Judge Tyner?—A. Yes, sir. They all passed under my eye when they were executed.

Q. The certificate is that you have used due diligence to inform yourself regarding the sufficiency of the bondsmen. State what diligence you used, and what information you had regarding their solvency at the time?—A. Well, I had known Mr. Kittle two or three years, and knew from general report that he was a man of some means; how much, I do not know. It had been stated to me that he was worth twenty or thirty thousand dollars. But I was unwilling to certify upon that without letters from parties who did know or who said they knew in regard to Mr. Kittle, and also in regard to the other surety, who was a man I did not know at all, and I required them to bring letters from parties of standing to certify as to the responsibility, both of Mr. Kittle and the other man.

Q. Have you those letters?—A. Yes, sir.

The witness produces the following letters:

“HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
“Washington, D. C., January 31, 1876.

“SIR: I am acquainted with Mr. A. G. Ryan and Mr. W. D. Kittle, and from my knowledge and their representations, I think them worth the sum of twenty-two thousand over their liabilities, and good for that sum as securities.

“Respectfully, &c.,

“W. W. WILSHIRE.

“To the POSTMASTER, Washington, D. C.”

“CITY POST-OFFICE, Washington, D. C., January 31, 1876.

“SIR: I have known Mr. W. D. Kittle for a year or two and believe him reliable, and that he is pecuniarily able to fulfill any obligation he may make.

“I am, respectfully,

“S. B. CONOVER.

“Hon. J. M. EDMUNDS, P. M., Washington, D. C.”

Q. Those were obtained for you at your request after the presentation of these papers?—A. Yes, sir; I declined to sign them without additional evidence.

Q. Explain to me how it happens that the papers are dated and executed February 1, and the letters which you solicited after they were presented to you are dated January 31?—A. That I cannot explain. This letter of Judge Wilshire was brought to me, and I think written after the contracts were brought to the office. My recollection of the matter is that Mr. Kittle brought these papers there for me to certify, and I declined to certify without some testimony from some member of Congress or other creditable person, and I think he produced both these letters after that.

Q. When the letters were produced, did you notice the fact that they were dated previous to the time at which you had asked for any testimony?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Did you read the letters?—A. Yes, sir; I read them.

Q. But did not notice their date?—A. No, sir; I do not think I read the date.

Q. How much was the aggregate amount for which these men were liable upon these bonds?—A. That I do not know.

Q. Did you examine them?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Did you make any effort to ascertain whether the aggregate amount was more or less than that for which the party was certified to you to be responsible?—A. No, sir; I did not. I looked at each contract as I signed it, to see the amount that was set opposite the sureties' names; and that question of the aggregate amount of the person's bids has been under discussion here for years.

Q. I was simply asking you if you looked to see whether they were responsible to the amount for which you were accepting them or not.—A. I did not undertake to ascertain the aggregate.

Q. Who made the application to you to approve these bonds?—A. My recollection is that Mr. Kittle made the application. There was another gentleman with him on one occasion, and there might have been on other occasions. I think there were some others at other days than this, but I am not certain about that.

Q. Did you mean to be understood that you at that time knew Mr. Kittle as a responsible party and a reliable, straight-forward contractor?—A. No, sir, I did not say that. I said that I had known him for a year or two, and that his reputation, so far I knew it, was that of a man of property.

Q. And a man of integrity?—A. No, sir, I did not quite answer that; and I was especially particular about that. I knew that he had had some difficulty about other bids in the Department, and refused to sign his bids when he brought them there until he brought me these letters.

Q. But when he brought you these letters which were antedated you had no suspicion that they were old letters?—A. Well, sir, it was only one or two days before, any way.

Q. But the letters were got at your request, I understand you?—A. I cannot say about the letter of Mr. Conover. The letter of Mr. Wilshire was not got at my request; it was got because I refused to sign the bids until some other testimony of this kind was produced. I told Mr. Kittle I could not sign them.

Q. Now, is not this the fact, that you signed the bids, not because of any solvency on the part of the parties, but because you were requested to do so by Senator Conover and Mr. Wilshire?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you sign upon their statement, and not upon any knowledge you possessed?—A. I had no personal knowledge.

Q. Did you attempt to ascertain whether they had a dollar of property in the world?—A. I made inquiries in regard to Mr. Kittle; the other man was a new man, and I had no opportunity to make inquiry as to him.

Q. Of whom did you make inquiries?—A. Not at this particular time, but when he had this difficulty, I inquired of other parties whether he was a man who had any property at all. I do not recollect who they were.

Q. Did you, before approving these bonds, have any conversation with Mr. Tyner, or any other person connected with the Post-Office Department?—A. No, sir; I did not. I have no recollection of having any. In regard to these bids, do you mean?

Q. Regarding the acceptance of the certificate of this man's contract?—A. No, sir; I have no recollection of having any conversation.

Q. Or regarding the solvency of Mr. Kittle?—A. No, sir; I do not think I did.

Q. Did you make any effort to ascertain whether, in the Department, he had been acting squarely or not, or was considered responsible there?—A. No, sir.

Q. How far from the Post-Office Department is the place at which you approved these bonds?—A. It is in the same building.

Q. You could readily have obtained information from there had you sought it, could you not?—A. I could have ascertained what his standing was in the Department, I suppose. I knew that he had had some difficulty there, but never was aware that he had any contract which he had not fulfilled.

Q. Just give the date of the bond, as well as the date of your approval.—A. The bond of the sureties, you mean? This bond is dated the 1st of February, and the certificate is dated the 2d.

Q. And the only evidence you had was dated January 31?—Yes, sir.

Q. And you say that was furnished upon request, after the bonds were proffered to you for approval?—A. I say that the letter of Mr. Wilshire was, but I think the letter of Mr. Conover had been filed a day or two before, when I believe we had some other proposals. I think this letter was brought a day before, but I cannot recollect distinctly about that.

Q. Then you had that in your possession before the contracts were ever presented?—A. I am inclined to think that I took this off from my file; I have a file of this class of letters, but I cannot say positively as to that.

Q. And who furnished you that, do you think?—A. I presume Mr. Kittle, because it relates to him alone.

Q. For what purpose?—A. In order to induce me to sign; to satisfy me that he was adequate surety.

Q. Then you and he had a conference regarding the approval of his bonds before he presented them, did you?—A. Not that I recollect. He may have come in there and asked me what evidence I would require; I do not recollect about that.

Q. State why you think he filed the letter before he asked you to approve the bonds.—A. Well, he knew that I required evidence of this kind; every one that has had a proposal certified knew that I would not certify except upon written statements.

Q. Did you ask him what he was worth?—A. I do not know that I did.

Q. Where did he live?—A. That I could not tell you.

Q. Did you ask him if he had any property?—A. I did not ask him.

Q. Did you endeavor to ascertain whether either he or Mr. Ryan had any property, before accepting what you found in those two letters?—A. I took Mr. Wilshire's letter in regard to Mr. Ryan, and the two in regard to the other gentleman.

Q. But made no further inquiry?—A. No, sir.

Q. And one letter was filed before you were asked to approve the bond?—A. That is my impression. I think that letter was on file, but I am not positive as to that.

Q. Is that the usual practice with you in approving the bonds of men making proposals?—A. Where parties file a letter of a member of Congress, or of a Senator, or of a private citizen well known to me, I usually certify, unless I know of something that would prevent it, and I never have in any case. I have taken that as testimony on which I could found a belief after receiving the oath of the parties.

Q. That is construed by you as due diligence?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. You spoke of the practice of the Department, or of the postmaster, in approving bonds, and in reference to the aggregate of the bonds. Explain what you mean by that.—A. I know I have discussed this thing in my own mind and with some other parties—but I cannot say when—as to whether it was my duty to consider the aggregate of bonds, and the question was up three or four years ago, when I had some discussion about it; and I finally reached the conclusion that I should not take into account the aggregate. A great many men bid on a large number of contracts, and I find that as a result of that they get very few contracts; and it has been my practice to certify the bids that were presented, where they satisfied me with such written evidence as to the sureties.

Q. That is, although you might believe that a man was worth only $50,000, you would certify to him on bonds in the aggregate amounting to $75,000 or $100,000?—A. Yes, sir; I do that on proposals. On contracts it would be different.

Q. These are proposals?—A. These are proposals; yes, sir.

Q. Did Kittle bring these bonds to you when he first spoke to you about it?—A. I could not say as to that. He brought them and left them there while he came up for this letter of Mr. Wilshire; but whether he had spoken to me about them before or not, I could not say. He brought them there for me to certify, and I declined to do it without some additional evidence, and they were left there on my table.

Q. Let me see if I understand you. Mr. Kittle brought these bonds to you for your approval?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The parties had made oath upon each bond?—A. Yes, sir; both the contractor and the sureties.

Q. I understand that you declined to approve them, and that he left the bonds in your possession, and went and brought back the letter of Judge Wilshire?—A. Yes, sir; my impression is that this letter was on file, but it might have been brought at the same time, and that only his name was mentioned in it, and Mr. Ryan's name not being mentioned in it, I declined to sign until he had some written testimony there in regard to Mr. Ryan.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. How long were these bonds in your possession before he brought these letters?—A. Well, long enough for him to come to the Capitol, I suppose. He went out and brought the letter; he might have gone an hour or an hour and a half or two hours—the same afternoon.

Q. That is, to bring the one of Mr. Wilshire?—A. Yes, sir. I may not be correct about this. He might have brought this in when he brought the proposals; but I have a distinct impression that I took this letter off my file. I may be wrong about that.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. I will get you to state whether the blanks and bonds were filled, everything complete, except your signature, at the time they were brought there.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. All that was required, then, was your signature?—A. Yes, sir. I do not certify any bonds at all; all the other blanks are filled except my own certificate, and I sometimes fill them, but very seldom fill them myself.

Q. Do you know John F. Reynolds?—A. I do not, sir.

Q. Was he with Mr. Kittle when he came for your approval of these securities?—A. There was a gentleman with Mr. Kittle, and my impression is that he introduced him as Mr. Reynolds, but I cannot recollect positively about that.

Q. What kind of a looking man was he?—A. Well, I should say he was a man taller than you are—about as tall as Mr. Tyner, but rather a slender man. I recollect there being a gentleman with him, and my impression is that he introduced him as Mr. Reynolds; I did not take particular notice, as the certificate which I am required to give does not apply to the contract.

Q. Nobody came but those two?—A. There may have been other gentlemen with them. At the time these bonds were certified, there were frequently half a dozen contracts there waiting at the same time. I think there were but one or two when he was there; I may be mistaken about that. I know when he brought them in in the first place, there was a gentleman with him, but whether it was Mr. Reynolds or not I cannot say.

Q. Let me read this certificate to you: "I, the undersigned, postmaster at Washington, D. C., after exercising all due diligence to inform myself of the pecuniary ability and responsibility of the principal and sureties in the foregoing bond, and the real estate owned by them reespectively, do approve of said bond, and certify that in my belief the said sureties are sufficient to insure the payment of double the entire amount of said bond. I do certify that the said bonds were duly signed by John F. Reynolds, and Albert G. Ryan, and William D. Kittle, as sureties, before signing the certificate."

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Did you ask them any questions in relation to their real estate?—A. I do not know that I did. I did not see Mr. Ryan at all, that I recollect.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You do not know whether that was Mr. Ryan or Reynolds that came with Mr. Kittle?—A. It might have been Mr. Ryan; I do not know Mr. Ryan.

Q. I say, it may have been him?—A. It may have been him, possibly.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. Do I understand you as swearing that he introduced him to you as Mr. Reynolds?—

A. That is my impression; I have not a distinct recollection as to it.

Q. He might have introduced him as Mr. Ryan, might he not?—A. I think not, as I should probably have recollected, because he was one of the sureties.

Q. But Mr. Reynolds being the principal, you would not be likely to recollect him?—

A. No, sir; I am not required to take note of the principal.

Q. The certificate says that you have inquired as to the solvency of the principal, does it not?—A. No, sir.

Q. This reads: "After exercising all due diligence to inform myself of the pecuniary ability and responsibility of the principal and his sureties." Did you ever read any of these certificates before signing them?—A. Yes, sir; I have read them a great many times.

Q. Did you make any inquiry as to the responsibility of Mr. Reynolds, the principal in this?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have no recollection as to whether he was introduced to you as the principal?—A. I am not positive as to that; no, sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation with any officer in the Department, either the Postmaster-General or his Assistants, as to whether you should approve bonds which, in the aggregate, exceeded the amount the men were shown to be worth?—A. I have not had, in relation to any of the officers that are there now, I think. The subject was discussed two or three years ago, and the general conclusion was reached that I could not take notice of the aggregate amount of bids.

Q. Did you ever call the attention of the present officers there to that fact?—A. No, sir; I do not think I have.

Q. Did you ever notify them that you had any confidence that the parties were responsible for the full amount for which they had become sureties?—A. No, sir; I do not think I ever did.

Q. And upon a certificate that a man was worth $2,000, you would certify that he was good surety for twenty-five $2,000 proposals, would you?—A. No, sir; I should not go, probably, to that length. These letters state that these gentlemen are worth at least $22,000 over and above their liabilities; and on proposals I should certify without reference to the amount, if it did not run too large.

Q. Did you not state that it was only each one that you considered, and that if your certificates would warrant your certifying him for that one, you would certify for the others in addition, considering them only as distinct?—A. I stated, substantially, that I did not take into the account the aggregate of the bids, but that each certificate I made as it stood.

Q. Tell me the limit at which you would stop?—A. I could not tell you that.

Q. Did you ever stop?—A. I do not know that I have.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. How long have you been postmaster?—A. I have been postmaster six years.

Q. Have you been certifying these proposals ever since you were postmaster?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What proportion of proposals have you certified in each year, probably?—A. I could not say. There is a great deal of such duty required here at this office, being a central office, and, as far as I could with reason, I have undertaken to accommodate people who were here from a distance.

Q. Have you ever certified without written evidence?—A. I did in the commencement, when I first went into the office, but afterwards I adopted the plan of requiring written evidence.

Q. How long have you been requiring written evidence?—A. I think since the change in the law, which I guess was in 1872.

Q. Have you preserved all that evidence?—A. Yes, sir; and I have got it all.

Q. You will be able to show, then, upon whose recommendation you certified a good many of these bonds that have turned out to be worthless, in case we wanted to overhaul them?—A. Yes, sir; I have got a large file of letters. I have no recollection of ever certifying to but one proposal upon which there has been a failure; that is, but one such has ever been brought to my attention. I have been reasonably careful, I think, and have always tried to bring the best judgment I had to bear upon the men when they were bidding, and I have had some business experience. This question came up soon after the present Postmaster-General came in, upon some bid, and I carried up my letters, and showed them to him, and he expressed the opinion then that I would have to give credit to letters from Members of Congress and Senators in regard to these matters; that it seemed to him that I should. Of course he did not attempt to control my judgment in the matter. That was a single case which occurred soon after Mr. Jewell came in, when I submitted the question to him.

Q. Whose case was that?—A. I do not remember. I recollect asking his views as to how far I would be justified in regarding such evidence as that, and he expressed the opinion that I would have to be guided by it, but without saying to what extent as to the proposals.

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. Yet you were acting entirely independent of him ?—A. Entirely so.

Q. It was a mere casual remark upon your part to him, and a mere casual remark upon his part to you, was it not ?—A. Yes, sir ; it was not a decision to guide me or to undertake to control me. I wanted his judgment of that kind of evidence.

Q. He had no power to control you ; that is, as to that matter you had no official relations with him ?—A. No, sir ; none at all. I had always felt that this was an embarrassing duty imposed on a postmaster, without giving him any power to protect himself in any shape whatever ; and I have simply insisted on the condition of refusing to sign one man's bid and signing another, and have them turn around and say, "Well, you are inclined to favor certain bidders here." Therefore, I have exercised my best judgment in regard to these matters. Men sometimes get angry because I require a letter, even, and have charged that I was trying to favor one bidder as against another. All that is to be met, and it is a pretty delicate duty without any compensation, and without the means being put in the hands of the postmaster to make any thorough examination of the matter. These are the reflections that I have had upon the subject.

By Mr. AINSWORTH :

Q. I understood you to say that the conversation between you and the Postmaster-General was a merely casual one. Now, did you not take the letters and go there to consult him regarding that matter ?—A. I took one letter, I think, in some particular case. This was two or three years ago.

Q. And went there to consult him, did you ?—A. Yes, sir ; I went up there to see what his judgment would be on such testimony.

Q. And because he was Postmaster-General ?—A. Yes, sir ; probably.

Q. Did you never see Mr. Ryan ?—A. I do not know that I did.

Q. Did not Mr. Ryan call upon you and ask you at what time you approved those bonds ?—A. He might have done so, but I have no recollection of it.

Q. Didn't you tell Mr. Tyner that Mr. Ryan came to you after they were approved, and inquired of you if they had been approved ?—A. I have no recollection of telling him that, sir.

Q. And you have no recollection of ever having seen Mr. Ryan ?—A. No, sir ; I have not.

Q. You would be quite as likely to remember having seen him as you would be to remember that Mr. Reynolds was introduced to you, would you not, if he had come there and inquired regarding these bonds, after you had approved them ?—A. I think if he had come there, and I had known it was Mr. Ryan that was inquiring, I would be likely to recollect it ; but he might have come there without my knowing it was he. I do not know that I recollect that Mr. Reynolds was there ; I only say that I have an impression.

Q. Please give the description of him again.—A. If I am right in my impression, he was a tall, slender man, about like yourself, perhaps ; but I am not certain that he was there, or that he was introduced to me. I recollect that some gentleman came with Mr. Kittle when he brought the papers in.

By Mr. MILLER :

Q. I would like to inquire a little further in relation to conversation that you have had with the Postmaster-General. Do you remember whether the letters that you carried to him stated fully as to the pecuniary responsibility of the individual ?—A. No, sir ; I cannot recollect. The letters are generally of this character—the most of them, I think, stronger than this which I have handed in here to-night.

Q. Do you remember that the Postmaster-General suggested that you might waive any of the requirements of this certificate ?—A. No, sir ; I do not think he did ; I do not recollect that he did.

Q. That is, you understood him that you were to get information which would enable you intelligently and truthfully to sign this certificate ?—A. Yes, sir ; and I submitted the question simply as to whether such testimony ought to be taken, ought to be considered, was such as to enable a man to found a belief on it.

Q. You did not understand him as intimating that you might take testimony which would cover a part of the certificate, and not the whole of it ?—A. No, sir ; I did not. I do not think that part was discussed.

Q. All that you mean to be understood in relation to this conversation with the Postmaster-General, is that you talked with him as to the manner in which you obtained the knowledge on which you could sign this certificate, and not as to the amount of it ?—A. Well, in the first place, the old form of certificate required me to certify as to my knowledge. That I declined to do, and stated that it was not possible for me to have positive knowledge of this thing at all, and I would only certify as to my belief.

The Solicitor was called in to discuss the form of the oath. I was going to stop the work; I declined to sign as to positive knowledge, and then I think submitted a letter—one of these many letters that I have got, probably, as a sample of the evidence which would be turned over to me.

Q. You understood the Postmaster-General to say that where you had a letter from a Senator or a Member of Congress, saying that he knew the man to be responsible, that would cover all the requirements of this certificate; that on that knowledge you could sign it?—A. He expressed that as his opinion.

Q. I understood you to say that you had read this certificate often; is that so?—A. Yes, sir, I have.

Q. Do I understand that whenever you have signed such a certificate as this, you meant to sign it as to all the facts stated therein; you meant it to be true?—A. My impression has been that in signing this I was certifying to the sureties, and I have not noticed specially, until my attention was called to it here, that the principal is involved in this new certificate.

Q. How long has this certificate been in use?—A. That I cannot say. The form of the certificate was printed so that I or any postmaster was required to certify positively as to his knowledge, and in these certificates I had the word "belief" inserted.

Q. Have you read this certificate when you have been signing for this last letting?—A. I have read it repeatedly, but I cannot say as to this last letting.

Q. There are several points to which you certify in this certificate. The first is, that you have exercised due diligence to inform yourself of the pecuniary ability and responsibility of the principal and his sureties in the foregoing bond. Did I understand that you were doing that?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Of the principal and his sureties?—A. No, sir; not as to the principal. I certified under the impression that I was certifying to the sureties.

Q. And then it goes on—"and of the real estate owned by them, respectively." Did you examine into that question?—A. No, sir; in regard to these bids, I have not.

Q. I am not talking about the principal now; I am leaving him out. Have you examined into the question of the real estate owned by the sureties, respectively?—A. I made no examination on that point.

Q. "And do hereby approve said bond, and certify that in my belief the said sureties are sufficient; and I do further certify that the said bond was duly signed by John F. Reynolds, and Albert G. Ryan, and William D. Kittle, his sureties, before signing this certificate." Did you examine that?—A. They were all signed before I signed the certificate.

Q. Were they signed by these parties; by the bidder and by the sureties?—A. I suppose so. The proposals are brought to me filled out in this way, with the certificate of the notary.

Q. But they were not present, or only one of them was, as you understand?—A. In this case, as I stated before, I am under the impression that no man was present with Mr. Kittle; but, ordinarily, principals do not come to the office at all; I do not see them. Many of these proposals are signed at a distance from here.

Q. You would consider that you were following this certificate and were justified in signing it, if there were three names in there, one as principal and two sureties, whether there was anybody present or not?—A. And witnessed and certified by the notary. All that is there before I sign. I take the certificate of the notary for the formal execution of the papers.

Q. You state that you had Senator Conover's letter when this bond was first presented?—A. I cannot say positively that I had. I say that my impression is that I took Senator Conover's letter off the file, but I am not certain as to that. It might have been brought there the same day that the certificates were signed.

Q. Mr. Conover is Senator from Florida, I believe?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Mr. Kittle or Mr. Ryan ever live in Florida, that you are aware of?—A. Not to my knowledge; but Mr. Kittle was a contractor in the southwestern part of the country, where Mr. Wilshire would be like to be acquainted with him, and I suppose was acquainted with him then. I could not say as to that fact.

Q. The amount of diligence that you have exercised in this case is such as you have exercised in all similar cases, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir; it is substantially the same. In other cases where men have been unable to bring letters, I have required them to bring certificates from the books of the assessor—some statement of that kind.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. Are you familiar with the regulations in the Post-Office Department?—A. Some of them, sir.

Q. How do you construe section 277, which says, "Postmasters are to be careful not to certify the sufficiency of guarantors or sureties without knowing that they are persons of sufficient responsibility," * * * "a disregard of this instruction by postmasters is a violation of their oath of office, subjecting them to immediate removal?"—A. That question was raised by the Department and raised by myself, and I declined to sign while the certificate required me to know, and the certificate was modified. That was a year ago.

Q. I did not know that there was a modification of this order?—A. I do not know that there is there, but there is a modification in the form of the certificate which would practically abrogate the order.

Q. Of course that relieves you so far as you certify only to your belief in that matter?—A. I refused under Mr. Creswell, while Mr. Giles Smith was the Assistant, and the form of the certificate was modified then; but they continued to use the old blanks, and the word "belief" was inserted.

Q. That word "belief" was put in before Mr. Jewell came in, was it—in Mr. Creswell's time?—A. They were put into hundreds of proposals in writing. When this new form was printed, which, I think, was this year, I noticed, when I came to sign bids for the present bidding—

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. The form of the blanks was changed by inserting that word "belief" by reason of the conference between you and the Postmaster-General, if I understand you right?—A. I think it was; but this was a year or more ago, and my recollection is that the Solicitor was called in and his opinion taken as to whether that would be a good certificate with the word "belief" in.

Q. And it was upon the ground that you declined to certify as to men whom you did not know anything about?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the word "belief" was inserted, after a conference between you and the Postmaster-General, in order that you might certify upon letters which gave you no definite information?

Mr. McMAHON. The law only requires a certificate of belief, so far as that is concerned.

Q. If it was not inserted for the reason that you told the Postmaster-General that you were not in possession of sufficient facts to warrant you stating upon your own knowledge the responsibility of these men?—A. I told him that was simply impossible. I could not do it because I could not go and examine into every man's private affairs.

Q. And it was inserted to enable you to certify upon proposers who were not residing here, of whom you know nothing, was it not?—A. No, sir; I do not think that is a fair statement.

Q. I ask you that. Was it not that you might certify to the contracts of these men from a distance, these Texas contracts, or other contracts away from here?—A. It was to enable me to certify upon such evidence as I could found a reasonable belief upon.

Q. Did you, previous to the change of this certificate, certify for Sanderson, Huntley, Kinsley, Coffin, and others?—A. Yes, sir; I did.

Q. Inserting the word "belief"?—A. In most of the proposals the erasure was made; in some of them, where I had known the parties for years, I did not take the trouble to make the erasure.

Q. But in other cases you inserted the word?—A. Yes, sir. The change of the form of certificate was made under a former Postmaster-General, while Mr. Giles Smith was Second Assistant and Mr. Creswell Postmaster-General.

Q. It was made before Mr. Jewell came there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was not the change in the printed forms made on account of a conference between you and Postmaster-General Jewell?—A. I cannot say. They did not consult me when this was changed. The first I knew that it was changed I saw the blanks.

Q. You did not go to the Postmaster-General and speak to him about it?—A. I did not ask him to change any blanks.

Q. And the Solicitor was not sent for in regard to it?—A. I had this conversation relative to the character of testimony on which I was expected and asked to certify.

Q. With whom?—A. With the Postmaster-General and with the Solicitor.

Q. With what Postmaster-General?—A. With the present Postmaster-General. But that was after we had been using the other certificates for two or three years.

Q. Had you ever had a printed certificate in the form of this until after that conference?—A. No, sir; I do not think I had. I do not recollect it.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Was there any special regulation made for you, which did not apply to anybody else, relative to the approval of these guarantees?—A. Not that I am aware of.

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
Monday Evening, March 6, 1876.

JAMES NICHOLAS CALLAN sworn and examined.

By Mr. AINSWORTH :

Question. State your name, residence, and occupation.—Answer. My name is James Nicholas Callan ; my residence is 354 Pennsylvania avenue ; my occupation is notary public and commissioner of deeds.

Q. Look at the papers lying before you, being proposals of J. F. Reynolds for routes in Florida, and state whether you have ever seen them before.—A. I believe I have. This one I know I have seen before.

Q. They are all the same ?—A. There were forty of them, on each of which I signed my name twice or three times. I see my seal on them here.

Q. State when it was ; what was the date at which they purport to have been done ?—A. They were made by me about ten o'clock in the morning, to the best of my knowledge, Tuesday, February 1st.

Q. Where ?—A. At my office, 624 Louisiana avenue.

Q. Who was present ?—A. When I came into my office I found four or five gentlemen there—four, I am certain—waiting for me. I remember the proposals were open in that shape, and piled up in that manner [illustrating] upon the desk. Mr. Kittle was one of the gentlemen ; I think Mr. H. H. Dudley was another ; a gentleman who afterward told me his name was A. G. Ryan ; and another one, I do not remember who it was. I am under the impression there were four there at the time. Before I got through signing them all several persons came in. It took me some time to do it.

Q. State whether Mr. Reynolds was there.—A. A gentleman who I was told was Mr. Reynolds ; I am not personally acquainted with the gentleman, and did not certify so in my certificate.

Q. Were you introduced to him ?—A. I was told that that was the gentleman, Mr. Reynolds, who had signed this bond, and that he wished to qualify to it.

Q. Did you administer the oath to him ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was the oath administered to Mr. Ryan also ?—A. Before Mr. Ryan had the oath administered he called me aside and asked whether I could administer the oath to him in a particular way. He was not worth, he said, the entire amount of these bonds, but he was worth more than the amount of any one of them, and he would like me to so swear him as to overcome that difficulty—to swear him to one bond at a time. I told him I could do so, for I, at one time, a few years ago, had been on a bond myself, and then gone on another one, and both of them for more than I was worth, I thought. He was then sworn as he desired, so as to cover only the amount of one bond. I then remarked to Mr. Kittle that Mr. Ryan had had this conversation with me, and Mr. Kittle said, "I have letters from Mr. Wilshire and Mr. Conover that will satisfy anybody as to the validity of these bonds." Mr. Ryan, as soon as ever he was sworn, bade us good day and then walked out, and I went on and finished up the bonds.

Q. Was the oath administered to each of these parties as recited in these certificates ?—A. Yes ; to each of them as recited here.

Q. Can you state who told you that the gentleman who had signed the papers as Mr. Reynolds was Mr. Reynolds ?—A. Mr. Kittle.

Q. Do you know where Mr. Reynolds signed those ?—A. No, sir ; I do not.

Q. They were signed when they were brought there, were they ?—A. I am sure that Mr. Ryan signed them all, because he pointed out his name to me and went away. I did not see anything more of him. They were all signed when I got there. He said it was his signature, and after being sworn he left there, and his name appeared upon all the bonds as I signed them.

Q. Was Mr. Reynolds's name on at the time ?—A. Yes ; it was there when I gave them up out of my possession. I would not give a bond up unless it was complete.

Q. Was it there at the time Mr. Ryan said it was his signature ?—A. It must have been there, because Mr. Reynolds signed no papers in my office.

Q. State whether Mr. Kittle's name was also on the papers ?—A. That I would not like to testify to positively—that Mr. Kittle had signed them all at that time.

Q. But he had before they left your hands ?—A. Before they left my hands they were signed, sir ; I do not know that they were when he brought them, but I know when he left there they were all signed.

Q. Previous to their coming to you to have these papers acknowledged, had you had any conversation with any party regarding it ?—A. No, sir ; they seemed to be looking for a notary ; there were four or five in that neighborhood, but they found no one in except me, and I was not in when they came. When I came there they were waiting for me.

Q. Had you ever had any business transaction with Kittle prior to this ?—A. None that I know of. I have been under the impression since this thing happened, that as I was a commissioner for the State of Texas, I had taken his acknowledgment once or twice to a power of attorney; I will not be sure—perhaps for Louisiana. It strikes me that I had seen the gentleman one or twice before.

Q. How long have you been engaged in business as notary public?—A. Since the 23d of last March as notary public.

Q. Was there anything in the appearance of these parties, or in their acts, while they were there, which would tend to excite, or did excite, any suspicion in your mind regarding the fairness of the transaction?—A. No, sir; when I saw the name of Albert G. Ryan I looked at a directory to see if there were two of that name, as I knew one man of that name and this was not the man. I looked to see if there were two of that name in the town, and I found there were. I have been very particular, because a great many notaries have been caught certifying to papers the parties to which did not appear before them except by proxy. I have therefore been very particular not to swear any parties appearing before me unless properly introduced to me.

Q. Will you describe Mr. Reynolds, as nearly as you can?—A. Mr. Reynolds, to my eye, was a gentleman of about medium height—as the postmaster [Mr. Edmunds] said—about your height, not any heavier. I think his hair was light, and his complexion florid, and I am quite sure that I caught his eye, and that he had blue eyes. That was the most striking feature that I noticed about him—the color of his eyes—blue eyes.

By Mr. MCMAHON:

Q. You said that those signatures—John F. Reynolds's—were all to those papers?—A. Reynolds's signatures must have been there, because he signed nothing after he came to me, and they were all perfect when he left me except the signature of the witness, Clark.

Q. To whom did you deliver the bonds?—A. To Mr. Kittle.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Do I understand you to say that by the oath administered there, a man, if he were worth but $2,000, could go on bonds as surety for $25,000 and $30,000, by swearing to each bond separately that he was worth $2,000?—A. I do not interpret the law. My statement was this: that a man could swear to each bond that he was worth the amount of that bond. I am not one of the Government officers for the purpose of interpreting the law.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Were these bonds completed by you at one time—on the same day?—A. Yes; on the day that Mr. Ryan came with them. That was the day I finished the bonds.

Q. That is the first you saw of the bonds and the last?—A. The first and the last; yes, sir.

Q. You signed your name to each bond, then, three times?—A. Three times; yes, sir.

Q. And you would pick up one bond and complete it before you would go to the others, would you?—A. Well, very often we had them open in this way, and signed on this side, and would turn them over when they were dry, and would then sign them on the other side.

Q. Did you make a personal examination of each bond?—A. I did not think it my place, sir, when I saw the names were signed; the signatures were there; that is all I considered my duty.

Q. Did you read each bond?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you read each certificate you made?—A. I filled them up in my own handwriting. There might have been one or two little ones that I did not. The blanks were very short; in one place there were only two lines, and in another only three and a half or four.

Q. How many rooms do you have?—A. Only one.

Q. How many inkstands do you have?—A. Some half a dozen, I think; three on my desk.

Q. The same kind of ink?—A. I do not think any two contain the same ink.

Q. Did you use out of the same inkstand, or different inkstands?—A. That depends a good deal upon circumstances.

Q. Well, when you signed these bonds, I mean.—A. I was some time signing them. I do not know that I signed them all with the same pen, even.

Q. I am now asking you about the ink. For instance, you would lay the bonds out in that way, and write this signature and that signature.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then, after those were dry, you would turn over the papers and write the other signature here.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, I am asking you whether, on those bonds, for those two signatures, you used the same kind of ink?—A. I could not say that I did; for I know I locked up my desk at one time and went away, and afterward came back and finished.

Q. I am talking about that bond. Did you quit in the middle?—A. I cannot tell, sir; it is impossible to say.

Q. Can you say as to any of them?—A. I cannot; it would be impossible. Some of them would sign certificates on this side, and some of them—

Q. Now, take this bond that I have in my hand, on route 16104; I will ask you if your signatures which appear here are not in different ink?—A. I do not know whether the difference there arose from blotting this and not blotting that one, or not. I cannot say.

Q. You swear that you cannot tell whether it is different ink or not?—A. I swear that I cannot tell whether it is different ink or not.

Q. It does not look different now?—A. It does look different to me; yes, sir.

Q. When did this man Clark sign with you?—A. He did not sign until after I had signed.

Q. Was Clark there?—A. Clark was not there.

Q. Did you see Clark sign?—A. I did not, sir.

Q. You do not know whether he signed it at all, do you, except that there was some man by the name of Clark who appears to have been there?—A. I know that signature very well, sir.

Q. You are acquainted with Clark?—A. I knew him; he was a member of Congress from the State of Texas. I knew him when he was a general in the Army.

Q. I will ask you if Clark's name, there under your name, as a witness to this bond, the number of which I have given you, is not in the same ink that your name is signed with to the jurat on the third page of the bond?—A. Not that I know of, sir; for Mr. Clark did not sign that in my office. I do not know what ink he used.

Q. How long have you lived in Washington?—A. I was born where the Post-Office stands on Seventh street.

Q. You are an old resident here?—A. Rather old. I lived here until I went out in the Army in April, 1861, as captain of volunteers.

Q. How long have you known Kittle?—A. I have known him but very slightly. I do not know that I know him at all. I think that Mr Kittle has been in my office three or four times. I am now keeping an office. I went into the business of notary public on the 23d day of March. I went where I am now. Previous to that I had been five doors off, with my father. There I was in an office with him and my brother. But since that I have been in the office where I now am, and Mr. Kittle has had some friends in there, and has frequently come in, but I have had no intimacy with Kittle at all. I have seen him more since he came to see me last Tuesday evening, and stated that somebody had disputed my word, than, perhaps, I had ever seen him before in my life.

Q. What did he pay you for witnessing these bonds and swearing him to them?—A. He paid me 25 cents apiece.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Did Kittle pay you?—A. Kittle paid me.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Not Reynolds?—A. No, sir; Mr. Kittle paid me.

Q. Be kind enough to state how you administered the oath to Mr. Reynolds in these forty-odd bills. Did you swear him in a lump or on each one?—A. I swore him in a lump.

Q. You are a careful, painstaking notary.—A. He did not ask me to do anything else. Mr. Ryan did.

Q. Did you swear Kittle in a lump, too?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was Clark's signature here at the time you signed it?—A. It was not; no, sir.

Q. The bond lacked that much of being complete?—A. The bond lacked that much. I do not know as it requires two witnesses—

Q. The bond lacked that much at that time?—A. The bond lacked that much at that time of being complete; yes.

Q. This was on the 2d day of February, I understand you?—A. No, sir; I think it was the 1st. I am guided in saying so by the date of these bonds. I cannot fix it in any other way.

Q. That is, your jurat to the bonds?—A. Yes; that is the only way I can fix the date.

Q. Do you recollect the day of the week?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. You said it was about 10 o'clock.—A. About 10 o'clock in the morning.

Q. How did you happen to recollect it was about 10 o'clock in the morning?—A. It was early in the morning. I had just got my breakfast and been up-stairs in the Pension-Office and come down.

Q. Did you look at the clock?—A. No, sir. I knew pretty well the time when I got my breakfast that morning, and I had only a square and a half or two squares to go to get to my office. I went there and found a letter on my desk, which the penny-post leaves there about 9 o'clock. I went up-stairs to see Mr. Babson and came down, and when I came down these gentlemen were there.

Q. Are you an attorney?—A. No, sir; I am not an attorney. I have been a solicitor, and have a good many friends call upon me to do their business in the Pension-Office. I have had four or five cases as a pension-agent, but not as a lawyer.

Q. But you are not a lawyer?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever see Reynolds before?—A. I never saw him before, and I do not think I have ever seen him since.

Q. Did Ryan use the same kind of ink?—A. He did not sign in my office. They were signed when he came there. If any person signed in my office Mr. Kittle may have done so, but nobody else did. Mr. Ryan told me this was his signature, and the name struck me as that of a gentleman, a painter, on Capitol Hill here, but I had not seen him before.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. Mr. Ryan acknowledged his signature?—A. Mr. Ryan acknowledged his signature to me at that time, and he did so also in the presence of Mr. Tyner last Wednesday.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 7, 1876.

Capt. THOMAS P. LEATHERS sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. I would like you to state to the committee all the information that you have in regard to carrying the mails by contract with the Government on the Mississippi River, dating back from 1871 up to this time; what connection you had with them; what mails you have carried; whether for the Government or for other persons in the employ of the Government.—Answer. Well, I have not got the dates exactly; I can give you the outline of my course. I have been carrying the mails awhile for A. S. Mansfield. I have always done the work on my day, the day I run on, Saturday. I have carried the mails since 1868 for A. S. Mansfield; I have carried it for Cannon and Bell. I have carried it for Dr. Peterson, and I refused to carry it for J. B. Price three or four years ago and threw it up, would not carry it, and finally the Government contracted with me individually to carry it on that day. We believed, sir, in my profession that we could not get a mail-contract—that we did not stand well enough in Washington as southern men; that we could not obtain a contract, and we had to go to those who had the ears of men in power to get a contract, and on one occasion I gave my obligation that I would not carry the mail for any person, but one man, that was Dr. Peterson; he was to come to Washington and he might get the mail at what figure he saw proper, if he gave me a thousand dollars a month for carrying the mail on my day from New Orleans to Vicksburgh and back. The doctor had got it temporarily, and I had been carrying it for him for months. I do not know how long. He came to Washington, and the mail was awarded to Kountz, or Price, Tyne and Tupper. Dr. Peterson telegraphed me that Price had got the mail, and to throw it up. That was in 1871 or 1872. Kountz came here, I reckon, more as a mouth-piece than as a contractor. He had no capacity to carry the mail, but the men who did the work had not the ear of the Department here. I got my information from Mr. Dennison, who was Postmaster-General. We were boys together, and he told me that it would be impossible for me to reach the ear of anybody here; that I was booked there yet as a rebel, and could not get anything. I came here to obtain my pardon, and go to work again, as I could not take charge of a boat on the Mississippi River with anything booked against me as a disloyal man. I was pardoned by Mr. Johnson. I contracted with the Government then to carry it after Peterson threw it up, and Price could not carry it; they would not give me the mail for three months; they fought it off; but there were so many petitions, (for the most valuable mail was on my day, and they could not get any boat to carry it against me,) that they finally contracted with me to carry the mail, which contract had to run until July, 1875. Last July Mr. Draper bid for the mail, and Mr. Parker, I think, afterward took the contract, and he came down there and made overtures for us to carry the mail, but nobody appeared to take hold, and he could not get outsiders to carry it at all; so it was not carried for about two weeks. Mr. Terrell then came there and interviewed Captain Tobin and myself, and we agreed to carry the mail until such time as he could contract with other parties, and in September last Tobin got the contract for three years.

Q. You have been carrying the mails on your boats since 1868 and 1869, then?—A. 1868, I think, was the first; the contract of A. S. Mansfield. He became insolvent afterward, and Bell bought him out, and I sent Bell here and he would not get it in my name, and did not get it for me, but he got it in his own name, or the name of Cannon and Bell. He rather beat me on the contract, and beat me out of $6,000 or $7,000. Afterward they took the contract from me and I awarded him $5,000 to give me over one-half of the contract, and get out of the fight, and I think this is the only contract that we have had in our trade that has been legitimately obtained by the carriers themselves.

Q. I understand you that the first time you got a contract since you first carried the mail in 1868 was the 1st of September last.—A. No, sir; I got a contract to carry it on my day. Price got the contract to carry the mail three times a week, but he could not fill it on my day, and I would not take it from him, and it went on three months that way, and the Government made a separate contract with me on my day, to finish out that term which expired in June last.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. They were to pay you an additional sum of money?—A. Yes, sir; a little addition; I took it for $10,000 per annum. Mr. Lowell advised me not to put in my bid for more money, and I took it for $10,000 per annum.

Q. What do you carry it at now?—A. $35,000 per annum, three mails a week. I carried it the one time for $10,000, during the time of Price's contract.

Q. The route is numbered in this book 8006, from New Orleans to Vicksburgh, and I notice that in the bids of 1871 the contract was awarded to a man by the name of William Williams, at $7,000, three times a week—that is, the contract was awarded, but not executed. Then, on July 30, 1871, it was awarded to B. H. Peterson, of New Orleans, July 1 to December 31, 1871, at the rate of $37,500 per annum. Now, is that the contract that Peterson made with you to carry the mail?—A. That is the contract that we carried for Peterson, but I do not think his contract lasted but a little while. I then entered into a contract with Dr. Peterson, as also did the captain of the Bob Lee and the captain of the Katy, to carry the mail with him for a thousand dollars a month each boat, and not to carry it for anybody else.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. He got $37,500. That left him $1,500.—A. I do not know what he was getting. That is what he gave me. I do not know whether he gave it to the others or not.

Q. At the end of six months, when it was re-advertised, who was the contractor then?—A. J. B. Price, though Kountz was his spokesman; but he was ostensibly the contractor.

Q. I notice he was the highest bidder when the contract was let originally, the 1st of July, 1871. The bidders were J. B. Price, $38,000, and J. B. Price, $36,900; then another bid, same parties, $48,500, three times a week; J. W. Carlton, $34,000; Thomas Casey, $39,900. Do you know what Thomas Casey that is?—A. No, sir.

Q. Alfred Lee & Co., $28,000; do you know who they are?—A. No, sir.

Q. Alfred Brobb?—A. No, sir.

Q. Cannon, Leathers, and White, $25,000. That was your three boats?—A. $25,000! Nobody was ever authorized to make that bid by me; that was a straw-bid.

Q. And $37,500, three times a week?—A. Ah! twice a week, $25,000. Yes, I suppose that is right.

Q. J. W. Carlton, $26,000.?—A. I presume he is a nephew of J. W. Cannon; I think so.

Q. William English, $23,000; $38,000, three times a week. William Williams, three times a week, $7,000, and the contract was awarded to him as the lowest bidder. How long did your contract with Price last?—A. The contract that Price had lasted until July, 1875.

Q. You carried the mail for him, then, for that time?—A. No, I carried it for myself. I contracted for it separately, on my day, $10,000 per annum, but Price negotiated with the other two boats, the Bob Lee and the Katy. I don't know what he paid them; the Department contracted with me, directly. I appeared to be more stubborn than the rest.

Q. How did that happen?—A. Well, they could not get the mail moved against me; in other words, the compensation would not justify a steamboat that had nothing else to land for to land mails. We have thirty-six landings in that route, and the distance is 409 miles.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. As I understand, then, the Post-Office Department made a contract with Ross to carry the mail twice a week?—A. They made a contract with him to carry it three times a week, but he could not get it carried on my day, Saturday, and he had to throw it up; and the Department, I suppose, let him off on my day and contracted with me. There was a difference, I am told, between my price and the other boats' price. I charged more. I think they had it for less money. I do not know how much. They never would tell me. Then we all expired on the 30th June last, when Mr. Draper came in again.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Then, in that way, you carried the mail from the time that Price began to carry it, until the 1st of July, 1875?—A. Yes, sir; I carried it three months without a contract.

Q. Peterson's contract, then, was the six months previous to that?—A. Yes, sir; as I told you here, we gave Peterson a power of attorney to take the contract for us and he agreed to give us that amount of money, and the boats were all at his disposal.

Q. How did you come to make a contract with Peterson?—A. Well, I did not think I could get a contract myself, and I wanted to carry the mail. I wanted my people served there as I was running, and we bound ourselves not to carry it for any outsider. Peterson said he had the inside track, that he understood how to pull the wires, how to sound the gong. I never came back to Washington after I got a denial from Postmaster-General Dennison.

Q. State what Peterson told you about that.—A. Well, he just told me that he had an inside track in the Post-Office; that he could do more than any other man outside of Washington; that he could control more contracts. He told me that he had a great many contracts.

Q. How did he control them?—A. I do not know how he controlled them.

Q. How did he tell you that he controlled them?—A. He never told me how he controlled them, only that he had an inside track here and could get more money. The Red River men told me it was no use, to go to Washington when Peterson was there; that he could get the contracts.

Q. Did he have contracts on Red River, too?—A. O, yes, sir, plenty; so I was told. I never saw them, but the Red River men so reported. He had a contract to go to the mouth of Red River outside of the packet-days, and a daily contract to the mouth, and also up the Red River. I think he ran a stage up the bank of Red River from Red River Landing.

Q. Did he own any boats in the river?—A. He never owned a boat that I know of.

Q. What do you know about Peterson?—A. Well, sir, I do not know much about him. I have come in contact with him very little; have had very few interviews with him. He is a contractor, that is, he plays between Washington City and the southern country down there with contracts, subletting them to other people. I should call him a floating agent, if I was to call him anything.

Q. After you gave him a power of attorney that was just previous to the bids of 1871?—A. Yes, sir. We had entered into a contract with him, and when he came on to Washington in July, 1871, we gave him, each of us, our obligation not to carry the mail for any outside persons, and gave him a letter to the Postmaster-General that he was our only authorized agent to visit Washington to get mail for those three boats.

Q. That was equivalent to shutting out everybody else?—A. Yes, sir; that was shutting out everybody else that came down there as an outside man to bid for the mail. We could not get it ourselves and we determined only to report to one fellow; we thought we could handle one better than we could handle the whole community.

Q. And you expected him to handle the contract?—A. Yes, sir; we expected him to handle the Government, and we would handle him.

Q. And the result was that he came back with this six-months' contract?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did he tell you that he managed these things here?—A. He did not tell me. He and I were not very thick in the matter, and he never opened any secrets to me about his power, but it was considered there that he was a big man at Washington in the way of contracts. Looked upon, as the children would say, as a bugaboo man; everybody else had to stand by.

Q. Did he have any other contract for carrying the mail?—A. I only know as he told me that he had a contract from New Orleans to the mouth of the Red River. That was three times a week by the boats that carried the Vicksburgh mail. We carried it three times a week.

Q. What did he pay you for carrying that mail?—A. Nothing. That was included in our business. It is on our schedule. I think he told me that he had a daily mail to the mouth of the Red River.

Q. I notice the route from New Orleans to Shreveport, 660 miles, and back three times a week by steamers, the contract for which was awarded to this same man Williams. He failed to carry it, and then the contract was entered into with B. H. Peterson for $29,000 per annum; how was that mail carried?—A. I expect the Red River boats intercepted it at the mouth of the Red River.

Q. What boats carried it up to the mouth?—A. We always carried it on our day.

Q. Then you carried the mail for Peterson for his Red River contract and for the Vicksburgh contract, both?—A. Of course, we took all mails to the mouth of the river. All distributing mails went on our boats. It is about 220 miles from New Orleans to the mouth of the Red River.

Q. I notice a large number of mails from New Orleans. I will read over to you a number of routes and see where they go: New Orleans to Covington, 56 miles and back; that is across the lake. New Orleans to Monroe, 480 miles and back.—A. The Monroe mail now goes by Vicksburgh by the railroad. That is up the Ouachita. That goes up by the mouth of Red River.

Q. But the mail would be carried on the same boats as far as the mouth of the Red River for that route also?—A. Well, for a contract for Monroe and New Orleans the Ouachita mail, I should think, would leave by the Monroe boat, but if there was anything outside for Red River or above Red River, they had a right to put in mail on us at any of these landings, and Red River is a large distributing post-office.

Q. Where is Saint Francisville?—A. It is now called Bayou Sara; it is on the Mississippi, but it is on the bluff.

Q. B. H. Peterson had a contract July 1, 1871, New Orleans to Saint Francisville; did you carry that mail? He had that at $16,000 per annum.—A. No, sir; I think the Pike carried that—Captain Brown, the present contractor.

Q. It is right on the river; your boats land at that place?—A. Yes, sir; they carry a mail there also. The Saint Francis mail is Mondays and Fridays from New Orleans, then the Vicksburgh mail comes and supplies Baton Rouge, Bayou Sara, Plaquemines, and those places on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, so Bayou Sara gets five mails a week, three by our line and two by the regular Bayou Sara mail. There are from thirty-five to forty mails on the landings supplied by this boat, making two trips a week. Then we take up the regular offices, about thirty-three in number, from that to Vicksburgh three times a week. We could not run the service there with one line of boats. After we got by the cotton-district we could not afford to make thirty-eight to forty landings for post-office business. We would rather not carry the mail than do it. Our boats are too big, and when they are loaded they break for home, making only the town landings.

Q. I understand, then, that you carried the mail for Peterson during that time on the route from New Orleans to Vicksburgh, and also the mail from New Orleans to Shreveport as far as the mouth of the Red River?—A. I do not know that. We carried all the mail-matter that was offered on our day.

Q. Your three boats made the trip three times a week?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It could have been carried in that way?—A. O, I have no doubt that that is the way it was carried to the mouth of the Red River.

Q. Then he gave you $36,000 a year to carry the mail, the three boats, supposing the others got the same you did?—A. I presume they got the same.

Q. They carried the mail from New Orleans to Vicksburgh, and also the Shreveport mail as far as the mouth of the Red River?—A. Well, I could not tell you how much mail-matter they carried for Shreveport, but we carried all the bags that were offered. The Red River mail is always a very heavy mail, a very large distributing-mail.

Q. Well, if it had been put on your boat you would have carried it?—A. Yes, sir. We had no specified number of bags to carry to any office. We took all that were offered.

Q. And it was taken by the Red River boats at the mouth of the river?—A. Well, I should think so, but I would not like to say that; I know that we took Red River mail-matter to distribute at the mouth of Red River.

Q. Well, it could have been taken that way as well as any other?—A. O, yes; any amount of mail-matter.

Q. The mails below Vicksburgh could have been carried to the mouth of Red River without any additional expense?—A. Yes, sir; there is no post-office supplied by the Red River boat below the mouth of Red River, that I know of. Captain Blanks used to be the contractor to Monroe, but I have never questioned him, and I have never been up there. I have never had any occasion. If I had known what I was coming here for I could have refreshed my memory.

Q. I understand you to state as a reason why you did not try to contract directly, that you concluded you would stand a better chance with Peterson?—A. Well, I could not. I was under the impression that men who had been rebels could not get a contract here.

Q. Who made you believe that you would not be recognized by the Post-Office Department?—A. William Dennison, Postmaster-General, told me that I would have to make certain proofs of certain things before I could be recognized in the Department. It owed me before the war $17,000 or $18,000 for old services, which they have never made any appropriation for.

Q. You say you don't know much about Peterson?—A. No, sir; I never had an opportunity to know much.

Q. You do not know whether he is a man of property or not?—A. I never heard of his having any property; I heard that he lived on Magazine street, New Orleans, but I do not know that; I never saw his family.

Q. You are certain that he never owned or commanded a steamboat on the river?—A. I am certain that I never heard of his owning a steamboat or a piece of one. He never owned anything in my trade, nor in the Bayou Sara trade.

Q. Where is he now?—A. I do not know. I saw him in New Orleans some two months since.

Q. Does he live in New Orleans?—A. I do not know, sir.

Q. Did he live there then?—A. He lived there a year or two ago—it was so said. I brought a suit against him to get a settlement, and I never could get a settlement; but I met him and did get a settlement.

Q. Well, he represented to you that he was the only man that could get contracts out of New Orleans on the river?—A. Well, he had a bigger inside track here than anybody else.

Q. He seems to have had a good many contracts, and produced that impression on a good many; I want to know how he did it?—A. Well, now I tell you honestly, I only took what everybody said for an ultimatum, that he was the most able man here, and that he had more influence with the Department than anybody else. That was the reason that I hung to him. I was not going to send a limber piece here if I could find a good strong one.

Q. What did he give you to understand that he meant by having the inside track?—A. Well, it was, as we understood everything down there, that he was a fellow that had the inside track here—that had favors extended to him, I presume. I do not know why. I reckon that his word would go further than anybody else's, and his bids would go further than anybody else's. I do not know any other view to take of it. He was introduced to me as a man that had great influence with the Post-Office Department in Washington.

Q. Who introduced him to you in that way?—A. That I could not tell you. It has been several years since. Some steamboat-man; it was in everybody's mouth among steamboat-men. Capt. J. J. Brown, of the steamboat W. S. Pike, worked for him two or three years, and the Red River men all worked for him.

Q. You said somebody, you and other steamboat-men, came to Washington; what time was that?—A. No, I did not come here. Captain Cannon came here and some other steamboat-men.

Q. In the contract that Peterson made with you, what was to be done about the fines and deductions?—A. Well, of course, if we were fined, the boats would have to stand that. The man that was fined would have to stand the fine. Each boat pays her own fine.

Q. What time did the delegation of steamboat-men come here in 1871?—A. I cannot tell you when they came, nor how many came; but I know that Captain Cannon came here, and I think Captain Brown came. I would not be positive. I could not tell you how many came, nor who they were. I was rather on my own hook, and was fighting against the rings generally.

Q. Then they did not represent you?—A. No, sir; nobody represented me at all. I was never represented here but by Peterson, and I would not have been represented by him if I had not known that he was a powerful fellow.

Q. I understand you to say that the three boats you have named are the only three boats running regularly in that trade that you are in?—A. Yes, sir; the three mail-boats. We are running a spare boat this winter. Captain Tobin runs the Katy as a spare boat to carry the surplus; and the Bob Lee and the Natchez run a spare boat to carry the surplus that they could not carry themselves.

Q. You say you do not know what the other boats were paid by Peterson for carrying the mail?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether the other two boats carried the mail to Red River Landing?—A. Yes, sir; they all carried the mail there.

Q. I mean the Red River mail?—A. I don't know. They carried all mail-matter that went out with them.

Q. Were there any other boats that went out regular days, landing regularly at Red River Landing?—A. No, sir; sometimes Red River boats would go with us, and sometimes they would not. I do not know of any regular route-boats there.

Q. And that is the reason, you suppose, that yours and the other boats carried that mail, because they went regularly three times a week?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In your contract with Peterson was anything said about carrying that mail to Red River Landing?—A. No, sir; nothing.

Q. Was there a written contract between you and Peterson about it?—A. Only a contract to do the work for so much money—not binding him further. If he could not get the mail of course we had to throw it up. If he turned us over to other hands, we had to meet the antagonist as he came; we did not care how he came so that he came in the shape of a boat.

Q. Do you know whether the boats ran in connection with the stages from Red River Landing?—A. Our boats did, and do now always.

Q. That is one reason why you suppose you carry that mail?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know any necessity for a contract outside of the New Orleans and Vicksburgh contract for carrying the mail from New Orleans to Red River Landing?—A. No, sir; there was no mail carried there only what the packets carried.

Q. Was there any necessity for any other mail-line?—A. No, sir. We carried the mails three times a week to Red River Landing; I do not see any necessity for any other contract. It was the same service that all the post-offices above got, Natchez, for instance, one of the largest and most isolated towns.

Q. Have you ever had any talk with Postmaster-General Creswell or Jewell or Denison in regard to the middle-man, Peterson, or any other middle-man?—A. No, sir; only last winter when I was here in February, when the awards were made. I have never been here only that time to talk to the Postmasters, when I came as a bidder myself. My bidding three years ago was done by Mr. Lowell. When I threw up the mail and would not carry it then the Postmaster-General telegraphed to Mr. Lowell to get the mail carried by a responsible party on Saturday, my day, and Mr. Lowell sent for me and showed me the telegram; and I told him I would make a bid if he would give me a proposal in writing. He did so, and I took the contract and the contract was sent out and signed there in New Orleans. We carried out that contract until last February, when I came here and got a contract with the Government. We came here, Captain Tobin and I, and we found we were too high; our bids were higher than Draper's.

Q. How did you find out that you were too high?—A. They were read to us in the Post-Office; I did not know Draper, and I told Mr. Jewell we were determined not to carry the mail for middle-men. That was our intention. I think Draper's was a straw-bid. I do not know that there is such a man. I told Mr. Jewell that we would throw it up in July, and we did throw it up. I told him that, and that the men who took contracts in Washington and sublet them out there I never found were very anxious to pay.

Q. Didn't you get your money from Peterson?—A. He was about the only one I did get it from.

Q. Didn't you from Price?—A. I did not carry it for Price. I carried it for Mansfield, and for Cannon and Bell, and I never got a settlement with them.

Q. The only visit you paid to Washington was last winter?—A. Yes, sir; about the only visit. I came here in September again and closed the contract.

Q. Who is Mr. Lowell?—A. He was the postmaster at New Orleans.

Q. Is there anything that you can tell this committee that you have not stated about this straw-bid arrangement, the manner of their making and executing contracts on the Mississippi River; anything in regard to that?—A. Well, if I were to tell you anything I should only tell you from observation, my idea of it. I could not put my hand and swear to anything about straw-bidders. I think it was a link of men together—Price, Peterson, and others. It looked so to me. I think they might put in twenty bids, those men that you read off. I know if there was a man able to carry the mail in my trade, I would know him as a steamboat-man. It looks to me as if it was a link of men together.

Q. Did Price own any boats?—A. No, sir; not on the Mississippi. I understood he owned a little boat on the Teche, down there at Saint Martinsville. He owned nothing in our trade.

By Mr. SLEMONS:

Q. You spoke of a stage running up from the mouth of Red River. Is that country overflowed so that the stages do not run regularly?—A. Not now; it was in the spring; it will be in a short time now; all the bottom-lands are now threatened with overflow.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. I understand that you were here first in 1865, after the war?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was before you were pardoned?—A. Yes, sir; at the time I came here to get pardoned. That was the time I saw Postmaster-General Dennison.

Q. Were you pardoned at the time you saw him?—A. Within a day or so.

Q. Was it before or after you were pardoned that you saw him?—A. I could not tell exactly. I came to see Mr. Dennison first, and then before I went away.

Q. Were there any advertisements for mail-service at that time?—A. No, sir; I had nothing in the world then in the shape of a steamboat. There was no mail-matter by steamers before two or three years afterward. The boats carried the mails, but there was no contract.

Q. You did not propose to Postmaster-General Dennison to take temporary service, or any other?—A. No, sir; but I came to get back pay that was booked to me. He said it never could be done for rebels like me.

Q. That was referring to work done before the war?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Not referring to contracts in the future?—A. No, sir.

Q. You commenced carrying the mail in 1868, you say?—A. In 1867 or 1868, I think. It was through A. S. Mansfield that I then carried the mail. He was a partner of Oakes Ames, and, I think, may be, of General Butler. Oakes Ames telegraphed me to come here and take the mail. I had a boat then—the Magenta. Mansfield, at the time that he took the mail-contract, didn't have any boat. He bought an interest in the steamboat Magenta, that I was running, and came here to get the mail.

Q. You and he had a talk about it?—A. O, yes. He came here to get the contract for the boat, but he gave it up in a short time.

Q. So far as you and he were concerned that contract was all straight; you owned the boat together?—A. Yes, sir; he owned an interest in the Magenta and a part of the Bob Lee.

Q. Whom did you next carry the mail for on that route from New Orleans to Vicksburgh?—A. Jesse K. Bell bought out Mansfield in the Magenta, and he came here and took the contract in the name of Cannon and Bell.

Q. Then you ran the boat in connection with Bell?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know whether Bell got his contract at a regular letting?—A. I don't know, but he got it.

Q. How long did you and Bell carry it on the Magenta?—A. I carried it part of the season, and I changed my interest in the Magenta for that in the Quitman, and I ran her and sank her. After that they took the mail from me.

Q. You hadn't anything to carry it with?—A. Yes, sir; I got another boat next day.

Q. Bell still had the contract when the Quitman was sunk?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Bell then carried the mail on other boats than yours after the Quitman was sunk?—A. No; I chartered the boat and carried the mail after the Quitman was sunk. He took it away from me one week, and then let me have it back.

Q. Bell was still interested in steamboats, was he?—A. Not with me; I think he was in some way with the Bob Lee, but I cannot tell you that.

Q. He was a steamboat-man on the river, was he?—A. No; he was a commercial man.

Q. A commercial man, not running steamboats himself, but getting others to run them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who is Cannon?—A. He is a steamboat-man, the owner of the Robert E. Lee; he and Mansfield and Bell were operating together, I think.

Q. That brings it down to 1871?—A. No; 1868. Bell and Cannon got a contract that ran from 1868 to 1871. I would not swear to dates now. The secret was this: that Bell bought an interest in the Magenta for Bell and myself, from Mansfield, but he took it in his own name, and he came here to get a contract for the two boats, and I paid my pro rata of $500, and after I sank the Quitman I found that he had bought the boat in his own name, and he owned the boat. He had not bought any interest for me.

Q. He had not treated you fairly?—A. Well, I did not consider it wrong, because I ought to have known the man better.

Q. Then you and two other men appointed Peterson your agent?—A. That was to get another day on. We had been carrying two mails a week, what we ought to have had, and which we used to have before the war three times a week. James White captain of the Katie, wanted the mail for the Katie, and I wanted to see him get it. Captain Cannon, of the Lee, wanted to get it, and I wanted him to get it also for the Natchez, and we agreed, in 1870, that Peterson should be the only agent to come to Washington to act for Cannon, White, and myself. I gave him an obligation of honor not to carry the mail for any middle-man outside of Peterson.

Q. You also wrote a letter to the Postmaster-General that he was the only authorized agent that came to Washington to bid for those three boats, and that you would not carry it for anybody else?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then you four folks made up a little ring?—A. Of course we did. I had to work for somebody, and I wanted to know what I was going to work for, and I told him we will carry this mail for $1,000 a month each, and we don't care what you get it at. That I had nothing to do with, because I knew that I could not get it at all.

Q. You were to get so much pay, and for his compensation he could get whatever he could outside of it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you state in this letter that you wrote to the Postmaster-General how much you were going to charge?—A. No, sir; I don't know that we did so; but I said that to Peterson, "We will do your work for $1,000 a month, and you can get what you please."

Q. You say you knew that you could not get the contract?—A. Well, I thought I could not.

Q. Didn't you know that you had a right to bid at that time on all contracts?—A. Well, I had the right to bid.

Q. And didn't you send Peterson here to bid?—A. Yes, sir; but Peterson was not me nor my partner.

Q. Then you did get the contract for carrying the mail under that arrangement through Peterson?—A. He got it.

Q. How long did you carry the mail under that arrangement?—A. I think about five, six, or seven months, temporary service.

Q. There was a new advertisement; did you bid at that new letting?—A. No, sir; Peterson bid for me.

Q. Why didn't you bid?—A. I thought it was idleness to bid.

Q. Had you ever read the postal laws?—A. I didn't give a cent about reading it. I knew what I had to work under down yonder. Your laws up here and those down there are very different.

Q. In reference to post-office matters, are they different? Have you read them to see whether they are different?—A. O, I didn't want to read them. I am no lawyer.

Q. How do you know that they are different?—A. Well, I never tried to get contracts.

Q. You never tried but two since the war?—A. Well, I have seen so many of my friends try, and come back with pockets empty, that I hadn't the money to spend.

Q. Yet you bid for a contract in 1871 and got it?—A. Yes, sir; after I fought three months for it. That was the only time that I could make the fight. I was not able to make the fight before.

Q. Peterson, in 1871, at the regular advertised bidding, did not get the contract?—A. No, sir; Price got it.

Q. Peterson turned in and telegraphed to you not to carry the mail because Price got it?—A. Yes, sir; that is it.

Q. In pursuance of your agreement, you would not carry it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know how much Price was to get?—A. No, sir; I do not. It must have been a lower rate than Peterson bid.

Q. And you concluded that you would not carry the mail for him and thereby run him out?—A. No, sir; I didn't want to run him out; but he had to come to my terms. If he had given me what Peterson was giving me, after I got released from Peterson, of course I would treat with Price.

Q. You appear to have bid at that letting in 1871?—A. He may have put in a bid in our name.

Q. If the bid was put in in your name in 1871 for $25,000 twice a week, Peterson did it, did he?—A. I did not put it in for $25,000.

Q. Now, what I want to know of you is, whether you individually, with those two parties, subscribed your name to that bid and put it in, or whether it was put in through Peterson in pursuance of this authority that you had given him before that?—A. It was put in by Peterson, I think. If my recollection is right, he came here with that document from T. P. Leathers, John W. Cannon, and J. M. White. He came with the document to the Postmaster-General that he was the only authorized agent that would come to Washington to represent those three boats.

Q. This bid of Cannon, Leathers, and White, did you not sign it yourself and get the guarantees, and give the bid to Peterson to put it in for you?—A. Well, sir, if I signed it I have forgotten it. I don't think I ever bid for the mail in my own name, until I came here myself; and as for that $25,000 bid, I cannot recollect anything about it.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. Your three boats could not carry the mail twice a week very profitably?—A. No, sir.

Q. How long after this was it before you got the contract yourself?—A. That contract went into effect, I think, some time in July, maybe, or maybe it was in January, and I didn't get a contract for three months. After the other boats had agreed to carry it for Price, there were no mail-bags carried on my day for three months. In other words, the postmaster recommended all letters to be put on board the steamboat Natchez; he recommended merchants to put their distributing mails on the Natchez, and I would distribute them; which I did.

Q. But you were not getting any pay for that?—A. No, sir; I tried to afterward.

Q. So that they found out, when Price failed, they could not do any better than to employ you; so the Postmaster-General made a proposal to you?—A. I could not reach the Postmaster-General here; it was three months before I could get a proposition out at all. He would not agree, until the three months was up, that he would contract again. It is out of the usual course to give one man a mail to himself.

Q. But finally they could not do any better, and in order to get the mail carried they did contract with you?—A. Yes, sir; with me directly. That was up to the 1st of July.

Q. You make the trip once a week?—A. Yes, sir; a round trip.

Q. Well, it is your duty to carry all the mails where you stop?—A. Yes, sir; all offices from Bayou Sara to Vicksburgh, two hundred and forty or fifty miles, and we bring in on a trip the town-landings, Plaquemines, Baton Rouge, Port Hudson, and Bayou Sara, and then we take up local offices on each side of the river and distribute them out to Vicksburgh.

Q. But I understand you to say that on part of the route there is a lot of small offices that a large boat like this could not stop at, and they had to have small boats.—A. General Clark was asking me about the Saint Francisville mail and below. I say there is service below Bayou Sara that we cannot do; we cannot do the work. Bayou Sara is in the sugar district, and above it is cotton. Now, our routes are concluded when we get from Bayou Sara down. The mouth of the river is about fifty miles below Bayou Sara. There are about thirty-odd offices there that we do not touch. They call them local offices, and the Vicksburgh mails do not touch them at all; they only touch the towns.

Q. Who does touch them?—A. That is the Bayou Sara mail. It leaves a day ahead of us; what they call the coast mail. Our service comes Friday and Saturday, and the Bayou Sara intervenes between.

Q. There is a route from New Orleans to Shreveport, six hundred and sixty-five miles and back, and proposals invited to extend service to Jefferson, Tex. Do I understand you to say that the mails on that route were not carried from the mouth of Red River to New Orleans?—A. I said I did not know that. I said that we carried all mail-matter to that landing that was sent on our day.

Q. That is your duty, under your contract?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You do not know, then, of your own knowledge, whether the mails are carried from the mouth of Red River or not?—A. No; I did not say that I knew that. A boat running to Red River would have no point to go to unless she ran to New Orleans. She would not have any point of business; she would have to come to New Orleans.

Q. It would take a pretty good line of steamers to make tri-weekly trips from Shreveport to New Orleans?—A. It would take a good many boats.

Q. There was no such line as that?—A. I do not know. There are fifteen or twenty Red River boats.

Q. You simply do not know whether that service from Shreveport to New Orleans was performed or not?—A. O, I never was up the river in my life. I do not know anything more than you do. We run in connection with the stage lines now.

Q. Is there a part of a year that they run the steamer up the river?—A. They run the most of the year.

Q. Well, don't they carry that mail on the steamers?—A. I do not know.

Q. There is another: New Orleans to Saint Francisville, one hundred and seventy miles, and back?—A. That is the regular mail that is running out from New Orleans to Saint Francisville, now known as Bayou Sara.

Q. You do not know whether the service was performed on that route there?—A. Yes, sir; it was performed there by the steamer W. S. Pike, Captain Brown. He is now running the steamboat Governor Allen. He carries it Tuesdays and Fridays out from New Orleans, and carries what they call the coast line.

Q. In reference to this New Orleans and Shreveport route, state whether it is not true that it would be impracticable to run a boat at any reasonable price to carry the mails merely, in the trade from the mouth of Red River to Shreveport, not having any connection with New Orleans.—A. I would not suppose she could carry a mail there unless the mail would pay for her services pretty much. The terminus of all trade there—cotton trade—is New Orleans, excepting up the White River, or up the Yazoo.

Q. How far is Saint Francisville or Bayou Sara from the mouth of Red River?—A. Fifty-two or three miles. Bayou Sara is below the mouth of the Red River.

Q. Do you know how long the service has been on those different routes?—A. It was in 1867-'68 that the service was put on, after the war.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. From New Orleans to Vicksburgh, in what year?—A. Either in 1867 or 1868.

Q. Was it put on in the same year from New Orleans to Saint Francisville?—A. I think so, sir. My idea is that they were put on at the same time, though there might have been a mail below earlier. I could not be positive.

Q. I have understood that they have been increasing the service in that region, and I did not know but part of this was put on at one time, and part some other time.—A. No, sir; this service was established in 1852 or 1853. I was the first contractor for the mail there, and carried it up to 1862. Then, when the contract was annulled by Congress here, I carried it for the confederate service until the fall of New Orleans.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Peterson claimed, of course, when he got you to make him your agent along with those other parties, that he understood all about it, and had the inside track, and you believed him, and hence made him your agent?—A. He told me he could represent me better than anybody else, and he could get more money for it, and everybody else told me the same thing, and I had a right to believe him.

Q. For that reason you employed him?—A. Of course. I wanted to employ the best agent I could.

Q. Did you have it from the Department, or from anybody at Washington in the Department?—A. O, no, sir; it was only steamboat-men themselves.

Q. He told you at the time that he wanted you to make the contract?—A. Yes, sir. I was introduced to him for the purpose of seeing whether I could get the contract.

Q. Did you seek an introduction?—A. I think it was mutual. He was a large contractor, and he told me that he had big influence, and all that sort of thing, and, of course, he was the man I wanted.

Q. You say that Price had no interest in a steamboat except in one little boat?—A. None that I know of on the river.

Q. Do you know whether other parties made Price their agent as you made Peterson your agent?—A. I do not know whether they did or not.

Q. Cannon, Bell, and Brown, are they in those mail-contracts now?—A. Cannon is now one of the contractors, but Captain Cannon and I are not very friendly, and we do not talk.

Q. You say when you came here last winter and your bid was opened, that you found your bid was higher than Draper's?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Draper enter into a contract?—A. That is what I understood, that his bid was accepted.

Q. Yet you did not know Draper?—A. I never saw him.

Q. Did he perform the service?—A. No, sir.

Q. When he did not perform the service, then they had to get you to do it?—A. They did not get me. Then there was no service performed for two weeks, then they got me for temporary service until they could re-advertise. I was down there, and I contracted there with Mr. Terrill, assistant postmaster there.

Q. How much are you getting now for that contract?—A. I agreed to carry it at the same rate at which we had carried for the previous year, for three months, until it could be re-advertised.

Q. Did you put in a bid on the re-advertisement?—A. O, yes, sir. We got it. We were the only bidders that time. We have contracted now for $35,000 per annum. We divide the $35,000 between the three men. That was the only bid that was put in for the service.

Q. That is about what you have been carrying it for before?—A. About.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. What is the name of the post-office at the mouth of Red River?—A. Red River Landing.

Q. When you were carrying for Peterson, did you put off mail-bags for Shreveport there?—A. I could not tell you unless I was posted. I do not know. We have now a distributing post-office on board the steamer. We may take fifteen or twenty bags. They may send a bag or two or three bags for Red River Landing, and it is the route-agent's duty to distribute this mail himself.

Q. Was that the case when you first carried the mails for Peterson?—A. Yes, sir; wherever we had a mail we have had a route-agent on board.

Q. Do you know the distance from the mouth of the Red River to Shreveport?—A. No, sir; I have never been there. They call it about 450 or 500 miles.

Q. It is about the same distance as your route from New Orleans to Vicksburgh?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You spoke about a conversation that you had with Mr. Jewell when you were here?—A. O, that was in conversation with Mr. Jewell about the mail service; that was all. We were speaking about Draper, and I only told Mr. Jewell that Draper would certainly have to do the work, and I did not know any capacity that he had on the river to carry the mail; but Mr. Jewell brought in his adviser and read the bids, and it was determined—it could not be otherwise—to accept the lowest bidder. He proved to be a man that did not come to the front at all.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. Then, as I understand, when Draper did not come to the front, you performed the service temporarily for three months?—A. Yes, sir; the mail was thrown up by us two weeks. Mr. Jewell sent Mr. Terrill to New Orleans, and we agreed to carry it two or three months for the Government at the old rates, to give time to re-advertise, and then, after that new advertisement, we became the bidder.

Q. Does that bid stand in your name?—A. We bid in the name of Leathers, Tobin, and Cannon; they represent and own the three boats, and the contract is now in their name.* We agreed to carry it for $35,000, three times a week and return, and we divide the money between us. That contract lasts until July, 1878. When it came down to the scratch I think our bid was the only one.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. Do you know whether the Saint Francisville boat supplies all the local post-offices below the mouth of the Red River?—A. Below Bayou Sara. She supplies all the offices between there and New Orleans.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. You say that when this other man put in his bid but did not perform the service you performed temporary service, and the Postmaster-General said he had no authority at the time to give it to you because the other man was the lowest bidder?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he seem anxious to make the arrangement with you provided he could do it?—A. Well, I thought Mr. Jewell was anxious enough to arrange with competent men.

Q. In other words, he wanted to arrange with steamboat-men?—A. Yes, sir; I thought he wanted steamboat-men.

Q. He appeared anxious to get rid of this other man?—A. I thought so. He always talked to me that way, like a gentleman, very fair. I think he is a man who has been trying to make the best contracts he could.

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1876.

JOSEPH S. CARRELS sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. Had you any connection with the Post-Office Department, as a special agent, at any time between July 1, 1871, and 1875?—Answer. I was a special agent from the 1st of July to the 1st of April, 1875.

Q. Were you put on any special duty, during that time, to investigate any of Peterson's routes on the Mississippi River?—A. Well, I cannot say that I was. I was a special agent in the money-order service exclusively; but I was sent twice on the Mississippi River to Greenville, and to Skipwith's Landing, to investigate the money-order business at those two points which are between Vicksburgh and Memphis, and at those points, while I was there, I was very much impressed with the delay of the mails, particularly at Greenville, the boats very frequently not stopping there for sometimes as much as ten or twelve days; and in my report to Dr. McDonald, the superintendent of the money-order department, I mentioned it, and he suggested to me, when I went down again, to investigate those matters. It being entirely out of my line, as a money-order special agent, I had nothing to do with the service on the river at that time, and I did not go down again, and I made no special investigation. I did not know whose routes they were; but at several points it struck me very much indeed, the irregularity of the mails and the seemingly careless manner in which the work was done. I was satisfied there was something wrong, but what it was I could not know.

Q. You received those instructions from Dr. McDonald, but you did not return?—A. I did not return. The money-order service agents have nothing to do with this, but they can be appointed on any service.

Q. What was the matter with the money-order office down there?—A. Their accounts were very much out of order. They had been behind in their remittances. They are required at certain times to make remittances of their surplus funds.

Q. What did they say was the reason?—A. They said they could not make them because the mails were so irregular; that was the reason they gave, and it was so. I was waited upon by prominent citizens and other business men, who complained bitterly that they had no mail facilities.

Q. Do you say that the mails were not landed many times for twelve days?—A. Yes, sir; for ten or twelve days. Money accumulated and could not be sent off; that was the difficulty. In addition to that, the postmaster told me that upon one occasion they had employed a special messenger to carry their mails from Greenville to Memphis. The name of the postmaster is Britlinger, or a name similar to that. I see he has just been removed. I think I was there in December, 1874. I have no means of refreshing my memory of that fact; but I think it was December, 1874.

Q. You ascertained that the difficulty in that money-order office there resulted entirely from want of competent mail-service at that time?—A. Yes, sir; there was no possible way of sending it off. The mails were not going.

Q. The regular service on that route was the tri-weekly mail from Memphis to Vicksburgh?—A. That is my impression now.

Q. Did you communicate those facts to the Department?—Yes, sir; to the superintendent of the money-order department, to whom I reported.

Q. Did you ascertain, while you were down there, how long these irregularities had continued?—A. No, sir; my impression is that I was told it was common—that it occurred frequently.

Q. You don't know who had the contract on that route?—A. No, sir; I do not. While I was there, there came a little boat along the river, I don't know what boat, but it was not a mail-boat, and the accumulated mail was put on that boat and sent up the river.

Q. Did any one else in the Post-Office Department talk to you about this matter?—A. No, sir. I had no conversation with any one else, only in the money-order department.

Q. You made no other inspections except the one you have mentioned of any routes?—A. No, sir. There was one point in that thing that struck me as very singular, and I think I spoke to Mr. Holbrook about it—why it was that there were so many lines on that river, so many post-routes. For instance, stating from memory now, there was a line from Memphis to White River, and a line from Memphis to Vicksburgh, and a line from Saint Louis to Vicksburgh; then I believe there is a line from New Orleans to Saint Francisville. Anyhow there are several of them, and I do not understand why one or two lines could not have taken those mails along.

Q. There was a line also from New Orleans to Vicksburgh?—A. Yes, sir; that is so, I believe.

Q. Was there not also a line to Red River Landing?—A. Yes, sir. I believe there was; it struck me as strange that there should be so many of them, and I thought it strange that with so many lines, and with all those facilities, the people should be deprived of their mails.

Q. When did those irregularities occur?—A. I was there in December, I think, and the irregularities had occurred previous to my visit. These mails had been accumulating for some ten days at that time, but the postmaster at Greenville told me that it had occurred before.

Q. You have no knowledge how long that contract ran afterward, or how long it had continued previous to that?—A. No, sir. I had no information connected with those lines.

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. Where do you reside?—A. In Nashville, Tenn.

Q. How long have you been living there?—A. Some twelve years.

Q. What are you doing now?—A. Assistant postmaster. I resigned my position as special agent to go back into the office. I had been in the office ten or eleven years.

Q. Were you ever a special agent before?—A. No, sir. I was a special agent nine months exactly.

Q. And you were connected with the money-order department only?—A. Only.

Q. Did you ever have any experience in the contract division?—A. No, sir; I have never had anything to do with the contract division.

Q. Did you ever make any reports to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, or was it to the money-order department solely?—A. Yes, sir; to money-order department solely.

Q. Was Holbrook in the money-order department at that time?—A. Yes, sir; at that time.

Q. Was he the man you were reporting to, or Dr. McDonald?—A. Dr. McDonald.

Q. How did you happen to talk to Holbrook about this matter?—A. Being old acquaintances, we talked about this—it was an accidental conversation.

Q. Did he report it to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General?—A. I don't know how that was.

Q. Then your report to Holbrook was a mere casual conversation?—A. A mere casual conversation.

Q. It was no part of your official duty to report to him?—A. O, not at all. I was under the supervision of the superintendent of the money-order department, and my reports were made to him.

Q. You reported these facts to the superintendent of the money-order department?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In writing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any order to report, or to tell anybody else about it?—A. O, no.

Q. You don't know whether he reported it to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General or not?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know who had those contracts when you were on those routes?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether there were any regular contracts, or whether it was only temporary service?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Do you know the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company?—A. There is a line there, the Anchor Line. I have been on their boats several times.

Q. They are very large, fine boats?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is a very fine line and a responsible company?—A. I do not know. By general reputation, I believe it is.

Q. That was the line that carried the mails, was it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long were you there; ten days?—A. No, sir; I was there only two—part of two days in Greenville.

Q. Then it is not true that you were there ten days, and there was no mail?—A. No, sir; I did not say that.

Q. Was there any mail on those two days?—A. Quite a large quantity.

Q. Was it carried by any of those boats passing?—A. No, sir; there was a large quantity of mail there that had accumulated.

Q. And out of all those that had contracts there was not one of those mail-boats that landed there?—A. No, sir; because if there had any mail-boat stopped there this mail would have gone.

Q. Did the mail-boats pass without stopping, or were they on the river at all?—A. That I don't know.

Q. You say that the mail would have gone; it would have gone if the postmaster had done his duty, would it not?—A. I presume it would.

Q. You don't know whether he did his duty or not?—A. No, sir; I don't know, but I presume he did.

Q. Then either the postmaster did not do his duty, or the mail contractors did not do theirs; you don't know which, do you?—A. No, I don't really know; but the postmaster had the reputation of being a very excellent officer, and the people were very anxious about their mails.

Q. And the Anchor Line of the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company have the name of being a excellent line of boats, have they not?—A. Yes, sir; I believe they have.

Q. So honors are easy on names, are they not?—A. Well, yes; they were, I suppose, a very excellent line of boats, but had I been agent in charge of the mails I should have hauled them over the coals pretty considerably, for not attending to their business better.

Q. You don't think, then, that the Memphis and Saint Louis Packet Company did good service?—A. Well, sir, in several instances while I was on their boats, I thought they did not.

Q. You are going now upon what the postmaster told you about the irregularities?—A. The postmaster and the citizens.

Q. Do you say you found that postmaster's accounts very badly mixed?—A. Yes, sir; the money-order accounts.

Q. Did you get them straight?—A. O, yes.

Q. You found no defalcation?—A. None that I know of. I straightened up his accounts.

Q. And everything that was out of order about his accounts he accounted for by the defective service on the river, so that he could not make his remittances?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there anything wrong in his accounts except that he had held money too long?—A. That was all that I know of.

Q. The accounts were in good shape, well kept?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was simply, then, that he had held money longer than he ought to?—A. Yes, sir; the regulations compelling him to remit the money over-due.

Q. And that was the only matter that was wrong in his accounts?—A. All that I know of.

Q. Was the river low or high at that time when you were down there?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Was it frozen or open?—A. Open.

Q. This place where you were was Greenville; where is that on the river?—A. Between Memphis and Vicksburgh.

Q. Red River Landing is below Vicksburgh?—A. Well, I am not acquainted with the river.

Q. Do you know whether the mouth of Red River is below Greenville or above it?—A. I really do not know; honestly I don't know.

Q. What State is Greenville in?—A. Mississippi.

Q. How far above Vicksburgh?—A. That I don't remember.

Q. How far below Memphis?—A. That I could not say, positively.

Q. Is it above or below the mouth of the Arkansas River?—A. That I do not know; my geographical knowledge of that section of country is very limited.

Q. Then, do I understand you to say that the line of boats doing the service between New Orleans and the mouth of Red River, passed, or should have passed, Greenville?—A. No; I did not say that, because I don't know how that is. I merely stated that there were several lines.

Q. Do I understand you to say the line from New Orleans to Saint Francisville passes Greenville?—A. No, sir; I did not say that, for I don't know.

Q. You say that there are several lines that have contracts to carry the mail, passing Greenville, on the Mississippi River?—A. I did not say that.

Q. Be kind enough to give us the names of the contracts!—A. That I do not know.

Q. Do you know that there is more than one line of boats that has a contract for the mails passing Greenville?—A. That I do not know.

Q. Then, when you say that you were struck with the fact that there were so many different lines that had so many different contracts about Greenville, you mean to say that you do not say that?—A. No, sir; I don't think I said that they were all about Greenville. I said, in passing up and down the river I noticed that fact, to get to Greenville I had to go to Vicksburgh.

Q. Where did you start to go to Greenville?—A. At Vicksburgh; and then I have been from Vicksburgh to New Orleans, stopping by the way.

Q. Where did you go when you left Greenville?—A. To Memphis.

Q. Then you passed from Vicksburgh; what points did you stop at?—A. Only at Greenville, going up the river.

Q. That was in December?—A. That was the only trip that I ever made in connection with the mail service from Vicksburgh to Memphis, stopping at Greenville.

Q. When were you at Greenville the second time?—A. I don't remember; while I was a special agent. I was there some two days that time, probably. I cannot say whether it was before or after December, without having my papers before me.

Q. Did you stop at any place besides Greenville the second time you went from Vicksburgh to Memphis?—A. That I don't remember. I had occasion to go to Skipwith Landing, and from there I continued on to New Orleans. I have been down the river several times. That was the second time.

Q. How many places have you stopped off at, going up and down the river?—A. Three. Skipwith's Landing, Greenville, and Bayou Sara, at three different times while I was special agent.

Q. State how many different contracts were in existence, the boats of which should have been run past Bayou Sara, Skipwith's Landing, and Greenville at the time you were there.—A. That I do not know.

Q. Then why do you state that you were struck with the poor manner in which the mails were carried down there, considering the great number of different contracts then existing to carry them?—A. What struck me was this: If the Anchor Line could not do it themselves, why did they not get somebody else to do it?

Q. You say you were struck with the poor service, considering the number of different contracts there were to carry the mail over the same line, yet you say you do not know how many contracts there were. Do you want to modify that statement in reference to being struck by the poor service, considering the number of different contracts that existed to carry these mails?—A. I did not say there were so many contracts going to Greenville. In my passage up and down the river, I said I noticed that.

Q. Tell us how many different contracts there were to carry the mails up and down the river.—A. For instance, I presume there were several lines passing Vicksburgh.

Q. Give me the lines passing Vicksburgh?—A. That I cannot say, because I am not acquainted with the service there.

Q. Do you know that there was more than one?—A. Yes; I do.

Q. What were they?—A. The Anchor Line, from Saint Louis to Vicksburgh.

Q. What was their contract?—A. That is what I do not know.

Q. How many times were they to carry the mails a week?—A. That is what I do not know.

Q. When did they commence carrying?—A. I could not answer that, for I don't know.

Q. Was there a contract in force when you were at Vicksburgh?—A. That is what I do not know.

Q. Then the Anchor Line part of it you take back—you don't know anything about it?—A. I don't know anything about the contracts, only I presumed they were mail-boats from the fact of their carrying the mails.

Q. You don't know but they carried it as a matter of accommodation?—A. That is not the custom of the Post-Office Department.

Q. Is not that frequently done on the Mississippi River?—A. I think not.

Q. Is it never done?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. Do you know that it is never done?—A. I don't think they are so accommodating as to carry the mail that way.

Q. We have it in evidence that they do it sometimes.—A. I didn't know that.

The CHAIRMAN. Please state to the witness what evidence you have of that.

Mr. CANNON. I am stating that as fact, and I want to know whether he knows that it is true or false.

The WITNESS. Well, if the steamers carried them for the Government for nothing it seems to me that the postmaster at Greenville could have had his mail carried, because he told me that they were very anxious to have that mail carried, and that they had made efforts to have it carried, and if the steamers carried the mails for nothing he would have had no trouble, because there were a number of boats that passed Greenville.

Q. Then you don't know whether any of the steamers carried the mails without pay or not?—A. Not to my knowledge I never investigated it.

Q. You don't know whether the Anchor Line had a contract while you were at Vicksburgh?—A. No, sir; I never investigated that.

Q. What other line had a contract?—A. That is what I don't know.

Q. Is not this true about it, that you don't know anything about the contracts to carry mails on the Mississippi River, or the mail-lines, but when you were down there your observation was that the mails were not well carried?—A. That is what I stated.

By Mr. SLEMONS:

Q. Was the Anchor Line passing Greenville when you were there, running to Vicksburgh and back? Did you travel on those boats on any of those trips?—A. I think not.

Q. You don't know whether the Anchor Line was running on that route or not at that time?—A. I don't remember. The weather was pretty cold.

Q. Did you see those Anchor Line boats at any time?—A. Yes, sir; I have been on them. That was at another time.

Q. Was that when you were going to Greenville?—A. No, sir; at another time.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

• Q. I understand you to say that when you went down there that the complaint of the postmaster was that there was sometimes ten or twelve days when the mail would accumulate.—A. Yes, sir; he told me that.

Q. Under whose contract should this mail have been carried?—A. My impression was that it was the Anchor Line.

Q. Don't you know to whom the contract was let?—A. No, sir; I do not. I never made any investigation of it.

Q. In this conversation, when you returned, did you understand who had the contract?—A. No, I don't remember that.

Q. Did you make a report of your investigations there?—A. Yes, to the superintendent of the money-order office. That report was in writing.

Q. Do you remember what the report was?—A. I do not, excepting the statement of the postmaster of the accumulation of the mails, his accounting for the fact that he could not make remittances.

Q. Did you report to the Department that the trouble was owing to the neglect of the contractor in carrying the mail?—A. I don't remember that. I have not had reference to my papers, and I could not say that I did that.

Q. Did any member of the Post-Office Department speak to you in relation to this matter?—A. I had a few moments' conversation, I think it was with Mr. Holbrook. I don't remember now what that conversation was.

Q. To the best of your recollection, did you consider that there was neglect on the part of the contractor in carrying this mail, and that he was receiving money for carrying a mail which he was not carrying?—A. That was the impression made on my mind. My impression was that if the boats to carry the mail were not there, it was his business to have it done. I don't recollect the name of the contractor.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. Do you know that the contractor did receive his pay?—A. Of course I do not know that.

Q. You don't know what he was fined and deductions made for the delay?—A. I don't know that.

Q. How do you know, then, that he got his pay?—A. I presume that the contractors got their pay.

Q. They did not always; how do you know that he did?—A. Well, I don't know. I presume they did. Contractors generally got their pay, and I presume they did.

Q. You say you had the impression that they did; why?—A. Yes, sir; from that fact that men who perform service generally get their pay for it. Of course I was not present at the settlement of their accounts.

Q. That is not a fact, but that was your supposition?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that the only reason you have for the impression that he got his pay?—A. I don't know of any other.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Were there general complaints down there?—A. Very, very general. I saw a number of the business-men while I was there, and they stated that this was a very common thing.

Q. Did the postmaster admit to you or state that he had notified the Post-Office Department of these delinquencies on the part of this contractor or contractors?—A. I don't remember that. In giving the reason why he did not make his remittances, I think he said that he had notified the Department of the difficulty of getting his mails off.

Q. Was there anything said about entering fines against those parties, in the Department?—A. I don't remember hearing anything about that.

Q. From the information you derived from conversing with the people there and the postmaster, were you of the impression that the contractors were receiving pay and yet were not fulfilling their contract?—A. That would be just my impression.

Q. That is the impression you have now from the statements made to you at that time by the postmaster and other citizens?—A. Well, I don't remember that there was any conversation—the burden of the complaint was in reference to irregular mails. I don't know that there was any other.

Q. That they failed to call for the mails for 8, 10, or 12 days at a time. Now, from your recollection of your conversation with those parties and the information which you derived from your conversation with them, is it your impression that those contractors were receiving pay for service not performed?—A. My impression was such, but not derived particularly from them, but from the ordinary manner of doing business; so if there was a contract, I presumed of course that they got pay.

Q. Do you know of any other delinquencies on the part of contractors?—A. No, sir; I do not.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. Did you make any examination at the Department here, to see whether that postmaster at Greenville had reported failures in the arrival or the departures of the mail from his office?—A. No, sir; I did not. I had no occasion to do that.

Q. Was your report exonerating him from blame on account of the irregularities complained of?—A. Well, I don't remember that. I think probably I may have said to the Department in my report that he gave this as a reason.

Q. But didn't you report your conclusions?—A. I don't remember that.

Q. You were sent there to ascertain the cause of that money-order business not being carried out properly, were you not?—A. I was sent there to see why his remittances had not been properly made and also to correct his accounts.

Q. Did you find out why they had not been properly remitted?—A. He gave me the reason why.

Q. And you reported the reason why?—A. Yes, sir; I think I did.

Q. And that was on account of the irregularity in the mails?—A. Yes, sir; that was it.

Q. And you did that, exonerating him, on account of that difficulty, without ascertaining whether he had reported these failures or not?—A. O, I could not exonerate him.

Q. No, but you could report what you thought regarding it—you did, didn't you?—A. I don't know without having the papers before me what I reported.

Q. You have no recollection whether you found him to blame or not?—A. O, I didn't think he was to blame.

Q. Then you did find that he was not to blame—that it was not his fault, on account of the non-departure of the mails?—A. That is my impression now.

Q. And you did that without ascertaining whether he had reported these failures or not?—A. I don't remember how that is, because that had nothing to do with my instruction.

Q. You had been acquainted with the post-office business before?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And knew that it was the duty of the postmaster when there was a failure, either in the arrival or departure at the proper time, to report it?—A. That is the custom.

Q. He had the memoranda from which his reports were made in his office, had he not?—A. I didn't see them.

Q. You did not look?—A. No; I did not look. That was not part of my duty. I had no connection with any of the business but the money-order department.

Q. No; and when he gave you that reason, that the mails did not come regularly, it was not your duty to look over and see whether he was lying or not?—A. From the conversations with the business-men—

Q. Where do you consider the safest place to find the records of a post-office; in conversation with the prominent business-men, or in the office?—A. O, that requires no answer. Of course, I go to the office to look for the records; I should not go outside of it.

Q. Did you do that there?—A. I don't think I did.

Q. And you reported, exonerating him from blame upon his simple statement, and that of outsiders, that the mails did not pass regularly?—A. I don't know anything about my exonerating him from blame; I stated the facts. I had nothing to do with exonerating him.

Q. What were the facts?—A. Just what I have stated; that the mails were irregular, and that they had great difficulty in getting the mails off.

Q. But the records of his office show nothing of that kind that you know of?—A. I didn't examine them. They are filed at the Department.

Q. Have you been continued in the detective business since?—A. I have never been in the detective business, and never was.

Q. You were sent there to examine into those irregularities?—A. To examine his money-order accounts.

Q. Were you continued by the Department in that business of going about to examine money-order accounts of post-offices?—A. I resigned my position.

Q. You never went on any other trip except to examine the Greenville office?—A. I was on various trips.

Q. Did you make every examination with the same care that you did this?—A. The superintendent of the money-order department can answer that.

Q. I ask you if you made other examinations in the same manner that you did this?—A. As far as the business of the office is concerned, yes, sir.

Q. How did you find his money-order account?—A. In good order.

Q. You found it perfectly correct?—A. Yes, sir; I think so.

Q. How long after that was he retained in office?—A. He is still in office I think, from what I know.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. You spoke of resigning; were you informed that your resignation would be accepted, or did you force the resignation on the Department?—A. I resigned for the purpose of going to my old position in the office.

Q. Be kind enough to answer my question?—A. It was of my own free will and accord. I had no intimation that it was required.

Q. I want to know whether the resignation was forced or not?—A. O, no, by no means, because I was given to understand that my service had been perfectly acceptable, and it was with great regret that my resignation was received.

Q. How long have you been in Washington this time?—A. Seven or eight days.

Q. Did you come on a subpoena?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know on whose suggestion you were subpoenaed?—A. Indeed I do not. I was very much astonished when I got it.

Q. You speak of Holbrook being in the money-order office, and telling him about this thing; where is he now?—A. He is in the city, I presume.

Q. Still in the money-order office?—A. I presume not.

Q. Holbrook is the clerk, or he was, of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department?—A. I don't know what position he has.

Q. Is he employed about the Capitol now?—A. I believe he is; I have seen him several times.

Q. Do you know, as you know any other matter from common rumor, that he is the clerk of one of the committees of this House?—A. I don't know it.

Q. I want to identify the gentleman. Now if you have seen him since you came to Washington and he told you that he was engaged in this business, state it.—A. He never told me.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was he the gentleman that you saw talking to me this morning?—A. Yes, that is the man.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. You say in answer to Mr. Luttrell's question, that your impression was, from the ordinary manner of doing business, that the contractors got paid, whether they did the work or not?—A. Well, I don't know that fact, sir.

Q. You say your impression is that way?—A. Well, I judge that from the fact that contractors usually get their pay.

Q. Do you say that they usually get their pay whether they do the work or not?—A. O, I need not say that, because it is customary when there is any failure to deduct their pay for that.

Q. Then your impression is that they don't get pay unless they do the work?—A. I don't know. I could not say positively.

Q. You never examined a contractor's account in the Department?—A. I never did of course. It was not in my business; I was exclusively in the money-order service.

Q. You say that the postmaster of Greenville might have said that he made a report of the delinquencies of the mail contractor; do you recollect that he did say so?—A. No, I do not.

By Mr. AINSWORTH:

Q. What was the service contracted to be there, weekly, tri-weekly, twice a week, or daily?—A. I don't know.

Q. The postmaster did not tell you?—A. No, sir.

Q. And you did not make any inquiry?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. MILLER:

Q. Where are you living now?—A. In Nashville, Tenn.

Q. You were subpoenaed from Nashville here?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. LUTTRELL moved that the reporters for the press be admitted to the meeting of the committee. He said that some of them appeared to be getting the proceedings in some way, and if one got them all should get them. Therefore, although it had not been customary to admit reporters to committees of investigation, he now moved to admit them here.

Mr. WADDELL seconded the motion.

Mr. CANNON moved an amendment, that the doors of the committee-room be thrown open to the public. He thought the gentleman [Mr. Luttrell] was mistaken in his statement as to the custom; always during his [Mr. Cannon's] experience in Congress these investigations had been held with open doors. Two years ago this very committee had made an interesting and protracted investigation with open doors.

Mr. LUTTRELL said that he, too, had spoken from experience. Last year, as a member of a committee appointed to investigate affairs at the South, he had moved at the beginning of the investigation to open the doors, but the objection had been raised that if that were done the room would be so crowded that the committee could not work. He was opposed to admitting everybody indiscriminately to this investigation, but was in favor of admitting the representatives of the press.

Mr. WADDELL said the object of opening the doors at all was to give the proceedings of the committee publicity, and the press being the medium through which that could be done, he thought it would be sufficient to admit the representatives of the press. He had no particular objection to admitting the general public, but he saw no necessity for it.

Mr. STOWELL said he had served in Congress for four or five years and had seen a good deal of committee work, and his experience was that, just as soon as the doors were thrown open to all, very few persons took advantage of the privilege; while, if a committee sat with closed doors, everybody wanted to get in. He, therefore, favored Mr. Cannon's amendment, having no fear that the room would be overcrowded thereby.

Mr. LUTTRELL thought it was time enough to consider the admission of the general public when they asked to be admitted.

Mr. STOWELL thought that a better rule would be to admit everybody at first, and then, if the crowd became too great, make the necessary restrictions when the necessity for it should arise.

Mr. CANNON said that if his amendment were adopted he would cheerfully join with the other members of the committee in imposing whatever restriction should afterward prove to be necessary; but, while he had a great regard for members of the press, he did not believe in discriminating in favor of any one class of American citizens.

The amendment was rejected—ayes, 3; noes, 4; and the motion to admit members of the press was then agreed to.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1876.

T. L. HOLBROOK sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Question. Did you have any connection with the Post-Office Department from the 1st of July, 1871, forward? If so, state what it was and the capacity in which you were employed.—Answer. On the 1st of July, I was a $1,600 clerk in the contract-office, assigned to duty with J. B. Armstrong, superintendent of railway-mail service. I was made a special agent on the 5th of August, 1870. Prior to that, for a year, I had been in the position I have named as Mr. Armstrong's clerk, assigned to duty with him. On the 5th of August, 1870, I was made a special agent of the money-order bureau, and traveled on business of that bureau until about the 1st of July, 1871, when I was made an $1,800 clerk in the money-order bureau. The position made by the promotion of the chief clerk, David Haynes, I was appointed to, and held that position until the 28th of February, 1875. I was asked to resign by the Postmaster-General, on the 3d or 4th of February, and my resignation took effect on the 28th day of February; since which time I have had no connection with the Post-Office Department.

Q. We have had witnesses before us testifying in regard to the Peterson contracts—the contracts that Peterson had made with the Post-Office Department for carrying the mail, and also some contracts with Mr. Kittle. Have you any information or knowledge, either official or otherwise, in regard to the Peterson contracts, from personal observation on the Mississippi River?—A. I have, sir.

Q. Please give the committee a general statement of your knowledge in regard to the Peterson contracts. Begin at the beginning and state to the committee all you know about Dr. Peterson and his connection with persons outside and inside of the Department, if you have any such knowledge.—A. My first knowledge of Dr. Peterson's contracts, and of Dr. Peterson himself, was obtained in the winter of 1870-'71 and the spring of 1871, at which time I was traveling as a special agent for the Post-Office Department, through the State of Louisiana and in Northwestern Texas. Prior to that time I had no knowledge or acquaintance with Dr. Peterson. I ought, perhaps, to state that my position as money-order special agent did not require me to examine into anything, excepting the finance of the post-offices—the money-order business, other than to report to the Postmaster-General, or to the proper officers, any irregularity which in the performance of my duties I observed, in connection with other branches of the Department. I was ordered by the superintendent of my bureau to investigate the condition of the Saint Francisville post-office money-order business, the Plaquemines office, the Alexandria office on the Red River, and the Natchitoches, and to investigate some offices in Northwestern Texas—Marshall, Texas. Plaquemines is the first office that, on the Mississippi, I was directed to visit north of New Orleans. I went to that office on the Natchez, I think. After transacting my business there, I went on to Saint Francisville, which is not directly on the river; it is the terminus of the Bayou Sara route. Saint Francisville is half a mile to the rear of Bayou Sara, on the bluff. I cannot say whether it was when I was on my way to Saint Francisville or after I had left Saint Francisville—but my impression is that it was between Plaquemines and Saint Francisville—my attention was called by the route-agent on the Natchez to the fact that three offices on Davis's Bend were not supplied but once a week with mail, the Robert E. Lee, the other boat on the line, not delivering any mail on the Bend to three post-offices. I had a long talk with Captain Leathers, who told me that he was discouraged in his efforts to contract with the United States Government, being unable to reach them at all except through a middleman, B. H. Peterson, and he asked me if I would call the attention of the Department to the hardships which they endured through the fact I have just mentioned. He said that Peterson was an irresponsible man; had no property, no position, and they did not like to do business in that way. I found that the facts told me by this route-agent were true. When we went into the Bend, the postmaster at New Carthage called upon me and stated that his people were complaining very bitterly; that he had continually written to the Post-Office Department, and was unable to obtain any attention to his letters, and asked me, as an officer of the Department, to lay the facts before them on my return. I went up the Red River, and found that the letter-mails and paper-mails were carried upon the forward deck of the steamer, entirely unprotected. The boats were loaded with emigrants. I was on three or four boats, having to stop off at Alexandria and Natchitoches before I reached Shreveport, the terminus of the route. I went to the clerk about it, the mails being entirely unprotected, emigrants sitting on the letter-bags, so that any one with a knife could have got access to the letters. I called his attention to the fact, and he replied to me something in this way: that if the United States Government, or the Post-Office Department, did not like the way they carried the mails they could go to hell with them; that they were getting little or nothing for carrying the mail; that they were forced to do business through a middleman, and unable to get their pay, even what he did agree to give them. This was a boat of the Red River Packet Company, G. L. Kountz, president. On my return to New Orleans, I called upon Mr. Kountz, called his attention to the manner in which the mails were being carried, and to an additional fact that the post-offices on Red River, which I had stopped at, complained that they for weeks, sometimes, have received no mail, especially on the down-trip of the boats, for the reason, as they assigned, that the boats were heavily laden with cotton, and refused to make any landings, unless they had cotton to take on or passengers to put off. In one instance, twelve mails were brought upon the boat, the boat not having stopped there for twelve trips, and the service was three times a week; so it evidently had not stopped for a month. On reaching New Orleans, I was introduced to Mr. Kountz by either the assistant postmaster or the postmaster there, and called his attention to this condition of things, and his reply was similar to that of the clerk: that they could get no contract from the Government; that Peterson was receiving $30,000 a year for carrying the mail; that he agreed to pay them $150 a week, but they were unable to obtain that; and he used about the same language that the clerk of the boat used. He went on to state further that there was no possibility of the steamboat-men of New Orleans obtaining any contracts while Giles A. Smith was Second Assistant Postmaster-General, except through Dr. Peterson. On my return to Washington, I made a written report in relation to the failure to supply the offices on Davis's Bend, (New Carthage was one, Hurricane was another, and the name of the third has escaped me,) stating the facts in relation to the manner in which the steamer Lee treated the mail, carrying it and dropping it at the first post-office beyond the entrance to the Bend, the mail being taken up by the Natchez and carried in; and the reasons given me for the Lee's not going into the Bend. That report went to D. A. Floyd, the clerk in charge of that contract section. I had a talk with General Smith, Second Assistant Postmaster-General at that time, in relation to the condition of the service there, and said as much as I thought it desirable to say, I being an officer of the Department, holding a minor position. Among other things, I told him that Dr. B. H. Peterson was openly trading in Louisiana upon his influence with him. General Smith did not receive at all kindly what I told him. He turned it off in some way, I do not now remember how. General Smith never forgave me for the statement which I made. That there might be no misunderstanding in relation to it, I made a more full statement than I could make to my superior officer, to an intimate friend of his, A. H. Brown, a townsman of his, and at that time contract-clerk for the Territories. I also talked with Mr. Floyd in relation to it. So far as Mr. Peterson's contracts are concerned, the only knowledge that I have from personal inspection of his services is what I have stated to the committee.

Q. The contracts for service running up the Mississippi and on Red River which you have stated?—A. Yes. As I have referred to the conversation of Captain Leathers, I ought, perhaps, to state that he told me that Capt. J. W. Cannon, captain of the Robert E. Lee, and a delegation of steamboat-men were then in Washington to lay their grievances before the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and the Postmaster-General. When I returned to Washington, I found that delegation here. I saw them in the room both of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and of Mr. Creswell, who was Postmaster-General at that time; and that was one reason why I did not enter more fully into an explanation of the condition of things with General Smith. I believed that he had received it all from the steamboat-men, who were the direct sufferers. The only one of those steamboat-men whose name I now remember is J. W. Cannon, the present captain of the Robert E. Lee.

Q. You state, then, that you have laid all the facts that you have stated to the committee before the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Smith?—A. No, sir. I have stated that I laid some facts in relation to the contracts before him, and said to him that this man was openly trading upon his influence with him. I did not go into detail with General Smith, as I have before the committee, but I told him what I have stated.

Q. State whether you had any other conversation with persons in the Department—officers of the Department—in regard to these Peterson contracts at that time, or after that?—A. Very frequently, subsequently to that; afterward, I talked very fully with the superintendent of my bureau, Dr. C. F. McDonald, in relation to these matters.

Q. In your talk with him, to what extent did you give him information?—A. I talked fully with him. If my memory serves me, I told him very much what I told this committee.

Q. Was he aware of the facts from any other source?—A. He was.

Q. What did he say in response to the information you gave him? Did he seem to be aware of the facts from other sources?—A. I cannot say as to that at that time. He was afterward.

Q. How did he become aware of them afterward?—A. When I went back into the Department I accepted the position of corresponding clerk for Dr. McDonald's bureau. I had been connected with him for a number of years. It was an $1,800 clerkship, and a portion of my duty was to examine into the accounts of postmasters, to see that their balances of surplus funds were promptly forwarded to the proper depositing office. We had a great deal of trouble with the offices at Greenville, Miss., and at Skipwith's Landing, now Duncansville, Miss. The postmasters there were holding back large sums of money, which they were not authorized to hold under the law and regulations, and in response to my letters they replied that they had no boats bringing mail to, or receiving mails at, their offices, and had not had for weeks. Under the instructions of the superintendent, I directed Mr. J. S. Carrels, a special agent of the Post-Office Department, to visit those offices. I also directed other agents to visit the offices, and ascertain where the trouble was, collect the moneys belonging to the Government, and reprimand the postmasters. I do not know that I ever saw the report of Mr. Carrels, but I talked with him very freely and frequently on the subject after his return. He was at that time agent of my bureau. The report of another agent I copied, and I have the copy with me. I was led to this from the fact that no attention was paid to reports in relation to irregularities in that service. Dr. McDonald, the superintendent of my bureau, told me that he had got about tired of reporting the facts to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's Office; that he had got about tired of reporting the irregularities on that route, especially to the contract-office. Before forwarding the report of which I speak to the contract-office, I made a copy, which I have with me.

Q. Did Dr. McDonald say that he had reported the facts to his superior officers, and that no effort had been made to correct the irregularities after those reports?—A. No, sir. The custom of the bureau was to forward communications in relation to irregularities of service to the contract-office; either to forward the report itself and the evidence we had, or to make copies of the reports and send them around to the contract bureau.

Q. How did Dr. McDonald happen to make the remark to you, that he had grown weary of forwarding these reports to his superior officers in the Department?—A. On account of the continued failure of these postmasters, of whom I speak, to remit their funds, upon the same plea that they could not get the mail out; that there were no boats coming to their offices. Perhaps it was called out also from the further fact that I sent to the inspection-clerk of that division, Mr. Sickles, and called his attention to the fact of the accumulation of our moneys at those offices, and the risk that the Government ran from the inability of the postmasters to comply with our instructions.

Q. Did you state the facts to Mr. Sickles also, as to the irregularities in the mail-service there?—A. I did, sir; he was very well aware of the facts in regard to those irregularities. I stated the facts also to Mr. Floyd, the contract-clerk for that section, who advised me to let the matter alone; that it was a matter that it would not pay to meddle with.

Q. What reason did he give for that statement?—A. I cannot say that he gave any direct reason for that statement.

Q. What did you understand by it?—A. Everybody in the Department understood why it was.

Q. What was the general understanding in the Department?—A. That this man, Peterson, had been the intimate friend and surgeon of General Giles A. Smith all through the war; he was his regimental surgeon, his brigade surgeon, and his corps surgeon.

Q. Do I understand you to mean that Peterson being an intimate friend of Gen. Giles A. Smith, and General Smith occupying the position of Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he was acting as a middleman between the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and these contractors?—A. I do not know that, sir. I know that he received favors that very few others received in the Department, and was recognized in a way in which very few men were recognized.

Q. Please state how he was recognized.—A. He was constantly in the office of the chief clerk, J. L. French, and in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Giles A. Smith. His accounts were irregularly settled in every quarter, without the proper certificates required from most other contractors that the service was properly performed, and without deduction of the amounts which had been collected on account of his contract-pay. The committee may not understand that the contractor is made the collector for the Government of balances due from postmasters on the line of his routes. To enable him to perform this duty prior to the close of each quarter, blank orders are furnished him for each office that is known as a collection-office on his route. Those orders are furnished him in duplicate; they are furnished him about a month before the close of the quarter, so that he may make his collections without delay and get the balance of his pay. He calls upon a postmaster, and fills out an order with the amount of the balance which the postmaster reports in his hands due the Government. The postmaster retains one of those orders, and the contractor forwards the other to the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury. The amount collected by him on those orders, all of which must be accounted for—either returned as “no collection made” or the amount collected reported—is charged up to his route, and the balance between the amount which he himself has collected and the amount of his contract-pay for the quarter is paid to him by draft or warrant upon the certificate that he has done the service—a certificate issued by the postmaster at both ends of the route and certified to by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. The formality of requiring this certificate and waiting for Mr. Peterson and some other contractors to account for the moneys that they had collected was entirely ignored. He was paid his full quarterly pay, and the collections made by him deducted from the next quarter's pay; virtually loaning to him in addition to his contract-pay whatever the collections he had made amounted to.

Q. Was there any irregularity in connection with those Peterson settlements except the one that you have alluded to—any other irregularities or favors shown him?—A. When I called the attention of Mr. Sickles, the inspection-clerk for that section, to the irregularities of that service, he told me that it was no use to impose any fines on Dr. Peterson; that they were all remitted. He told me that he endeavored to get the fines as nearly just as he could, and that if they were small they were sometimes allowed to remain, but if they were large they were always remitted.

Q. Who remitted them?—A. They could only be remitted by the chief clerk or the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, or by their order.

Q. How long was Giles A. Smith Second Assistant Postmaster-General?—A. He was appointed in March or April, 1869, and resigned on the 16th of October, 1871. Mr. Creswell was Postmaster-General during all the time that General Smith was in office.

Q. Did you ever have any other conversation besides the one you alluded to with General Smith, when you told him that Peterson was treading on his name?—A. I think not, sir, from the fact that in July, 1871, contracts for all the steamboat service on the Lower Mississippi and its tributaries were given to Dr. Peterson. It was in May or June, 1871, that I made the statement to you. I do not mean to say that all the contracts, but nearly all the contracts on the Lower Mississippi and its tributaries, were made with Dr. Peterson after the Department had awarded the contracts to straw-bidders, and those bidders had failed. I was in Washington very little from the time I made the report until July. I was sent to Florida to work up a defalcation at Jacksonville, and, acting under the instructions of the chief of my bureau, I took the place of chief clerk while he was in Europe.

Q. I will call your attention to the service on some of these routes. Here is one from Saint Louis to Memphis, one from Memphis to White River, one from White River to Vicksburgh, one from New Orleans to Vicksburgh, one from New Orleans to Shreveport on the Red River, one from New Orleans to Saint Francisville—are these the contracts that you allude to, which you say were let to Dr. Peterson in 1871?—A. Not all; I think those are part of them.

Q. Were there others?—A. I believe there were; I think the record will show it.

Q. After you had given this information to General Giles A. Smith, and after you had the conversations that you speak of with the different Department clerks in the Office in regard to Dr. Peterson, the contracts on those different routes on the Mississippi services were given, you say, to Dr. Peterson?—A. Not exactly that, sir. The conversations which I refer to cover a period from 1871 up to 1875.

Q. Did you understand, then, from the conversations which you had with the Post-Office Department officials, that they had knowledge of Dr. Peterson's character as a mail-contractor; of his non-ownership of property, steamboats or other property; did you understand that those officials, beginning with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and running down through the others that you have alluded to, had information of these facts before these contracts were let on the 1st of July, 1871?—A. I cannot say that. The conversations that I refer to as taking place with Mr. Sickles, took place after July 1, 1871, while I was corresponding clerk of the Money-Order Bureau.

Q. Then you are only certain that those conversations took place between you and General Smith at that time?—A. With General Smith, and with Mr. Floyd, the contract-clerk of the Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas section at that time.

Q. Was it the duty of Mr. Floyd, as clerk of that section, to have a knowledge of how these contracts were executed, and to communicate it to his superior officer in the Department?—A. His duty was to communicate all facts in connection with the service of his section, either to the chief clerk of his bureau, or to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. The conversation that you had with Mr. Floyd, then, occurred before the letting of July 1, 1871?—A. Prior to July 1, 1871. I had conversations with Mr. Floyd afterward—part of the conversations.

Q. I understand you also to state that the conversation with Dr. McDonald occurred prior to that time?—A. No, sir; Dr. McDonald was about to go to Europe to negotiate a treaty with Germany for money-orders, when I was detailed to the bureau.

Q. When you came back from that inspection-tour, you placed the facts in regard to the irregularities of the mail-service there—all the facts you have stated to the committee—before the Department in the form of a report?—A. The only written report that I made to the Department was that in relation to the mail-service on Davis's Bend. As I have stated, I had conversations prior to July 1, 1871, with General Smith and A. H. Brown, contract-clerk for the Territories and the Pacific coast, and D. O. Floyd, in relation to this service.

Q. The report in which you recited these facts is on file in the Department, I suppose?—A. It was filed. Mr. Sickles tells me it has disappeared; that it never came to him, and that he was the proper officer to whom Floyd should have sent it. I filed it with Floyd, and saw it in his desk months afterward.

Q. When did Sickles inform you that it was not in the office?—A. I think it was last winter, when Mr. Sickles and myself were working with Mr. Woodward, developing these frauds.

Q. Did he state that fact in the presence of Woodward?—A. No, sir. I was not present at any conversation between Mr. Sickles and Mr. Woodward.

Q. You spoke of a conversation you had with a route-agent on the Natchez; who was the route-agent?—A. I do not remember.

Q. What was the statement he made to you in regard to irregularities; did he make any general statement about the irregularities?—A. Nothing at all, sir, except about the supply of Davis's Bend.

Q. Did he or any one else connected with those boats give you any information or tell you anything about how the mail from New Orleans for Shreveport was carried?—A. I know that from my own observation it was carried on the Red River packet-boats from New Orleans to Shreveport.

Q. There was a horse-mail established from the mouth of Red River to Shreveport?—A. That was not established at the time I was there. It was prior to the letting of 1871 that I was there. There was no horse-mail that I know of at that time.

Q. Do you know of a horse-mail being established, running to the mouth of Red River, for the purpose of carrying that mail?—A. Yes, sir; from the printed records of the Department.

Q. Tell why that horse-mail was established, if you know.—A. My understanding is that the exposures made in the McKibben investigation in the winter of 1871-'72, and the fact that the packet company received only $7,800 a year for carrying that mail, while the Government paid $30,000, was the occasion for its being discontinued.

Q. The mail by the packets was discontinued?—A. The contract was annulled, as I understand it.

Q. And then a horse mail or stage-coach mail was established to run to Shreveport by land?—A. The record so shows.

Q. You have no information, I suppose, as to how the mail was carried from New Orleans to Red River Landing?—A. From the Postmaster-General's report I have. On page 80 of the Postmaster-General's Report for 1875, I find two statements as to how the mail is carried to Red River Landing from New Orleans. Route 8006 from Vicksburgh, Miss., to New Orleans, La., the amount stated to be paid per annum is $29,980. That Red River Landing is supplied by this route 8006, the Leathers-Cannon contract, it being a wharf-boat landing, about midway between New Orleans and Vicksburgh, which the Vicksburgh packets are obliged to supply. On the same page I find also route 8117, from New Orleans to Red River Landing, contract pay $5,775.

Q. That was a service for how many times a week?—A. They are each three times a week, according to this report.

Q. You have no knowledge as to whether that mail was carried on different boats or by different companies or by the same boats?—A. I have no personal knowledge; I mean that I have never seen the mail carried on other boats. I have heard that it was carried by the Vicksburgh packet-boats which were already paid for carrying the mail on route 8006. Captain Leathers told me yesterday that he carried the Red River mail on his boat three times a week.

Q. You stated a while ago that you, in connection with Woodward and somebody else, were investigating the Peterson frauds?—A. If I remember my statement correctly, I was referring to Mr. Sickles, and said it was while Mr. Sickles and myself were assisting Mr. Woodward in developing those frauds.

Q. State how it happened that you and Mr. Woodward and Mr. Sickles were making investigations into that subject; for what purpose; who ordered you to make the investigation, and when was it?—A. Mr. Woodward and myself have been friends since we have known each other, dating from 1869. I had met him before that, but I never knew him specially. When Governor Jewell was appointed Postmaster-General, in September, 1874, or soon after his appointment, Mr. Woodward was promoted to the position of chief special agent, and brought to Washington as his headquarters. Mr. Woodward and myself talked in relation to frauds in other branches of the service, and either during the last of October or the first of November he came one evening to my brother-in-law's house, in Georgetown, where I live, and stated to me that, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, he was investigating frauds in the Post-Office Department, and he wanted my assistance. I told Mr. Woodward that before I gave him any assistance I wanted to place myself clearly upon the record; that I had given to Mr. Luttrell, a member of Congress, and to Mr. Stone, of Missouri, and Mr. Holman, of Indiana, facts in relation to frauds perpetrated in the Department, a few months before, in the spring of 1874; that I had given them those facts with the expectation that the act would cost me my position; that if that fact was still to cost me my place, I would seek to expose those frauds during the next Congress, but that if Governor Jewell proposed to expose them himself, and I was not to be held accountable for information to Democratic members of this House, both he and Mr. Woodward should have my assistance and the use of all the information that I had. Mr. Woodward replied that the Postmaster-General intended to break up all frauds in connection with his Department, and give the facts to the public; that he did not propose to go back into Mr. Creswell's administration of the Department to develop fraud, or hold any clerk responsible for acts done under Mr. Creswell. With that understanding, I rendered Mr. Woodward assistance in developing frauds in the Department.

Q. What did Mr. Woodward say in that connection, in regard to the frauds?—A. What I have stated to the committee.

Q. Did he say anything else in regard to frauds connected with Mr. Creswell's administration? Did he allude to it except in a general way?—A. I do not know that he did, sir; I think not.

Q. You notified him, then, under that statement, that you would assist him in working up the frauds in the Post-Office Department?—A. I did.

Q. In pursuance of that agreement, what did you do?—A. I told Mr. Woodward that if he would take the copy of the New York Sun containing a statement of the fraudulent contracts between Memphis and Vicksburgh, the data for which had been furnished by Mr. Stone, a member of Congress, to the correspondent, and additional facts obtained from the records of the Department by that correspondent, he would find what one of the fraudulent contractors had done; that by taking that statement and referring to the records and studying up those routes, he would find out a portion of what one of the ring contractors had done. Mr. Woodward took the paper and examined the records, and came to my room in the Department, and said that the correspondent had got it straight, but he had not got half of it. I say he examined the records. He told me he had examined them, and he made that statement in relation to them.

Q. Who was that contractor that you were alluding to?—A. B. H. Peterson. I was introduced to John E. Reeside, an old mail-contractor, as a person who was working with Mr. Woodward in working up these frauds, and saw him continually with Mr. Woodward. He is an old contractor and knew more about the frauds than I did, and I had been working up the railroad business for two years previous, a portion of which I furnished to Mr. Holman. I drew up a good many statements in relation to that service, which I gave to Mr. Woodward, and left the other matter to Mr. Reeside and himself to a great extent. Mr. Woodward, with his other duties, had not time to look into the railroad business, and it ran along until January, 1875, when I went to the chief clerk of the Department, J. W. Knowlton, and asked him if the Postmaster-General wanted to understand the subject. He told me that he did, and that he would see me further in relation to it. He came to my room the next day, and told me that the Postmaster-General wanted to see me. I had prepared a statement in writing in relation to the railway mail-service, and that afternoon I called upon the Postmaster-General. Governor Jewell stated that he was glad to see me; that a gentleman had called upon him in relation to me a few days before, and stated to him that he had a bad man in his Department who had been giving information to members of Congress and the papers; and he said that man who told him that was B. H. Peterson. He asked Peterson who this man was, and Peterson mentioned me as the man. The governor handed me a piece of blotting paper with my name written on it. He said he supposed I had heard from my friends, what Peterson had said. I told him that I had no explanation to make as to any charges or statements that Dr. Peterson might make; that I was prepared to stand upon my record in the Department. He said he had made inquiry and was satisfied, and did not want to hear anything more about it; that Mr. Woodward had been, under his directions, for some time investigating frauds in connection with this man's contracts, and he asked me to assist him.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. When the Postmaster-General stated he did not want to hear anything more about it, he referred to Peterson's charges against you?—A. Yes, sir; he had had the superintendence of my bureau, and Mr. Woodward before him, in relation to these charges of Peterson. I told Governor Jewell that I had already given Mr. Woodward assistance, at his request, in working up these alleged frauds, and that Reeside was working with him. The Postmaster-General said that he knew he was, but wished I would give him any further assistance I could. I then went and got the inspection-clerk of the contract-office, Mr. Sickles, to whom I have referred, to go to Mr. Woodward and tell him what he knew about Peterson's contracts. Either the next day or the second day after, I asked Mr. Woodward if he had had a satisfactory interview, and he said that he had enough to sink Mr. Peterson and his contracts to perdition—more than I had ever dreamed of; that within twenty-four hours those contracts would be annulled. Within twenty-four hours, on the evening of the 4th of February, 1875, I was sent for by the Postmaster-General and asked for my resignation, and given leave of absence, with pay, until the 28th day of February. No reason was assigned and none asked for. Mr. Peterson's contracts were not annulled, but were allowed to expire on the 30th day of June, 1875.

Q. Please give the language of the Postmaster-General at the time he asked for your resignation.—A. I think I can repeat his words. There were two gentlemen in his room, strangers to me. Governor Jewell said, "Come in the next room, Holbrook." He stepped into the First Assistant's room. There were two gentlemen there. He says, "The room is occupied; come over by the window." We stepped to the window, and he said, "Mr. Holbrook, I want your resignation." I said to him, "Do you wish an immediate resignation?" His reply was, "I do." I said to him, "Governor, it will make some difference to me whether I resign to take effect at once or on the 1st of March." He replied, "Very well, make it the 1st of March, and take a leave of absence until that date." I bade him "Good day, sir," and left him, and went to the chief clerk, Colonel Knowlton. I asked him if I had substantiated all statements which I had made to him or the Postmaster-General.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. About the Peterson contracts?—A. No, sir; about the railroad matters, to him. He said, to his satisfaction and that of the Postmaster-General. I then said to him, "I have just been asked to resign, Colonel Knowlton, and I think you owe it to me to ask of the Postmaster-General, what I shall never ask him, the reason for his action." We had some further conversation, and he told me that he not only owed it to me, but to himself, and if I would come to the office that evening he would let me know what it was. I met him about half past seven near the door of his room that evening, and he said to me that he was more embarrassed than he ever was in his life; that he knew the reason why I had been asked to resign and could not tell me; that the Postmaster-General had gone home feeling very badly about it. That is about all that I have to state in connection with that.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. Did you ever find out the reason?—A. I never did, sir; I heard what I supposed to be the reason in two days. Mr. Peterson boasted that he had to do it for his own salvation.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. That he, Peterson, had to do it?—A. Yes, sir. It came up in this way: Mr. Kittle told me that he was present in the room of A. L. Boone, the chief of the pay division of the Sixth Auditor's office—that was some time afterwards; I did not know Mr. Kittle at that time—when Boone spoke of my leaving the Department, being asked to resign. Peterson was present and remarked that he had to do it for his own salvation.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. This conversation occurred in the presence of A. L. Boone?—A. So Mr. Kittle says. I do not answer for it. I heard it from other sources, enough to satisfy me where it came from. I cannot give you all the reasons which caused me to be fully satisfied of the fact that Peterson had, through higher influence that he possessed, caused my resignation to be asked for or my removal ordered.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Repeat that.—A. I cannot give you all the reasons upon which I base my opinion, that indirectly Mr. Peterson was the instrument of my removal. My pleasant relations with the Postmaster-General and his officials continued until after the Hines-Kittle exposé. I furnished Colonel Knowlton considerable information after I resigned, which he used in developing those frauds—information of the routine work of the contract-office which enabled him to develop them. I do not know that I have anything further to state.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. When Mr. Woodward came to your room and asked you to help him investigate the frauds that you have mentioned, what else did he say when he made the statement that he did not intend to go back into Mr. Creswell's administration?—A. I cannot give you any further light upon the subject.

Q. Did he give you any reason why he did not want an investigation to go back into Mr. Creswell's administration?—A. None other than that the Postmaster-General had all he could do to correct the evils then existing; something to that effect, I think he said.

Q. Then do I understand that the investigation which you made at the time for the benefit of the Department, only extended back to the 1st of July, 1875, the time of Mr. Creswell's resignation?—A. Do not misunderstand me. The assistance which I gave to Mr. Woodward was of a general character; information as to names of persons from whom he could obtain information; what records contained that information; and I did not go into any examination of the records of the Department, not being connected with that branch of the service at all, in connection with Mr. Woodward. Every investigation he made, he made directly and through other parties, not through me, except in so far as I directed the course of his inquiry, to a certain extent.

Q. Did Mr. Woodward state to you that the Postmaster-General had ordered him to investigate these frauds for the purpose of correcting them in his administration?—A. No, sir; he did not. No one doubted that Governor Jewell wanted to correct them in the interest of the Government; at least, I did not.

Q. Well, Governor Jewell said, if I understood you, that he had ordered Mr. Woodward to work up these frauds?—A. He did.

Q. Did he tell you that he had any information himself, at the time, with regard to these frauds? Did he allude to the Peterson contracts as fraudulent contracts?—A. I cannot say that he did. I stated, I think, before, that Governor Jewell told me that Mr. Woodward was, under his instructions, investigating the Peterson contracts. He did not say anything about their being fraudulent contracts.

Q. After that you went to Sickles and told him to go to Mr. Woodward and tell him what he knew about Peterson. Then Mr. Woodward told you, after having seen Mr. Sickles, that he knew enough more than you knew to sink Peterson and his contracts to perdition.—A. I think I have stated that. That I went to Mr. Sickles, who is a friend of mine, who is a man of integrity and uprightness, I believe, if there is one in the Department, and told him that it would be all right, to give all that he had to Mr. Woodward.

Q. Was it within twenty-four hours of this time that you were invited to resign?—A. To the best of my remembrance, within twenty-four hours of the time when Mr. Woodward said to me that he had more information than I ever dreamed of, enough to sink Peterson and his contracts to perdition, and that within twenty-four hours they would be annulled, I was asked to resign.

Q. Do you know anything about Mr. Woodward and the Postmaster-General going off to see any one within that twenty-four hours?—A. I heard it in the Department—I cannot give my source of information—that Mr. Woodward had been away with the Postmaster-General with his papers in his carriage within that time. I think I heard it from Mr. Reeside.

Q. How long was Mr. Reeside continued in the Department?—A. He was not connected with it at all.

Q. I understood you that he was associated with Mr. Woodward in this investigation.—A. Mr. Reeside was an old mail-contractor. He, perhaps, can tell the committee much better than I can what his connection with this matter was. He was not an officer of the Department in any capacity, to my knowledge. He was working with Mr. Woodward in developing these frauds of Peterson's, and other frauds.

Q. Do you know when his connection with Mr. Woodward was severed?—A. I do not know that he had any official connection with him.

Q. Well, his connection other than official?—A. It may be existing to-day. I do not know.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 9, 1876.

T. L. HOLBROOK recalled and further examined.

The WITNESS. A question was asked me Saturday in relation to the service substituted for the discontinued steamboat route on the Red River. My knowledge of the action taken in the Department is only from the records of the Department. I can, with the permission of the committee, refresh my memory as to that action, from these books.

Q. Please do so.—A. [Referring to route register, Louisiana, 1871-'75.] There are so many changes in this book, so many orders modified and changed, that it would be necessary for the man who has charge of it to explain them. I can only state that there was a route established from Red River Landing to Shreveport; I cannot give you the number of it. It comprises two lines. The aggregate pay on the lines is $41,200, I understand.

Q. Explain what those two lines are.—A. Two stage-lines, as I understand it; one ends at Alexandria, and the other runs from Alexandria to Shreveport. Possibly there may be three subdivisions of the line. The gross pay, however, of the whole line is stated in the advertisement of October 1, 1874, to be $41,200, as I remember it. I suppose from your question that you understand that that service expired June 30, 1875.

Q. State to the committee what was the general understanding among the clerks and employés in the Department, as to the power and influence of B. H. Peterson in regard to mail-contracts in the southern part of the country?—A. It was generally understood, sir, that his influence was such that it was unsafe for any clerk in the Department to interfere with any of his operations or transactions.

Q. State further, whether it was possible for the irregularities, such as you have been describing, in the mail-lettings, to exist without the knowledge, and, I may say, the co-operation or connivance, of the clerks in the Department and some higher officials?—A. Whether those who were holding positions higher than clerks knew anything of such transactions would depend upon whether or not their attention was called to the condition of things by the clerks who had the direct control of the advertising of the service, preparing contracts and receiving complaints from postmasters and others as to the manner in which the service was performed. That is true as to those higher than clerks; though the remission of fines and deductions for failure to perform service could not be made without the action of either the chief clerk or the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Q. Do you know from conversation with the clerks that these matters on which you have testified were communicated to the higher officials by those clerks?—A. So far as I testified yesterday, I know as to what action Mr. Sickles took. The action of the clerks, or any clerk, as to reporting irregularities or details, I am not familiar enough with to state to this committee. They are the proper persons to state that.

Q. What information have you in regard to the Kittle frauds in Texas, and what personal knowledge?—A. I never knew Mr. Kittle or Mr. Hinds either, who was alleged to have been connected with him in these transactions, until some time after I resigned. I had been having almost daily interviews with the chief clerk of the Department, Colonel Knowlton, posting him as to the manner in which the contractors, known as ring-contractors, manipulated things in their own interest; and either the day before I resigned, or two days before, I told Colonel Knowlton that if any arrangements had been entered into, any plans made by the contractors to evade the laws and to substitute fraudulent bids, that those arrangements must have been made with the clerks in charge of those contract-sections where they operated, without whose co-operation they could not operate successfully, and that I thought he could break up any combinations, if any had been formed, by getting the Postmaster-General to issue an order transferring the duty of examining and recording the bids for that section to some other section, so that any arrangements that had been made would go for nothing. Such an order was made by the Postmaster-General, transferring, for example, the duty of examining and recording the bids of the Texas and Louisiana section from D. O. Floyd, who had had charge of that section for five or six years, to another clerk. My impression is that the order was made and issued to the chief clerk of the contract-office. At any rate, the duty of recording the Texas and Louisiana bids was changed from Mr. Floyd to the room of Chester Colt, who had charge of the contract-section for New England. The day after I had called Colonel Knowlton's attention to this manner of defeating any plans that had been made, Mr. Floyd went to the Postmaster-General, I am informed, and stated to him that there had been so much talk in relation to frauds in his section that he would be pleased if he would transfer the duty of recording those bids to some clerk in whom he had confidence, whom he knew personally; that he felt it his duty to say to him that he had himself been tempted to do wrong, and would like to be relieved from recording those bids. The developments made afterward in court before the Postmaster-General, in the criminal trial, showed that Mr. Floyd had, at the time he went to the Postmaster-General, $1,500 of Mr. Kittle's money paid to him for his services; that he had originally received $2,500, but, upon the transfer of his duties to Mr. Colt, had refunded to Mr. Kittle $1,000 to purchase Mr. Colt with, between six and seven hundred of which, the evidence showed, was paid to Mr. Colt, and other sums to Frank L. Channell, brother-in-law of Mr. French, the chief clerk of the contract-office, who operated with Floyd, and afterward with Colt. Acting upon the information obtained, E. R. Petherbridge, of Baltimore, a special agent of the Post-Office Department, was detailed to investigate anything that might be wrong in connection with the letting of February 18, 1875. I will state to the committee that much of what I am saying is in evidence before the criminal court here, and that my information arises from the facts developed in that trial, as well as from information obtained from clerks in the Department, and officers of the Department. Mr. Petherbridge worked up the case. Other agents were also at work upon it for a time. Mr. Henderson, a special agent from Baltimore, with headquarters in Washington, was one. How they arrived at all their facts, I, of course, did not know; but the evidence was developed about the 1st of April, I think, or during the month of March, (it was a few days before the Connecticut election; I am not certain of the date,) as to the moneys received by Mr. Floyd, by Frank L. Channell, by Mr. Rothrock, a messenger of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and by Chester Colt, from Mr. Kittle, to work in his interest in this mail-letting. Floyd secured the transfer of Channell from the chief clerk's room to his room, he being willing to steal bids, having stolen bids and carried them to the contractor's room before the bids were opened, while they should have been locked up.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. I would like to know whether the witness is speaking of his own knowledge, or stating what the evidence was that was developed in this criminal trial.—A. I have stated to the committee that a portion of this information was nearly all of it in evidence as developed in this criminal trial; that what I am stating to the committee is gathered from information obtained in the Department and from this evidence.

Mr. CANNON suggests to Mr. McMahon that the witness separate what he knows himself from what he learned from the evidence on this trial.

The WITNESS. The developments of the Department being so closely allied to the criminal trial prosecuted by the officers of the Department, and Mr. Woodward, Judge Spence, attorney-general for the Department, and these clerks who had received the money being heard as witnesses in the trial, it would be difficult to say what portion of the information I obtained in the court-room, and what in the Department. Being called upon to make a statement of this kind, without being directed by the committee as to what I can properly state as a witness, I am placed in an embarrassing condition. For that reason I stated to the committee, before I commenced to make the statement in relation to these alleged frauds, how I obtained my information.

By Mr. MCMAHON:

Q. Who was the Second Assistant Postmaster-General at this time last spring, in February or March?—A. In February, 1875, John L. Routt.

Q. Do you remember the date of his appointment as governor of Colorado?—A. I do not, sir. Mr. Tyner was appointed before the adjournment of Congress, and took possession immediately upon the adjournment. All these matters, however, were under the control and direction of Mr. Woodward, at that time chief special agent.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You spoke of Channell as being a brother-in-law of Mr. French. In whose office was he clerk?—A. He was a temporary clerk in the bureau of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and was assigned to duty in different rooms. In January he was on duty in his brother-in-law's room, the chief clerk. He was afterward transferred to Mr. Floyd's room. From Floyd's room, after the bids were transferred to Colt's room, he was transferred to Colt's room.

By Mr. MCMAHON:

Q. By whose authority and direction are those transfers made from one room to another?—A. Either the chief clerk of the contract-office transfers or the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. The chief clerk usually makes the assignments. The chief clerk was A. L. French. From my own personal knowledge all the men connected with these transactions, all the men in the Department connected with these transactions, so far as was known—that is, those who were connected with the transactions so far as the Department knew—and Mr. Kittle, who had purchased Mr. Floyd's and Mr. Colt's and Mr. Channell's services, were accepted as witnesses by the Government in the prosecution of J. J. Hinds. They all testified, including Rothrock.

Q. State in that connection what routes Hinds had been connected with.—A. Mr. Hinds was from Alabama, and had no routes that I know of against which there were any allegations of fraud. The frauds perpetrated were in the attempt to obtain routes under the advertisement for mail-service in the Southwest, to commence July 1, 1875. Mr. Hinds had mail-routes, but I do not know what they were, and never knew that there were any charges of fraud in relation to those routes that he had. He was prosecuted for frauds alleged to have been committed in substituting after-time bids, and in corrupting the clerks and using counterfeit seals. It is only due to Hinds to say that he was acquitted. The jury were not out more than two minutes; no evidence having been produced that he was anything more than an accessory after the fact, an accessory to Kittle. Perhaps I can make that more clear to the committee by saying that the judge's charge, which I listened to, bore very strongly upon that point. I think his language was that it was the first time to his knowledge at the bar or on the bench when a man who was at most an accessory was attempted to be convicted upon the evidence of the admitted principals. I do not know what else I can state in that connection that will be of interest to the committee, excepting the fact that none of these men were dismissed for several days after the facts were developed in the presence of the Postmaster-General. They were dismissed, all except Rothrock, as soon as the Postmaster-General returned from the Connecticut election. It is only just to the Postmaster-General to state that these developments took place just about as he was leaving Washington, and, while the confessions were all made in his room, I do not think he had time to act upon the case until his return. I saw him in New York, on his way back, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and he then told me that the men would be sentenced as soon as he got back; that is, that they would be dealt with.

Q. You speak of their making confessions. They made these admissions to the Postmaster-General prior to the trial?—A. A gentleman, who took part in it, told me afterward that Mr. Kittle was confronted with the Postmaster-General; that Major Petherbridge was present, and he was asked as to his connection with these transactions, whether he had paid Mr. Floyd any money, and upon his denial he was confronted by Mr. Floyd, who admitted that he had received $2,500 from him, a thousand of which he had paid back. He was then questioned as to his transactions with Rothrock, all of which he denied until Rothrock was confronted with him; the same way with Channell.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What did Rothrock say when he was confronted with him?—A. I don't know sir.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Channell and Kittle denied until confronted with the others?—A. No, sir; Kittle denied everything until he was confronted with one after another of these men, whose confessions had been obtained by the agents. He then admitted that he thought that everything they had in the written papers that they had been questioning him from was probably true; that he had come to Washington to make money, being unable to make it as a contractor attending to his business in Texas—to make it honestly if he could—he would make it any way. He told Mr. Jewell that he had found the clerks in the Department for sale, and he had bought those that he wanted. It is only just to say, so far as Rothrock and the Postmaster-General are concerned, that in retaining Rothrock I think Governor Jewell was actuated by pity for the man. He is a wreck of a man; he is one of the Andersonville prisoners, and I don't think a bad man. He is a man who is very easily led.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. A half-witted man, is he not?—A. Well, he is so considered. He is hardly responsible for his acts, and I think Governor Jewell so treated him in retaining him, while dismissing the others.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is he still in the Department?—A. I understand he is there to-day, or has been until recently.

Q. Was Kittle ever prosecuted?—A. No, sir; he was recognized in every way by the Department.

By Mr. McMAHON:

Q. You can state further what fines had been assessed against Kittle, to your information, in the Department for the non-performance of his services in Texas?—A. The inspection-clerk for Texas and Louisiana, Col. E. F. O'Brien, was a friend of mine. I very naturally desired to keep posted as to the action of the Department in relation to Peterson's contracts, and I was with Mr. O'Brien almost every day in his room—I would drop in upon him. I found there one day, working with Mr. O'Brien, H. Clay Hopkins, a special agent of the Post-Office Department, with whom I had been intimate for a number of years. I asked him what he was doing, and he told me that he had been directed to work up the service, as shown by the records of the Department, performed by Mr. Peterson, and to go through the whole inspection division of the contract-office, working up frauds. Mr. O'Brien told me, that within a few days after that he had received an intimation that if he did not quit working with Hopkins on the Peterson matters he would be removed. A few days after I saw Hopkins working with him.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. From whom did he get his information?—A. I don't know, sir; he did not tell me. Mr. O'Brien stated to me that Mr. French, the chief clerk of the contract-office, and Mr. Lake, the chief of the inspection division, in which division he was, were ransacking all his transactions as inspection-clerk for another division that he had been on before he was transferred to Texas and Louisiana, to see if they could not find something against him. Mr. Hopkins told me that he had been instructed not to go back of the 1st July, 1874, when Mr. Creswell resigned, in making his investigations. He did not state who he was instructed by; he was working under the direction of Mr. Woodward; he told me that; he did not tell me that he received those instructions from him, however. I saw the list of fines and deductions prepared by Mr. Hopkins and Mr. O'Brien on Peterson's route, amounting to over $12,000. Mr. O'Brien told me that some of these had been set aside, and, in the settlement of Peterson's accounts, between $8,000 and $9,000 was deducted from Peterson's pay. This was while O'Brien was still in the office working as inspection-clerk for Louisiana and Texas. The frauds perpetrated by Kittle were also worked up by Hopkins, and the deductions for improper performance of service, failure to do service, fines, &c., to the amount of $26,000 imposed upon him. Mr. Kittle told me that after the Hinds trial was over that all except $1,900 had been remitted, and he had been paid. I called Hopkins's attention at the time he was working up these routes to the fact that, if he did not go back of the 1st July, there was no redress for the Government for moneys that had been wrongfully paid for the previous three years on the contracts, the contracts being still alive, and to expire on the 30th June, 1875; that the moneys due the Government for failures to perform service from the commencement of the contract to that time would be lost. He told me that he was acting under instructions.

Q. State again who has power to remit these fines and deductions; who was the particular officer?—A. No one has the power, but the Postmaster-General, the Second Assistant, or the chief clerk; who did it, I don't know.

Q. Who were those officers?—A. Mr. James M. Tyner was Second Assistant Postmaster-General; John L. French was chief clerk. They might be governed in their action by Mr. Lake, the chief clerk of the inspection division, who would have to examine into any reports of that character. There is nothing else that I want to state, except that Mr. O'Brien was removed. Mr. Hopkins told me that he saved him twice by going personally to the Postmaster-General and stating that he believed him to be as honest a man as there was in the Department, that he had been of great assistance to him, but that after he had been sent away on other duty, Mr. O'Brien was requested to resign, and did resign.

Q. Were any charges specified?—A. None, sir; he refused to tender his resignation, in the first instance; said he would appeal to the President, and demand an investigation. The request for his resignation was then withdrawn, and he resigned and received thirty days' leave of absence, with pay. Mr. Hopkins told me if he had been here he would not have permitted it.

Q. You were personally acquainted with Mr. O'Brien?—A. I have known him for years.

Q. What was his character for integrity and capacity?—A. Well, sir, I can only say that O'Brien had been an officer in the Regular Army, and so far as I know was a man of integrity and ability. I knew him as I knew nearly every other man in the Department. If there were any charges against him I do not know it. Mr. Hopkins ought to know; he worked with him.

Q. Did Mr. Hopkins give any ground that was assigned for his removal, the two times that he had saved him, or who was trying to remove him?—A. He did not. He told me that he expected he would be removed himself for the action he was taking in working up the Peterson contracts.

Q. You have already stated the connection that Peterson had with Gen. Giles A. Smith. State whether a controversy arose between Mr. Woodward and some parties in the Department, as to the remission of these Peterson fines, and what influences Peterson brought to bear to have those fines remitted; whether the influence of any Senators, Representatives, or other outside parties. I want not only your actual knowledge upon that; but any side information you have.

Mr. CANNON. Do these matters appear of record?

Mr. MCMAHON. This does not appear of record.

A. The accounts of Mr. Peterson were understood in the Department to be suspended. I think Mr. Hopkins was working up the Peterson frauds in April or May last with Colonel O'Brien. The developments in relation to those frauds in Mr. Woodward's possession had caused the suspension of his pay-accounts for the March quarter. I was made aware of the fact from H. E. Offley, a banker on the corner of F street and Fifteenth, calling upon me to know what the trouble was with Peterson's accounts. He said that he understood that the warrants which had been issued in settlement of those accounts were held up by the Postmaster-General on his desk. He told me that he had been discounting orders against Peterson's mail-pay; that Peterson had been introduced to him by General Morgan L. Smith, and that he had heretofore had no trouble in collecting his money; that J. J. Martin, Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, had told him that those orders would be all right, that is, previous accounts, when he had been introduced by General Morgan L. Smith.

By Mr. STOWELL:

Q. These suspended orders?—A. O, no, sir; prior orders. He was explaining to me how he happened to be dealing in orders for Peterson's mail-pay. He stated that he held an order for $1,900 or thereabouts; that he had taken the order under peculiar circumstances; that Morgan L. Smith, at the time of his death, owed him $800, (if I remember the amount correctly;) that Peterson agreed, if he would discount this $1,900 order, to settle Mr. Morgan L. Smith's account with the bank. Morgan L. Smith was a brother of the former Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Giles A. Smith. Mr. Kittle came to me and told me that a telegram had been received by Mr. Tyner, from Senator West, of Louisiana; that he had seen the telegram and that it had been referred to Mr. Woodward. The telegram was asking what the trouble was with Dr. Peterson's mail-accounts. Senator West, within a few days, appeared in the Department, and was in and out for a number of days. That I state of my own personal knowledge. He was there and had frequent interviews with the Postmaster-General. Offley told me that he, Offley, got his money; that his warrant was paid; that he knew enough of the situation to know that other interested people would make the fight, and that he would get his money; that he would come in with the rest; but that he should not touch any more of that kind of paper.

Q. Who was Dr. Peterson? Give us a little history of him; who he was and what his connections and associations were.—A. I think I did tell all I know about Dr. Peterson in my previous examination yesterday. If you desire, I can give you the numbers of these routes that these fines were worked up on. Perhaps, as I have made a statement in relation to them, it would be better that the committee should have them, so that they may verify that statement. These are Peterson's routes: Route 8031, Louisiana; 8063, 8066, 8067, 8881, 8117, and route 7505, Arkansas. I would state to the committee that new contracts were entered into with Dr. Peterson from the 1st of July, 1875. One was on the route from Red River Landing to Shreveport; I haven't the number of it. I think it is 4127, but I am not certain; and on three or four other routes, all land-routes, however. This Red River and Shreveport route is a land-route, along the south bank of the Red River, the same route on which he received $41,200 under the letting which you have been examining into. I don't know the number of those other routes. Colonel O'Brien can tell you. I haven't got the termini of them. I think three of them are in Southern Arkansas.

Here the committee took a recess.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 9, 1875.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

T. M. HOLBROOK: examination continued.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. In the letting of the mail-contracts, in regard to which you have been testifying, was there any violation of law to which you can turn in the records before you; if so, what are they?—Answer. I was asked this morning to turn to a record which I was unable to turn to at the time. This book is the route-register for Louisiana, 1871-'75. On page 418 I find mail-route 8117, from New Orleans to Red River Landing, steamboat-route, 210 miles and back, three times a week. This record shows that, on the 17th day of May, 1873, a contract was ordered with B. H. Peterson, of New Orleans, for carrying the mails on this route three times a week, from the 17th of May, 1873, to the 30th of June, 1875, at $5,775 per annum. This record shows that no bids were received on this route, and that this contract was made with Peterson with the knowledge which I possessed and had furnished the Department, and which was known to every man in the Department, that Peterson was not a steamboat-owner.

Q. If that action of the Department was in violation of any law, please read the law.—A. It is a direct violation of the statutes of the United States, (Revised Statutes, section 3943, which will be found in the Appendix.)

The Attorney-General of the United States, in the document now before me, (Mis. Doc. 53, 42d Congress, 2d session,) in a letter addressed to Postmaster-General Creswell, which is embraced in the same document, (and which will be found in Appendix,) in reference to the letting of land-contracts, quotes the law that I have read here, with this comment: "This section gives to the Postmaster-General exceptional authority to contract for steamboat-service in certain cases, and under which you have the power of contracting at once for that sort of service, without the re-advertisement and formalities prescribed in the case of the general service." Of course I am not capable of giving a legal opinion on the subject. I don't suppose the committee want my opinion.

Q. If B. H. Peterson conspired with other persons, steamboat-men or others, to defraud the Government in carrying the mails, can you refer to the law by which they can be punished?—A. There is such a law on the statute-book; section 5440 of the Revised Statutes. (It will be found in the Appendix.)

Q. You stated this morning that the Peterson contracts were not annulled; how do you know that fact?—A. From Col. E. F. O'Brien, the inspection-clerk for the States of Louisiana and Texas. He was the clerk in the inspection-office of the contract-office, having charge of the examination of the registers of the performance of service, and by whom the certificates upon which the contractor received his pay were made out for the signature of his superior officer.

Q. I understood you also to say that the steamboat-contract for carrying the mail on the Red River was annulled, and that there was a contract given to Peterson to carry the mail by land from the mouth of Red River to Shreveport.—A. The records so show.

Q. Did those two things occur simultaneously, or one immediately after the other?—A. I cannot answer that question; I don't know.

Q. Do you know why the Red River contract by steamboat from Red River Landing to Shreveport was annulled?—A. I suppose because of the development of the fact that he was paying $7,800 for service for which the United States Government paid him $30,000 a year—the development of that fact by the McKibben investigation by the Post-Office Committee of this House, in the winter of 1871-'72.

Q. Do you know what was the difference between the price paid for carrying the mail by land, and the price paid for carrying it by steamboat on the river?—A. There may have been some land-service upon the south bank of the Red River during the time that the steamboat-contract existed. I know from the records of the Department that Peterson received $41,200 for the land-service, after the abolition of his steamboat-contract.

Q. Has Peterson any contracts now?—A. I understand he has five, made with him since the 1st of July, 1875, one of which is this land-route on the Red River.

Q. Do you know of any payments made to Peterson, or on his account, after Mr. Woodward told you that he was satisfied of Peterson's frauds?—A. I testified to that this morning. I have no further information than I then gave.

Q. What was the statement you then made?—A. A statement of evidence obtained from H. G. Offley, the banker, as to his receiving his pay; and from Mr. O'Brien as to the settlement of Peterson's account.

Q. Did you tell Mr. Woodward of any other frauds in mail-contracts by steamboat?—A. I did, sir; and he informed me that he was already aware of them and was working them up. One of those was a route upon which a fraudulent sum was alleged to be paid, route No. 6462, between Baltimore and New Orleans, semi-monthly service. The Postmaster-General's report for 1871, page 43 of the appendix, shows that that service cost $31,000 per annum. That is not the exact amount that the service cost when Mr. Woodward and myself talked about it; the report for 1874 will show that.

Q. And Mr. Woodward told you that he was aware of the fraud in that contract?—A. No, sir; he told me that he was then working on that route and others.

Q. What conclusion did he arrive at in reference to them?—A. The contract was annulled. Another one of those routes was No. 6478, from New York to Key West. The pay at the time I refer to was the same as the pay on the route from Baltimore to New Orleans, $31,200 per annum, and I think the service was twice a week from New York, and only twice a month from Baltimore. The third route was No. 4736, from Washington to Norfolk, Va., by steamer. That contract was also annulled upon Mr. Woodward's investigation; and I was informed that the service was restored last August.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. To the same contractor and at the same amount?—A. No, sir; the pay on the Washington and Norfolk route is $9,000 a year for three times a week service. The fourth of those routes is No. 6500, from New Orleans to Key West, at $76,000 a year. That route was discontinued, and a new service established from Cedar Keys, Fla., to Key West. In relation to those contracts Mr. Reeside can give you all the facts. He worked with Mr. Woodward on them.

Q. Who were the parties that were sent to work up these contracts that you have mentioned?—A. I think the frauds were so evident that they were worked up in Washington here, by Mr. Woodward and Mr. Reeside, without sending out any special detectives. That is not true, however, of the route from New Orleans to Key West. A special agent of the Department was detailed for some weeks or months, I think, working upon that route. That agent was B. H. Camp, a special agent from Connecticut.

Q. How long had those mail-contracts, which you speak of as fraudulent, and as having been annulled, been in existence?—A. If I stated that the contracts were fraudulent, I desire to correct that statement. I do not know that they were fraudulent. They were unnecessary and exorbitant contracts. I have no knowledge of any fraud in connection with any one of those routes.

Q. Was the conclusion arrived at, in the investigation of those routes, that they were and had been unnecessary, and that the prices were exorbitant?—A. I think that there is no doubt of that. Mr. Woodward told me that every post-office on the route from Norfolk to Washington had a supply aside from the river-supply. I think there is a gentleman there on the sofa who can tell you something about that route.

Q. You mean to say, then, that all the points that were supplied by steamer by this ocean-route had other mail-facilities?—A. Not the ocean-route; the route on the Potomac. Mr. Woodward told me that every office on the line had their supply.

Q. How long had those different routes, for which exorbitant prices were charged, and which were considered unnecessary, been in existence?—A. I don't know, sir. The route from New Orleans to Key West, the $76,000 route, must have been established after Mr. McLellan's time, (the former Second Assistant Postmaster-General,) for he told me that the route was a fraud, and that all the mail on it could be carried in a man's coat-tail pocket. I only draw the conclusion that it was established after his time from that statement on his part.

Q. Those routes were in existence, then, during Mr. Creswell's administration of the Post-Office Department?—A. They were, sir.

Q. They were re-advertised and relet during his administration?—A. The route from Baltimore and the route from Washington to Norfolk, and the route from New Orleans to Key West, were. About the New York line I cannot say. I know that the route from New Orleans to Key West was. I know that from the records the Department, which show that C. C. Huntley, a stage-contractor in Montana, received 10 per cent. of the pay on that route, for some interest that he had growing out of the letting of 1870. It was negotiated with Lewis Johnson & Company each quarter. Mr. McLellan told me that McKibbon, the witness in the McKibbon investigation, told him that he had received $4,000 out of the pay on that route, as attorney's fees, after the close of that investigation.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. Can you remember what the amount received by Peterson for all his mail-routes was?—A. I cannot.

Q. Do you know how many routes he had and how much he received?—A. I do not know. I would suggest that that evidence can be obtained from the records of the Department very much better than from any guess that I can make. It would be purely a guess on my part.

Q. I have seen it stated in a paper this morning that the reason of your being asked for your resignation was that you communicated with the correspondent of the New York Sun; state whether that was true or whether you were so informed. I understood you to say in your testimony that no reason was assigned for asking your resignation.—A. No reason was assigned.

Q. But I understood you to say from expressions used by Peterson, your inference was that it was for interfering generally with his arrangements in the Department—that he had boasted that he had to have this thing done in order to protect himself.—A. I have given my authority for that opinion, sir.

Q. And there was nothing said about your having given away information to anybody at the time your resignation was asked for or received?—A. Nothing, sir; I repeated here word for word, I think, the language that passed between the Postmaster-General and myself.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Can you give the number of the route from New Orleans to Saint Francisville?—A. The route in 1871 was 8003 Louisiana, according to the Postmaster-General's report.

Q. When was that route established?—A. I cannot say.

Q. How far is Saint Francisville from New Orleans; where is it from the mouth of the Red River? Is it above or below?—A. It is below the mouth of the Red River. The records show that it is 170 miles from New Orleans, while the mouth of the Red River, as shown by the report for 1875, is about 280 miles from New Orleans; so that Saint Francisville is about 100 miles south of Red River Landing.

Q. Have you ever examined the bids at the letting of 1871, upon that route, which are on file in the Department, and the record evidence contained in the inspection division, in reference to the same?—A. I have examined it in the official record, which is here before Mr. Stowell.

Q. This is the printed book?—A. Yes.

Q. Is that the same as the evidence in the office?—A. I cannot say.

Q. As a matter of practice, is the whole thing set out in the book?—A. Yes; this is furnished to Congress under the law, and is supposed to be a transcript of every bid, and of the action taken by the Department in relation to the letting.

Q. Are the recommendations upon which service is increased or decreased in the practice of the Department printed too?—A. They are not, sir.

Q. What other matters are there in reference to that kind of service, which are not printed, if any?—A. Do you mean in relation to letting mail-routes?

Q. I want to find out how much is printed and how much is not.—A. That is the only record of that character that has been published during this administration since 1869, to my knowledge. The publication was suppressed for some reason.

Q. This is from 1871 to 1875?—A. No, sir; that is the contract-term, from 1871 to 1875. It was published at the second session of the Forty-third Congress, I think.

Q. You say the publication was suppressed; what do you know about that?—A. Mr. Lowrey, the man who makes up the records in the contract-office, stated to me that he and Mr. Childs, the former chief clerk of the contract-office, had made repeated efforts to have that evidence printed, for there was a great deal of labor to make it up, and that they had made repeated efforts to have them printed but had never been able to succeed. Colonel Knowlton, the chief clerk under Postmaster-General Jewell, wrote a personal letter, which is in this committee-room, calling the attention of Congress to the necessity of printing it.

Q. Do I understand, then, that this report was suppressed by the Department, or was it for the want of an order from Congress that it was not printed, or don't you know?—A. In one instance Congress ordered a report to be printed, and the Congressional Printer sent to the Department for the manuscript. The messenger of the Postmaster-General reported that he had delivered the manuscript at the Speaker's room, a mass of matter some three feet high, and it had disappeared and was never found.

Q. Who was that messenger?—A. His name is Gordon. He is the present messenger of the Postmaster-General. This was in 1872.

Q. When was this report printed?—A. During the Forty-third Congress, I think.

Q. This is the first report?—A. It is the only report to my knowledge, or so far as the officers of the Department are able to ascertain, that has been printed since 1866.

Q. Do you know, of your own knowledge, whether the printing of this report was suppressed by the Post-Office Department, or whether it was not printed because of the want of an order of Congress, or the want of an appropriation?—A. I have stated already that, so far as my information goes, the report is made each year, in accordance with law, to Congress. The only instance in which I know of its not being printed, when ordered by the House of Representatives, is that which I have mentioned when this manuscript disappeared. That was in 1872, I think, the report following that one.

Q. Was any step ever taken by Congress to supply that report, or have it supplied?—A. Not that I know of. Mr. Lowrey says he knows of no action.

Q. Do you impute blame to the Postmaster-General on account of that report not being printed, or if blame exists does it lie at the doors of Congress?—A. I do not impute blame to anybody.

Q. Is it not true that if that report was not printed, it was because Congress did not order it printed?—A. No, sir; it is not true in the instance I have just cited. Congress did order it printed in that case.

Q. Then it is true in the other instances?—A. I cannot answer that; I suppose the journal of the House will show.

Q. Have you any personal knowledge as to this report being lost, or are you speaking from what you have heard?—A. I am speaking of the current reports in the Department. My information was received from Mr. Lowrey.

Q. Have you any personal knowledge about it?—A. I have stated to the best of my ability what my knowledge is.

Q. Have you any personal knowledge about it?—A. None whatever, except what I have stated.

Q. That is what somebody had told you about it?—A. It is, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was it an officer in the Department told you?—A. Yes, the officer who has charge of making up the report.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Please read all there is in relation to that route 8014, [handing witness.]—A. [Reading.] "Route 8014, New Orleans to Saint Francisville, 170 miles and back, twice a week in steamboat. Proposals invited for three times a week service. Bidders' names; sum per annum. Charles C. Pickett, $52,000; James B. Price, $18,000; $24,000 three times a week. John N. Cannon, $16,000; $24,000 three times a week. James B. Price, $12,000; $20,000 three times a week. Peterson and Searles, $11,000; $14,350 three times a week. Jacob A. Pulver, $5,500, accepted March 30, 1871. Contract drawn and sent to Jacob A. Pulver, dated March 30, 1871, at $5,500, but never executed. Contract of B. H. Peterson, of New Orleans, from July 31, to December 31, 1871, or until otherwise ordered, at $16,000 per annum. July 22, 1871, modify order of July 15, 1871, by adding 'on account of accepted bidder having failed to begin service, and re-advertise route; failing bidder being liable.'

"Leave New Orleans on Fridays, at 9 a. m., arrive at Saint Francisville next day at 9 a. m.; leave Saint Francisville Wednesday and Saturday, at 10 p. m., arrive at New Orleans next day, at 10 a. m."

Q. Have you any personal knowledge in reference to that route except what you found from that report?—A. I have, sir.

Q. I am speaking about this letting. Have you any other personal knowledge in reference to that?—A. No, sir; I have not.

Q. You have testified before, I believe, in regard to this route?—A. I do not know that I have. I cannot say. I will call your attention, if you will permit me, to the fact that Peterson & Searles, who are the same person as B. H. Peterson, bid $14,350 on that route, and that the contract was afterward made with Peterson at $16,000.

Q. You say that Peterson & Searles are the same persons as Peterson. Please state what you know about that.—A. I say that they are the same contractor.

Q. Do you know that of your own knowledge?—A. I know it from the fact that Peterson draws the pay for Peterson & Searles, and "Peterson & Searles's" routes are recognized as Peterson's routes in the Department.

Q. How recognized?—A. By permitting him to transact all business in connection with them.

Q. Do you know whether he has a power of attorney or not?—A. I do not.

Q. If he had a power of attorney and was acting as the agent of Peterson & Searles, then the relation would be that of principal and agent instead of their being the same party, would it not?—A. Hardly, when his name appears as one of the firm. He would be a partner.

Q. I understood you to say that he did not appear as one of the firm.—A. Yes; it is Peterson & Searles.

Q. I am speaking now as a bidder.—A. I was speaking of the bids of Peterson & Searles.

Q. Do you know Mr. Searles?—A. I do not. I have never seen him to my knowledge.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know any one who knows Mr. Searles?—A. I have no knowledge in relation to Mr. Searles.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Do you know John N. Cannon?—A. I do. I have seen him. He is the captain of the Robert E. Lee, running between Vicksburgh and New Orleans, in the line with Captain Leathers.

Q. Why did you call attention, when it was shown that this contract had been let to Peterson at $16,000, to the fact that Peterson & Searles had bid prior to that at $14,350?—A. Because I supposed you might not know what I know, that Peterson and Peterson & Searles were recognized as the same parties.

Q. But what significance has that fact to which you called attention, that their bid, at first, was $14,350; that there was a lower bid by Pulver at $5,500, which was not executed, and that afterward the contract was let to Peterson at $16,000?—A. I called attention to it because it struck me as rather singular that a contract should be made with Peterson at a higher rate than is represented by his bid.

Q. Under the law in existence at that time, after the service had been let to Mr. Jacob A. Pulver, were Peterson and Searles held to their former bid?—A. They were not.

Q. Was Cannon held to his bid, or Price to his at $12,000?—A. No, sir.

Q. Those bids were all "off" under the law?—A. They were, as I understand it.

Q. The law made them "off"?—A. No, sir. As you will see by the document before you, it had been treated as optional with the Postmaster-General, whether he would go up the line of bidders or re-advertise.

Q. Do you not know that the law, as interpreted by the Attorney-General at that time, was that the lowest bidder had to have the contract, and, if he failed to execute it, that there was nothing left open but to put on temporary service, or re-advertise, or both?—A. I am aware that Attorney-General Akerman gave such an opinion as to the effect of the law of March 3, 1845, to which his attention was called by Mr. Creswell.

Q. You say that the Postmaster-General had the discretion to run up the bids at that time and let the contract to the next higher bidder without re-advertising?—A. Under the law of March 3, 1845, according to the custom of the Department, he had that privilege.

Q. You are speaking now of the law in existence at the lettings in June or July, 1871, as interpreted by the Attorney-General of the United States, which bound the Post-Office Department; and I ask you whether, under that interpretation, the Postmaster-General had the right to go to the next lowest bidder, after the lowest bidder had failed?—A. I think that perhaps you may not be aware, Mr. Cannon, of the fact that the opinion of the Attorney-General, in the document before you, is given upon the construction of the law of March 3, 1836, to which his attention, in that document, is specially directed by the Postmaster-General; no mention being made of the act of March 3, 1845, which was published with the advertisement for that service. I have before me the advertisement in which the Postmaster-General publishes all the laws bearing upon the lettings.

Q. Are you a lawyer?—A. I am not, sir. I am a practical post-office man.

Q. I understand you to be stating what the law was?—A. No, sir; I am answering your question to the best of my ability. You ask me my opinion as to the construction of a law, in view of the opinion of the Attorney-General rendered upon that law.

Q. And you have said, as I understand it, that the Postmaster-General had the right to run up the bids after the lowest bidder had failed; now I wanted to see whether he had that right or not?—A. I so understand it.

Q. Do you know it?—A. I know it well enough to do it myself if I were in his position.

Q. But I am asking you whether the law required or permitted him to do it at that time?—A. I stated a few minutes ago that, in the opinion of the officers of the Department, it was left optional with the Postmaster-General, under the act of March 3, 1845, upon which I have never seen an opinion of the Attorney-General; his attention having been called to an absolute law of July 2, 1836, by the document before you.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. Had not the Postmaster-General already taken official action some six days before he got the Attorney-General's opinion, in accordance with what the Attorney-General's opinion turned out to be?—A. The records so show. The document before you, Mr. Cannon, shows that on the 13th July, 1871, these contracts, many of them, were made, and the letter to the Attorney-General, in that document, is dated July 19, 1871, six days after the action of the Department as shown by the records. That is all I know.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Do you not know that it is very often the practice of the Postmaster-General, and of other officers of the Departments, to refer questions to the proper law-officer not by a formal communication, and then afterward, in order that everybody may know what the law is, to refer the same questions formally?—A. I so understand it.

Q. Refer to that section of the act of 1845 of which you have spoken.—A. It is section 18 of the act of March 3, 1845.

Q. Do I understand you to say that the opinion of the Attorney-General, which he gave in this matter, was not directed to that act?—A. I did not intend to so state. I have stated that his opinion was asked upon the construction of the law of July 2, 1836.

Q. Did you ever read his opinion?—A. I have read it, sir.

Q. I believe that is it. [Handing the witness a document.]—A. Yes, sir; that is it. You will understand that I did not intend to state that the Attorney-General did not mention that law of 1845. I did intend to state that his attention was specially called to the operation of the law of July 2, 1836, in the communication upon which his opinion is based.

Q. Did not you intend to convey the impression that the Attorney-General had not had in view, at the time he gave this opinion, the law of 1845; was it not the object of your statement to convey that impression?—A. No, sir. My own understanding is that the opinion of the Attorney-General—

Q. That is not the question. I ask you if you did not intend to convey the impression that the Attorney-General's opinion was not directed to, and he did not take into consideration, the act of 1845, at the time he rendered this opinion?—A. I had no desire to convey any impression other than the true one, and that is that his opinion was asked upon the construction of the law of July 2, 1836.

Q. Be kind enough to read from his opinion, from that point, [indicating.]

The WITNESS. [Reading from Mis. Doc. 53, Forty-second Congress, second session, page 3.] "The act of July 2, 1836, section 24, 5 United States Statutes, 86, and the act of March 3, 1845, section 18, 5 United States Statutes, 748, gives the contract to the lowest bidder"—

Q. That is all that I desire you to read now. Then the Attorney-General did have his attention called in some way, or did take notice himself, of the 18th section of the act of 1845, at the time he gave that opinion, did he not?—A. He unquestionably took notice of it, sir.

Q. Yet you say that after this opinion was received the Postmaster-General had the right, upon the lowest bidder failing to execute his contract, to go to the next lowest bidder?—A. I say that he had a right to go up the list according to the usage of the Department. If I have placed myself in the position of defining the duty of a Postmaster-General by the answers that I have made, I desire to correct that impression. I make the statement that it is my impression, rather than an expression of opinion as to the duty of the Postmaster-General, my superior officer at that time. I do not desire to express an opinion as to his duty.

Mr. CANNON put the opinion of the Attorney-General, accompanied by the letter asking for it, in evidence. They will be found in the Appendix.

By Mr. WADDELL :

Q. Please read that section of the act of 1845.—A. [Reading.] “That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General, in all future lettings or contracts for the transportation of the mail, to let the same in every case to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guarantees for faithful performance—without other reference to the mode of such transportation than may be necessary to provide for the due celerity, certainty, and security for such transportation; nor shall any new contractor hereafter be required to purchase out, or take at a valuation, the stock or vehicle of any previous contractor for the same route.”

By Mr. CANNON :

Q. Do you know how many of those bidders on route 8014 were straw-bidders?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether any of them were?—A. I do not, except the evidence that one of them gives himself by failing to contract; that is all I know about it.

Q. Do you know whether John W. Cannon, James B. Price, and Peterson, and Searles confederated together to put in these bids?—A. I do not; I haven't any knowledge about that.

Q. Do you know whether Peterson and Searles at that time represented John W. Cannon?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether they were authorized to act as Mr. Cannon's agents?—A. I do not; you are asking for my direct knowledge?

Q. Yes, sir; Mr. Cannon was the owner of a steamboat at that time, was he not?—A. Captain Cannon was the owner and commander of a steamboat. His boats, however, could not do that service. This was for way-service between New Orleans and Saint Francisville, or Bayou Sara, which is the landing.

Q. Is there anything else about route 8014 that you know, that you have not told?—A. I do not know that there is.

Q. You speak of going south to visit a number of post-offices as a special agent; you were sent for that specific purpose?—A. I was.

Q. You made a report about your trip down there, in writing?—A. I made a report of all matters connected with my special duty.

Q. That report was in writing?—A. I made reports of each case; those reports were in writing.

Q. And referred to these respective post-offices?—A. They did, sir.

Q. Was that the only written report you made?—A. No, sir; I made a report in reference to the failure of the Robert E. Lee, commanded by J. W. Cannon, to supply the offices on Davis's Bend on the route from New Orleans to Vicksburgh.

Q. Those were three offices, I believe?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That report was filed in the Department?—A. It was, sir.

Q. Was there anything else in the report except in relation to those subjects?—A. Nothing, except in relation to that supply.

Q. John W. Cannon, the commander of the Robert E. Lee, was he connected with Peterson at that time?—A. Not that I am aware of.

Q. Then that was Captain Cannon's failure and not Peterson's?—A. It was the failure of the Robert E. Lee as a boat, doing half the service of that route; whom she represented, I do not know.

Q. Did you make any further written reports at that time in relation to anything that you observed on that trip?—A. O, I was making reports all the time.

Q. On that trip, I speak of.—A. Yes, sir. I made a report on the Saint Francisville office.

Q. You have spoken of the offices already.—A. I made one other report. When I reached the office at Marshall, Texas, to investigate the condition of that office, I found in the corner of the room a large pile of papers and letters. I asked for an explanation, and was told that the contractor on that route had not taken the mail for some six weeks. That was a short route out of Marshall, Texas, running to Tyler, I think, or in that direction.

Q. Who was the contractor?—A. I do not remember now.

Q. Was that report filed?—A. I perhaps ought to state all the action I took in connection with it. I don't know whether that report is in the Department. It was made there. I made a contract myself. I went to a livery-stable, had the mail done up in bags, with a separate bag for each office on the route, and made a contract for $80, I think, to take those bags out, deliver them at the post-offices, and bring receipts for them. I had him sworn. I reported the fact to the Department, and the postmaster at Marshall was allowed the amount that he paid this livery-stable man, and my action was approved. That report was in writing.

Q. Did you make any other report on that trip?—A. All these questions are in relation to mail-routes, are they not?

Q. Certainly.—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Now, you were a special agent, and it was your duty to report any irregularities that you found, to the Department?—A. I was a special agent assigned to the money-order branch of the Post-Office Department; my duties were assigned to me by Dr. McDonald.

Q. You were sworn?—A. I was sworn and under bond.

Q. As an officer of the Government?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it not also a part of your duty, if anything else outside of the money-order business came under your notice while you were investigating that, to make a report to the Department?—A. That is a question that is rather hard to answer.

Q. Didn't you take the burden of that upon yourself while you were down there?—A. I did in some instances. It was not strictly my duty.

Q. Did you make a report of these matters—a written report?—A. I did.

Q. Where is that report?—A. They were filed in the Department; the reports I have just referred to.

Q. We are speaking now of the post-offices and of this Marshall matter.—A. O, my reports are all in the office of the superintendent of the money-order office, filed under my name, with my bond, I suppose.

Q. You speak of seeing the mails carried on the forward deck of a steamer on Red River. Did you make a report of that?—A. I did not.

Q. You spoke of having conversation with the clerk of that boat, who said that the United States Government might go to h—l with the mails; that they were forced to do the business through middlemen, and didn't care much about it anyhow. Did you make a report of that matter in writing?—A. I did not.

Q. Who was that clerk?—A. I don't know, sir; I don't know his name.

Q. What was the steamboat?—A. I don't know the name of that. As I stated in my direct examination, I was on several boats of that line on my way up.

Q. What year was it?—A. It was in the spring of 1871.

Q. Who had the contract at that time for that route?—A. Dr. B. H. Peterson. So the president of the line informed me.

Q. I understand you to say in your examination-in-chief that you did tell these verbally to Giles A. Smith, then Second Assistant Postmaster-General?—A. I reported to Giles A. Smith verbally what I stated in my direct examination in relation to this route.

Q. You reported this conversation, didn't you?—A. I cannot say that I did.

Q. You did not tell him of that?—A. I cannot say that I did.

Q. He was your superior officer at that time, was he not?—A. I was not under his control. I was in the money-order office.

Q. At the same time I believe you stated in your examination-in-chief that you told Mr. Giles A. Smith that Peterson was openly trading upon his name down there?—A. I did.

Q. Did you have a talk with Peterson while you were there?—A. I saw him once.

Q. Did you converse with him about this matter in relation to Mr. Smith?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you report these facts which came under your notice as a special agent of the Department to the Department in writing?—A. I did not.

Q. I believe you stated that you called Mr. Giles A. Smith's attention to these reports, and what did he say?—A. I don't think I gave his reply.

Q. Did he make any reply?—A. Some reply. I cannot state definitely what that reply was.

Q. It was a mere verbal conversation?—A. It was.

Q. Was there anybody present?—A. There was not.

Q. And you don't recollect his reply?—A. I do not.

Q. I believe you stated in your examination-in-chief that Mr. Giles A. Smith never forgave you for it?—A. He never treated me in the same manner afterward.

Q. Do you know whether it was about that or something else? Did he ever tell you?—A. There never was anything that transpired— Mr. Bangs—

Q. Did he tell you so?—A. He did not.

Q. Where is Mr. Smith now?—A. In California, I think.

Q. In San Francisco?—A. No, sir; I think he owns a ranch in Southern California, near San Diego.

Q. Did you ever go to Mr. Creswell, the Postmaster-General, and tell him about this matter?—A. I did not.

Q. You spoke with Mr. Smith?—A. I did.

Q. Were you not aware that if you wanted your report, as a special agent, of these frauds which you claimed existed, and which I presume did, to be considered, it was your duty to make a written report of that matter to the Department? Was it not a part of your duty to do so, as one of its sworn officers and as a special agent of the Department?—A. It depends a good deal upon the circumstances, I think.

Q. I am asking you, under these circumstances?—A. Well, sir, if I desired to sever my connection with the Department at that time, I should perhaps have thought it was my duty to do so.

Q. Do you state, however, that you desired to hold your place and so let your duty go?—A. No, sir; I meant to express that I would not go out of the line of my direct duty to forfeit my position.

Q. Yet you had considered it your duty to take cognizance of these matters, and report them verbally?—A. General Smith was my friend, sir; and I believed it my duty to him not only as an officer, but as a friend, to let him know, he being the responsible officer, of the condition of things which existed there, that he might correct it.

Q. When he failed to correct it, it made an impression upon your mind that Peterson was a favorite man with him?—A. That impression was made before.

Q. Still he was your friend at the time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you call a man your friend who you had the impression, and were satisfied at the time, was guilty of frauds against the Government, and he holding that high position?—A. I have not made that charge.

Q. O, you do not make the charge of fraud against Mr. Smith?—A. I have never made the charge that, at that time, I believed that General Smith had any corrupt connection with Mr. Peterson. My first knowledge of Mr. Peterson, as I stated upon the direct examination, or of his contracts, grew out of my trips through the Southwest in 1871.

Q. I am talking about Mr. Smith; I understand, now, that you do not make any charges of fraud against Mr. Smith?—A. I do not intend to give you that impression.

Q. I want you to fix it one way or the other, I don't care which way.—A. Well, sir, I say that at that time I did not believe that General Smith had any corrupt connection with B. H. Peterson.

Q. Do you know that he ever had any corrupt connection with him?—A. I do not, except from circumstantial evidence.

Q. The whole tenor of your evidence is to charge him with corrupt connection; didn't you aim to convey that impression?—A. I aimed to convey no impression, except the impression that might grow out of the statement of facts, which I believe to be true, and which I have testified to under oath.

Q. When did you first report to the Postmaster-General this matter in reference to Mr. Smith and Peterson?—A. I never made any report to the Postmaster-General.

Q. Did you ever talk with him about it?—A. I never did. I never talked with Mr. Creswell at all on more than one or two occasions.

Q. You made no written report, nor you never made an effort to have what you conceived to be a wrong righted, even after Mr. Smith failed to shut off Peterson?—A. From the fact that the transactions were made public soon after my conversation with General Smith. The information was furnished to the Postmaster-General through the press of this city.

Q. What information?—A. Information as to frauds perpetrated in mail-contracts in the letting of 1871.

Q. Do you mean of straw-bids and the frauds from straw-bidding?—A. I do.

Q. That has been reported for a number of years?—A. That was the first report that I saw in 1871.

Q. It has been reported from that time to this?—A. Yes, sir; it has.

Q. I am speaking now of this specific matter; I want to know whether you ever reported this specific matter to the Postmaster-General?—A. I did not.

Q. When did you first report it?—A. I never reported it to him.

Q. When did you first report it to anybody outside of the Department?—A. I never reported it to any one until I gave the information to Mr. Luttrell and Mr. Stone in the Forty-third Congress.

Q. What time in the Forty-third Congress?—A. As soon as I was brought into contact with them.

Q. What year was it?—A. It was in 1874, I think.

Q. What induced you to hold your peace from 1871 until 1874 and then make the report?—A. I was very well aware of the fact which you also were aware of, that this subject had been investigated.

Q. No, I am not aware of it now.—A. I thought you were; I beg your pardon. The matter was very thoroughly investigated, or supposed to be so, by the congressional investigation of 1871-1872, in which the facts were developed which I was cognizant of.

Q. These facts that you have been telling, then, came out in the investigation of 1871-1872 substantially, in reference to these fraudulent contracts?—A. I never read the testimony. I don't know how much of it came out. The subject was before the committee.

Q. And a thorough investigation was made and the matters came out?—A. I mean to state this, that the subject was before the committee, and up to the time of the failure of the witness McKibbin to testify, I understand that the investigation was a thorough one, (I am not speaking from positive knowledge,) in relation to the fraudulent transactions in the Southwest growing out of the mail-letting of 1871, the Peterson contracts, and others. I think, if you will recall my direct examination, you will find that I stated to the committee that Captain Leathers told me when he called my attention to these things, that a committee of steamboat-men were then in Washington to lay these matters before the Department.

Q. Now, in reference to Captain Leathers, you say he complained to you about Peterson?—A. He did, sir. That was in the spring of 1871, February or March, I think.

Q. Was it before or after these bids were put in on route 8006?—A. It was before those bids were disposed of; I don't know whether it was before they were put in or not.

Q. Repeat again what it was that Captain Leathers told you about that.—A. He told me among other things that he considered it a great outrage that they could not contract directly with the United States Government; that they could get no contracts, except through B. H. Peterson; that a delegation of steamboat-men were then in Washington to lay the matter before the Department.

Q. Did not Captain Leathers tell you at that time that he had not, since the war, put in a bid?—A. He did not.

Q. Did he tell you that he had put in a bid?—A. He left an impression upon my mind that he had failed to obtain contracts.

Q. Then, if I was to tell you that he testified that he had not put in a single bid, that impression would be removed?—A. If he testified that he had not put in any bids and made no efforts to obtain contracts, it would.

Q. Didn't he tell you in that same conversation that he and Mr. Cannon and another man—three steamboat-owners—had given this very man Peterson a power of attorney to act for them in getting their contracts?—A. He did not, sir.

Q. Didn't he tell you in the same conversation that not only that, but that they had written a letter to the Postmaster-General that Peterson was their only accredited agent; and not only that, but that they would not carry the mail for anybody else except Peterson?—A. He did not.

Q. If I should tell you that he testified to substantially that, you would think there was not much reliance to be placed upon the statements he made to you?—A. No, sir; I should think that he had been forced into making such an arrangement as that, after he had expressed himself as he did to me.

Q. Yet he expressed himself to you so in February or March?—A. Yes, sir; I think so. My impression is that it was in February; I know I came to Washington and found the delegation of steamboat-men here.

Q. Do you know what they did here?—A. I do not; but I saw them in the Second Assistant's room, and I saw them go into the Postmaster-General's room.

Q. Who were in that delegation?—A. Mr. Cannon was the only one that I knew. I never have seen him since, to speak to him. I only knew from Captain Leathers what he had come here for.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. You spoke of a case in which a route was given to Peterson at nearly $2,000 more than his bid previously made; was not that very generally the case in most of those straw-bid contracts? Did not the Department, in many instances, make contracts with one Sawyer and others for a great deal more than the bids they had on file at that time?—A. From my personal knowledge, I am not capable of answering that question. I think, as a general thing, the persons with whom contracts were made did not have bids in. I remember one or two instances where F. P. Sawyer, jr., bids on a route and his father gets a larger amount, but I don't remember any instance where Sawyer bid himself and was awarded a contract at a higher amount.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1871.

T. L. HOLBROOK recalled and further examined.

By Mr. CANNON:

Question. Locate the time, as nearly as possible, when you made the verbal communication to Dr. McDonald concerning Peterson's influence with General Smith, of which you have spoken.—A. I had a number of communications with Dr. McDonald upon the subject.

Q. State when was the first time that you told him of what you had found out when you were at the South, about Peterson and his influence with Smith.—A. I should say in the fall of '71, or early in the winter of 1872.

Q. Five or six months after you returned?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Dr. McDonald was your immediate superior officer?—A. He was not in the country at that time.

Q. Was he in the country when you returned from the South?—A. He made the arrangements for me to go into the bureau to take the position of David Haines on the 1st of July, 1871, either in the last of April or the 1st of May. I saw him for a day or so only. He then ordered me to Jacksonville, Florida, to work up a matter there.

Q. But was he in the Department, or did you see him after you returned from Louisiana where you had discovered these matters that you speak of having told General Smith about?—A. I saw him for a short time only. He was then under orders to go to Europe.

Q. Was he on duty in the Department at that time?—A. Yes, sir; but he was making his preparations to leave for Europe; he returned in the fall of 1871, I think.

Q. You had a conversation with Floyd, a clerk; how long was that after you returned from Florida?—A. Immediately.

Q. What desk did he occupy at that time?—A. He was contract-clerk for Louisiana, Texas and Arkansas; afterward curtailed to Louisiana and Texas.

Q. Where is Mr. Floyd now?—A. He is in Maine, I think. Since the development of his corruption, he has not been in Washington. He was discharged, I think, the day after the Connecticut election last spring.

Q. You speak of a man named Sickles that you communicated this matter to?—A. As I stated before, I had several conversations with Mr. Sickles; but I did not know him personally at that time.

Q. How long after your return was it that you communicated this to him?—A. I cannot say; I had a number of interviews with him.

Q. How long after your return was the first one?—A. I cannot say; there is nothing to fix it in my mind. He had the inspection-desk for Mr. Floyd's section. Mr. Sickles is still a clerk in the Department, contract-clerk for Arkansas and Missouri now.

Q. Was he under Floyd's direction?—A. Mr. Sickles was under Mr. Floyd's direction—not so considered, but the inspection-clerk receives his instructions from the contract-clerk.

Q. You don't know whether you communicated this a day or two after your return, or whether it was six months or a year after?—A. I don't think I knew Mr. Sickles at all at that time. I can't say when it was. My impression is that as soon as I formed Mr. Sickles's acquaintance, I talked with him very freely about the condition of things.

Q. Was it probably then six months, or three months, or a year? You say you did not know him when you returned?—A. I don't know that I knew Mr. Sickles at the time to talk to him. My impression is that it was some time afterward that I talked to him first.

Q. You say that you talked to somebody else; to whom else did you detail this special information?—A. I think you refer, sir, to A. H. Brown. I talked with him immediately when I returned from the South. He was a particular friend of General Smith, from Bloomington, Ill.; he was contract-clerk for the Territories and the Pacific States.

Q. Where is Mr. Brown now?—A. I think he is in the city. He is not in the Department. He resigned last fall.

Q. Did he resign or was he removed?—A. He resigned. I never heard anything against his character; I know no reason for his removal, but I know that he resigned.

Q. This route from New Orleans to Saint Francisville that I asked you about yesterday, do you know the price that Peterson was paid under his contract in 1871?—A. Only from the records.

Q. Do you recollect it independent of the records?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you know how often the service was to be performed on that route?—A. Only from the record. My impression is that it was three times a week, at $16,000 a year, but that is information derived from the record.

Q. Do you know what is being paid for the service now?—A. I do not, sir.

Q. Do you know how many offices there were along the river between Saint Francisville and New Orleans, that were supplied by this line at that time?—A. Most of the offices between Saint Francisville and New Orleans were supplied by the Memphis and Vicksburgh packet-boats running over the same line as far as Saint Francisville. My impression is that there were six or eight offices on the line to Saint Francisville that were not supplied by the Vicksburgh boats. I speak from my best recollection. I do not recollect the names of the offices. The advertisements will give them.

Q. You say you do not know what is being paid for that same service now?—A. I do not know.

Q. Can you state from your own knowledge whether $16,000 is an exorbitant price or not?—A. I cannot.

Q. Then you do not know whether the consequences of that fraud, if it was one, were disastrous to the Government or not?—A. No, sir; I do not, except by inference.

Q. You don't know what that service is worth, do you?—A. I do not. I am not a steamboat-man.

Q. The route from New Orleans to Vicksburgh; Peterson had that route also, I believe?—A. I so understand.

Q. Do you know how often that service was performed?—A. When I was over the route, it was performed twice a week only; under the new contract, it is three times a week. Thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars was the price he got in 1871. That I get from the record.

Q. Do you know what is being paid for that service now?—A. $35,000, I understand.

Q. Do you know whether there are more offices to be supplied now than there were in 1871?—A. I do not.

Q. Can you say that $37,500 was more than that service was worth?—A. I cannot undertake to say, sir, what any mail-service is worth.

Q. I am asking you about this particular route now.—A. No, sir.

Q. Or do you know whether the price now paid, $37,000, is exorbitant?—A. I cannot say.

Q. Then you don't know whether on that contract the Government in fact paid, or is now paying, more than the service is worth?—A. No, sir.

Q. On all these routes, except the route from New Orleans to Shreveport, can you say that the prices paid under the Peterson contracts were exorbitant?—A. Do you mean from my own personal knowledge?

Q. Certainly; or from any knowledge you may have about it as to what the service is let at now, taking into consideration the number of offices and the quality of the service. I will ask you first as to your personal knowledge.—A. I have no personal knowledge.

Q. You don't recollect what was paid on those different routes, or the number of offices on those different routes?—A. I have stated, as far as I know, the amount paid. I do not know the number of offices.

Q. Do you know what is being paid now?—A. I do not.

Q. You do not know whether more or less is being paid now?—A. No, sir; I have not had access to the records, or to any data by which to establish those facts.

Q. Do you know a Mr. Cheek, of Memphis?—A. I never saw him, to my knowledge.

Q. Do you know anything of the Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company, of which Mr. Cheek is agent?—A. From all the information that I have there is no such company.

Q. You have heard of such a company, have you not?—A. I have heard there was such a company.

Q. Is that the company that Mr. Cheek is, or purports to be, the agent of?—A. I will modify my answer by saying that I do not know that there is no such company; but my impression is that there are no boats known as the Memphis and Vicksburgh Packet Company's boats running on the Mississippi River.

Q. Somebody has told you that?—A. I received an official communication from the postmaster at Skipwith's Landing, Mississippi, who was a banker there, stating that fact. His letter was forwarded to the Department in the form of a certificate, with the special agent's report.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Cheek is, or was, in 1871, agent for a line of packets of which he was part owner?—A. I know that there is a person named Cheek, who is known as the agent for a packet company at Memphis.

Q. A packet company that has or has not an existence?—A. I do not know anything about the company. I do not know that. I modified my answer in regard to that by saying that my information was as to the boats of the packet company.

Q. Do you know whether Peterson was a copartner in or agent for this packet company?—A. I have understood that he received a percentage of the pay.

Q. I am asking you now for what you know. I am trying to separate what you understand or suppose from what you know.—A. Well, in some of the questions you ask for my positive knowledge and in others for what I have heard.

Q. Well, answer them in the one case as to your knowledge and in the other as to what you have heard.—A. Well, if knowledge derived from a third party is knowledge, I know that Peterson receives a percentage of the money that Cheek receives for that service.

Q. That is what somebody told you?—A. Yes, sir; somebody told me so.

Q. Do you know it?—A. This time you ask for my personal knowledge?

Q. Yes.—A. No, sir; I do not know it. I know that Mr. Peterson discounts the pay-accounts of Cheek, if that is knowledge.

Q. Don't you know that that contract in 1871, from Memphis to the mouth of White River, was let to Cheek and Peterson?—A. I do. The records so show. It was let to Peterson in '71, and subsequently to Cheek and Peterson.

Q. Do you know their agreement; have you ever seen their articles of copartnership?—A. I have not.

Q. I understand you to say that the mail from New Orleans to Shreveport in 1871 and 1872 was carried by the packets doing tri-weekly service from New Orleans to Vicksburgh?—A. No, sir; I did not so state.

Q. You speak of the Red River Packet Company; where did that packet company ply?—A. Between New Orleans and Shreveport. Mr. Counz was the president. In the spring of 1871, when I was there, they carried the mails by river.

Q. That matter, you said, I believe, was investigated in the McKibbin investigation?—A. I so understand it.

Q. You speak of assisting Mr. Woodward, the special agent, in detecting frauds in the Post-Office Department.—A. In working up frauds in the Department.

Q. I understood from your evidence that you suggested to him to change the clerks from one desk to another?—A. No, sir. That was the assistance that I gave to Colonel Knowlton, on the 2d or 3d of February, '75, I think.

Q. You are the author of that proposition?—A. I don't know that. I suggested it to Colonel Knowlton, and he told me that the Postmaster-General had acted upon it.

Q. And you referred him, in the first instance, to a copy of the New York Sun, containing an article a year or two ago, and to the records of the Department?—A. No, sir; that was to Mr. Woodward.

Q. I am asking about him.—A. Colonel Knowlton, the chief clerk of the Department, (Mr. Jewell's former secretary in Connecticut,) and Mr. Woodward, also, I worked with, and I think you are confounding the two.

Q. Well, I don't care which of them—go on and state.—A. As I stated on my direct examination, Mr. Woodward came to Georgetown and sought my assistance in developing frauds, and I gave him a copy of the New York Sun, not an old copy. It was a copy published that fall some time, containing, or purporting to contain, a statement of these two routes from Memphis to Vicksburgh, and referred him to the records to substantiate the statements therein contained.

Q. Have you those records now?—A. The records of the Department?

Q. Yes.—A. I have not, sir.

Q. Or transcripts of them?—A. I have not.

Q. You were asked for your resignation in February last, I believe?—A. On the 3d of February, I think it was.

Q. You were very much surprised at it, were you not?—A. I was.

Q. And yet you did not ask the Postmaster-General the reason?—A. I did not.

Q. I understood you to say that you had received assurances prior to that time, from Mr. Woodward or Mr. Knowlton, or both, that you should retain your place in the Department?—A. I did not.

Q. Well, you had received an intimation of that kind?—A. I had reason to suppose that, after accepting my assistance, with the knowledge of what I have testified that I told Mr. Woodward, and the fact that the Postmaster-General in January asked me to give Mr. Woodward assistance, and directed Mr. Woodward and Colonel Knowlton to investigate subjects which I had laid before him in writing, I was in accord with the Postmaster-General and the officers of the Department.

Q. Why did you not ask the Postmaster-General for the reasons for your discharge?—A. Because under his instructions I had been working with his chief clerk and confidential man, and I went to him for the information.

Q. But why? The confidential man did not ask you for your resignation, did he?—A. No, sir; he did not.

Q. Is the only reason, then, the reason you have assigned, why you did not ask the Postmaster-General his reason for asking your resignation?—A. That is the only reason; that the Postmaster-General, after having accepted my assistance, and directed me to work with Colonel Knowlton, asked for my resignation in that way, and I tendered it.

Q. You had no curiosity to know about it from the Postmaster-General?—A. If I had I should have satisfied it. No, sir; I had not.

Q. You did not know whether it was on account of some lie or misrepresentation that had been made in regard to you by somebody, or what was the reason?—A. I did, within three hours.

Q. I am speaking of the time of the discharge.—A. I did not. I went directly from the Postmaster-General to Colonel Knowlton.

Q. And then you told Knowlton that you thought he owed it to you to find out what the reason was?—A. I did.

Q. Then you did have some curiosity to find out the reason at that time?—A. I had curiosity to find it out all the time.

Q. You wanted to employ a day's man?—A. I do not know what you mean as a "day's man."

Q. Some man to go between you and the Postmaster-General.—A. I wanted to ascertain the real reason from a man in the confidence of the Postmaster-General, who could obtain from him reasons that he would not accord to a clerk. I thought that the best way to obtain it.

By Mr. WADDELL:

Q. If I understand you correctly, you mean that if you had asked the Postmaster-General directly for the reason he would not have given a candid answer?—A. Governor Jewell was not in the habit, as any gentleman who know him knows, of being catechised by his clerks.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Not even when he called a man into his room and asked for his resignation, he would not answer a question why he wanted the resignation?—A. I have known of instances, sir, where he gave no reasons.

Q. When the reason was asked for?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you present?—A. No, sir; I know of them by hearsay.

Q. Then you do not know of them of your own knowledge?—A. I do not.

Q. Mr. Knowlton stated, I think you testified, that he could not tell you the reason.—A. He said that he could not tell me the real reason.

Q. Do you know the real reason?—A. I think I do.

Q. I am not asking you whether you think you do; do you know the real reason why your resignation was asked for?—A. I believe I do.

Q. Have you any additional reason to state, further than the one you did state a day or two ago in your examination here?—A. The reason which Colonel Knowlton gave me led me to infer that a power higher than the Postmaster-General had influenced his action.

Q. Mr. Knowlton told you that?—A. No, sir; he gave me to infer that the Postmaster-General could not help asking for my resignation.

Q. You have stated that Mr. Knowlton gave you to infer; be kind enough to give us the words he used or the substance of them.—A. I have already stated the conversation that took place between him and myself.

Q. Please state again what he said—not what he gave you to understand.—A. That he was more embarrassed than he ever was in his life; that he knew the real reason why the Postmaster-General had asked for my resignation, but could not tell it to me.

Q. Was that substantially all he said?—A. Yes, as to the real reason.

Q. You stated something about having a conversation with Kittle about the reason.—A. No, sir; I repeated to the committee what Mr. Kittle told me.

Q. When did you have this conversation with Kittle?—A. Kittle told me of this some time in March. He repeated it in the room of the chairman of the committee of which I am clerk, in the presence of some members of this committee, the other evening.

Q. He is here in the city now?—A. I believe he is.

Q. He is a Texas contractor, is he not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The man who turned States evidence and tried to convict his confederates, is he not?—A. He is the man who was accepted by the Postmaster-General as a witness.

Q. Well, he turned States evidence, didn't he?—A. Well, he objects to having it so termed.

Q. I am not asking now what he objects to. He admitted his own guilt, and testified that somebody else was guilty with him, did he not?—A. He did.

Q. Was it before or after he gave that testimony that he told you this?—A. Before.

Q. And he told you that Peterson had stated to him that he had to get you out of the way for his own protection?—A. No, sir. He stated that he was in the room of A. L. Boone, chief of the pay-division of the Sixth Auditor's Office, and that Peterson made a statement to Mr. Boone, similar to that which you have just repeated.

Q. Where is Boone now?—A. He is in the board of health.

Q. When did he get out of the Auditor's Office?—A. He left in the spring, I think, of 1875.

Q. Then he was in the Auditor's Office at that time?—A. Yes; he was at the head of the pay-division.

Q. Was his resignation asked for, or was he removed, or did he resign?—A. I do not know. He was an officer of the Treasury Department.

Q. You have no knowledge upon that point?—A. No personal knowledge.

Q. Did you know anything about Peterson that you had not told up to the time when you were asked for your resignation?—A. I do not think I do.

Q. How could you hurt Peterson by being in the Department if you had already told all you knew about him?—A. Mr. Peterson could answer that question better than I can, I suppose.
